PROCEEDINGS

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FOURTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 5, 1796.

MONDAY, December 5, 1796.

PRESENT:

JOHN ADAMS, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

JOHN LANGDON and SAMUEL LIVERMORE, from New Hampshire;

BENJAMIN GOODHUE, from Massachusetts;

WILLIAM BRADFORD, from Rhode Island;

JAMES HILLHOUSE and URIAH TRACY, from Connecticut;

ELIJAH PAINE and ISAAC TICHENOR, from Vermont;

JOHN RUTHERFURD and RICHARD STOCKTON, from New Jersey;

WILLIAM BINGHAM, from Pennsylvania;

HENRY LATIMER, from Delaware;

HUMPHREY MARSHALL, from Kentucky;

WILLIAM COCKE, from Tennessee;

JACOB READ, from South Carolina;

JAMES GUNN, from Georgia.

The number of Senators present not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, they adjourned to 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, December 6.

ALEXANDER MARTIN, from the State of North Carolina, and WILLIAM BLOUNT, from the State of Tennessee, severally attended.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a letter from PIERCE BUTLER, notifying the resignation of his seat in the Senate, which was read.

The credentials of the after-named Senators were severally read:—Of BENJAMIN GOODHUE, appointed a Senator by the State of Massachusetts, in place of GEORGE CABOT, resigned; of ISAAC TICHENOR, appointed a Senator by the State of Vermont, in place of MOSES ROBINSON, resigned; of JAMES HILLHOUSE, appointed a Senator by the State of Connecticut, in place of OLIVER ELLSWORTH, whose seat is become vacant; of URIAH TRACY, appointed a Senator by the State of Connecticut, in place of JONATHAN TRUMBULL, resigned; of JOHN LAURANCE, appointed a Senator by the State of New York, in place of RUFUS KING, whose seat is become vacant; of RICHARD

STOCKTON, appointed a Senator by the State of New Jersey, in place of FREDERICK FRELINGHUYSEN, resigned; also, of WILLIAM BLOUNT and WILLIAM COCKE, appointed Senators by the State of Tennessee;—and, the oath required by law being respectively administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and acquaint him that a quorum of the Senate is assembled.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have appointed a joint committee, on their part, together with such committee as the Senate may appoint, to wait on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

Resolved, That the Senate concur in the above resolution, and that Messrs. READ and LIVERMORE be the joint committee on the part of the Senate.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

Mr. READ reported, from the joint committee appointed for that purpose, that they had waited on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and had notified him that a quorum of the two Houses of Congress are assembled; and that the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES acquainted the committee that he would meet the two Houses in the Representatives' Chamber, at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

JOHN HENRY, from the State of Maryland, attended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they are now ready to meet the Senate in the Chamber of that House, to receive such communications as the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES shall be pleased to make to them.

Whereupon, the Senate repaired to the Chamber of the House of Representatives, for the purpose above expressed.

The Senate returned to their own Chamber, and a copy of the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, this day addressed to both Houses of Congress, was read. [For which, see the proceedings in the House of Representatives of December 7, post.]

Ordered, That Messrs. READ, TRACY, and BINGHAM, be a committee to report the draught of an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech this day to both Houses of Congress.

It was further ordered, that the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, this day communicated to both Houses, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with copies of three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose, provided that the same are furnished at the rate of the usual annual charge for such papers.

THURSDAY, December 8.

JOHN LAURANCE, from the State of New York, attended, and, the oath required by law being administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

Ordered, That Messrs. STOCKTON, READ, and BINGHAM, be a committee to inquire whether any, and what, regulations are proper to be made, on the subject of the resignation of a Senator of the United States.

On motion to proceed to class the Senators from the State of Tennessee, as the Constitution provides, it was agreed to postpone the consideration thereof until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 9.

TIMOTHY BLOODWORTH, from the State of North Carolina, attended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have resolved that two Chaplains be appointed to Congress for the present session—one by each House—who shall interchange weekly; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Whereupon, the Senate

Resolved, That they do concur therein, and that the Right Reverend Bishop WHITE be Chaplain on the part of the Senate.

Mr. READ, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported the draught of an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, at the opening of the session; which was read.

On motion, that it be printed for the use of the Senate, it passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to consider the report in paragraphs; and, after debate, a motion was made for recommitment, which passed in the negative; and, having agreed to amend the report, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

SATURDAY, December 10.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee in answer to the Address of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress; and, after further amendments, it was unanimously adopted, as follows:

We thank you, sir, for your faithful and detailed exposure of the existing situation of our country; and we sincerely join in sentiments of gratitude to an overruling Providence for the distinguished share of public prosperity and private happiness which the people of the United States so peculiarly enjoy.

We are fully sensible of the advantages that have resulted from the adoption of measures (which you have successfully carried into effect) to preserve peace, cultivate friendship, and promote civilization, amongst the Indian tribes on the Western frontiers; feelings of humanity, and the most solid political interests, equally encourage the continuance of this system.

We observe, with pleasure, that the delivery of the military posts, lately occupied by the British forces, within the territory of the United States, was made with cordiality and promptitude, as soon as circumstances would admit; and that the other provisions of our Treaties with Great Britain and Spain, that were objects of eventual arrangement, are about being carried into effect, with entire harmony and good faith.

The unfortunate but unavoidable difficulties that opposed a timely compliance with the terms of the Algerine Treaty, are much to be lamented; as they may occasion a temporary suspension of the advantages to be derived from a solid peace with that Power, and a perfect security from its predatory warfare; at the same time, the lively impressions that affected the public mind on the redemption of our captive fellow-citizens, afford the most laudable incentive to our exertions to remove the remaining obstacles.

We perfectly coincide with you in opinion, that the importance of our commerce demands a naval force for its protection against foreign insult and depredation, and our solicitude to attain that object will be always proportionate to its magnitude.

The necessity of accelerating the establishment of certain useful manufactures, by the intervention of the Legislative aid and protection, and the encouragement due to agriculture by the creation of Boards, (composed of intelligent individuals,) to patronise this primary pursuit of society, are subjects which will readily engage our most serious attention.

A National University may be converted to the most useful purposes; the science of legislation being so essentially dependant on the endowments of the mind, the public interests must receive effectual aid from the general diffusion of knowledge; and the United States will assume a more dignified station among the nations of the earth, by the successful cultivation of the higher branches of literature.

A Military Academy may be likewise rendered equally important. To aid and direct the physical force of the nation, by cherishing a military spirit, enforcing a proper sense of discipline, and inculcating a scientific system of tactics, is consonant to the soundest maxims of public policy. Connected with, and supported by, such an establishment, a well regulated militia, constituting the natural defence of the country, would prove the most effectual, as well as economical, preservative of peace.

We cannot but consider, with serious apprehensions, the inadequate compensations of the public officers, especially of those in the more important stations. It is not only a violation of the spirit of a public contract, but is an evil so extensive in its operation, and so destructive in its consequences, that we trust it will receive the most pointed Legislative attention.

We sincerely lament that, whilst the conduct of the United States has been uniformly impressed with the character of equity, moderation, and love of peace, in the maintenance of all their foreign relationships, our trade should be so harassed by the cruisers and agents of the Republic of France, throughout the extensive departments of the West Indies.

Whilst we are confident that no cause of complaint exists that could authorize an interruption of our tranquility or disengage that Republic from the bonds of amity, cemented by the faith of Treaties, we cannot but express our deepest regrets that official communications have been made to you, indicating a more serious disturbance of our commerce. Although we cherish the expectation that a sense of justice, and a consideration of our mutual interests, will moderate their councils, we are not unmindful of the situation in which events may place us, nor unprepared to adopt that system of conduct, which, compatible with the dignity of a respectable nation, necessity may compel us to pursue.

We cordially acquiesce in the reflection, that the United States, under the operation of the Federal Government, have experienced a most rapid aggrandizement and prosperity, as well political as commercial.

Whilst contemplating the causes that produce this auspicious result, we must acknowledge the excellence of the constitutional system, and the wisdom of the Legislative provisions; but we should be deficient in gratitude and justice, did we not attribute a great portion of these advantages to the virtue, firmness, and talents, of your Administration—which have been conspicuously displayed in the most trying times, and on the most critical occasions. It is, therefore, with the sincerest regret that we now receive an official notification of your intentions to retire from the public employments of your country.

When we review the various scenes of your public life, so long and so successfully devoted to the most arduous services, civil and military, as well during the struggles of the American Revolution, as the convulsive periods of a recent date; we cannot look forward to your retirement without our warmest affections and most anxious regards accompanying you, and without mingling with our fellow-citizens at large in the sincerest wishes for your personal happiness that sensibility and attachment can express.

The most effectual consolation that can offer for the loss we are about to sustain, arises from the animating reflection that the influence of your example will extend to your successors, and the United States thus continue to enjoy an able, upright, and energetic Administration.

JOHN ADAMS,

*Vice President of the United States, and

Ordered, That the committee who prepared the Address, wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and desire him to acquaint the Senate at what time and place it will be most convenient for him that it should be presented.

Mr. READ reported, from the committee, that they had waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and that he would receive the Address of the Senate on Monday next at 12 o'clock, at his own house. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate will, on Monday next, at 12 o'clock, wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, with his specie account for the quarters ending the 30th June and 30th of September, 1796; also, his accounts of receipts and expenditures in the War Department for the quarters ending at the same time; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to class the Senators from the State of Tennessee, in conformity to the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the Constitution requires.

Whereupon, numbers one, two, and three, were, by the Secretary, rolled up and put into the ballot box, when Mr. BLOUNT drew number two, and is accordingly of the class whose seats will become vacated on the 3d of March, 1799. Mr. COCKE drew number one, and is accordingly of the class whose seats will become vacated on the 3d of March, 1797.

MONDAY, December 12.

THEODORE FOSTER, from the State of Rhode Island; JOHN BROWN, from the State of Kentucky; and HENRY TAZEWELL, from the State of Virginia, severally attended.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Agreeably to the resolution of the 10th instant, the Senate waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and the VICE PRESIDENT, in their name, presented the Address then agreed to.

To which the PRESIDENT made the following reply:

GENTLEMEN: It affords me great satisfaction to find in your Address a concurrence in sentiment with me on the various topics which I presented for your information and deliberation; and that the latter will receive from you an attention proportioned to their respective importance.

For the notice you take of my public services, civil and military, and your kind wishes for my personal happiness, I beg you to accept my cordial thanks. Those services, and greater, had I possessed ability to render them, were due to the unanimous calls of my country, and its approbation is my abundant reward.

When contemplating the period of my retirement, I saw virtuous and enlightened men, among whom I relied on the discernment and patriotism of my fellow-citizens to make the proper choice of a successor; men who would require no influential example to insure to the United States "an able, upright, and energetic Administration." To such men I shall cheerfully yield the palm of genius and talents to serve our common country; but, at the same, I hope I may be indulged in expressing the consoling reflection, (which consciousness suggests,) and to bear it with me to my grave, that none can serve it with purer intentions than I have done, or with a more disinterested zeal.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Senate returned to their own Chamber, and then adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 13.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have proceeded to the choice of a Chaplain to Congress; on their part, and the Reverend ASHBEL GREEN is duly elected. And that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States;'" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The last mentioned bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

A motion was made that the sum of one hundred dollars each, be allowed to the principal and engrossing clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, to be paid by the Secretary, out of the money appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Senate.

And it was agreed that the motion should be referred to Messrs. TRACY, LIVERMORE, and READ, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

On motion, that a committee be appointed to take into consideration the compensations at present allowed to the officers of the Government, with a view (under existing circumstances) of making a more just and liberal provision for them, it was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States;'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. RUTHERFORD, TRACY, and BLOODWORTH, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

THURSDAY, December 15.

The Senate assembled this day, but transacted no business.

FRIDAY, December 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; which was read, as follows:

"The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respectfully report to Congress—

"That the purchases of the debt of the United States, as stated in their report of the 18th of December, 1795, amount to two millions three hundred and seven thousand six hundred and sixty-one dollars and seventy-one cents; for which there have been paid, in specie, one million six hundred and eighteen thousand nine hundred and thirty-six dollars and four cents, as will more particularly appear from the document marked A.

"That, subsequent to the said report of the 18th of December, 1795, and in pursuance of the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of Public Credit, and for the redemption of the Public Debt,' the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have caused the sum of five hundred and forty-four thousand and sixty-six dollars and fifty-four cents to be applied towards the redemption of the six per cent. stock, bearing interest, as will appear from the document marked B.

"That there is at this time in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, as their agent, the sum of sixty-seven thousand and twenty-five dollars and sixty-three cents, arising from the dividends since the first of April last, on stock heretofore purchased and redeemed, and the sum of ten thousand two hundred and seventy-four dollars and thirty-eight cents, arising from payments into the Treasury on account of debts due to the United States prior to their present Constitution; which sums, with the dividends to be made at the close of the present year, and other funds appropriated by law, will be applied on the first day of January ensuing, to a further reimbursement of the six per cent. stock, bearing a present interest, agreeably to the directions of the act in that case made and provided.

"In pursuance of the first section of the act, entitled 'An act making further provision for the support of Public Credit, and for the redemption of the Public Debt,' a loan of five hundred thousand dollars was authorized by a resolution of the Board, passed on the 28th day of December, 1795, and approved by the President of the United States; which has been obtained of the Bank of the United States.

"The measures adopted in pursuance of the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States,' passed in the last session of Congress, being in a train for execution, and not completed, will be communicated in a future report.

JOHN ADAMS

"On behalf of the Board.

"DECEMBER 16, 1796."

Mr. RUTHERFORD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States,'" reported that the bill pass without amendment; and the report was adopted. The bill was then read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 13th instant, respecting the compensations of the officers of the Government; which, being amended, Ordered, That Messrs. GOODHUE, LAURANCE, and LIVERMORE, be a committee to take into consideration the compensations at present allowed to the officers of the Government and members of the Legislature, with a view (under existing circumstances) of making a more just and liberal provision for them.

Ordered, That Messrs. TRACY, HENRY, and STOCKTON, be a committee to inquire what laws will expire before the next session of Congress, and report thereon to the Senate.

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, December 19.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have appointed a joint committee, on their part, for enrolled bills, and request the appointment of a joint committee on the part of the Senate.

Ordered, That Mr. STOCKTON be of the joint committee for enrolled bills on the part of the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 20.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated to the Senate a Letter from the Secretary for the Department of State, with a report from the Director of the Mint; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ALLOWANCES TO CLERKS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed on the 13th instant, on the motion for an extra allowance to the principal and engrossing clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, reported:

"That, on the 5th day of February, 1796, an act passed appropriating eleven thousand five hundred dollars 'for expenses of fire-wood, stationery, printing work, and all other contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, for the year 1796.' They find that the Senate directed the two doorkeepers of the Senate to be paid out of the contingent fund, for their services during the session of June, 1795; and that, at the close of the last session, the House of Representatives directed one hundred dollars each, to be paid out of the contingent fund, to two of the clerks in Mr. Beckley's office, for their extra services. There is no other instance, since the commencement of the Government, of clerks receiving allowances out of the contingent fund.

"The committee find several instances of both Houses having allowed their doorkeepers extra sums out of this fund.

"The principal clerk is allowed by law three dollars per diem, and the engrossing clerk two, during the session. This sum, the committee do not hesitate to say, ought to have been increased for the last session, especially as Mr. Beckley's clerks actually received one hundred dollars each, in addition, for the same period, and similar services.

"The laws of the United States have stated the sums, from time to time, which were thought proper to give the clerks and doorkeepers, and the sums are paid quarterly out of the Treasury; and the accounting officers of the Treasury have paid the extra sums of one hundred dollars each, to Mr. Beckley's clerks, supposing themselves authorized by the resolution of the House of Representatives.

"The words of the Constitution, on the subject of drawing money out of the Treasury, are as follows, viz:

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

"The committee are of opinion that payment for all such services as can properly be specified, and of course become objects of a law, ought to be made out of the Treasury, by virtue of a direct and specific appropriation made by law, and not otherwise; and that no appropriations ought to be made out of the contingent fund, but for such services and necessary articles of expenditure as, in their own nature, are contingent, and cannot, with any propriety, become the objects of an antecedent law.

"And although they are of opinion that it might be well to appropriate by law the sum of one hundred dollars each, to the clerks mentioned in the resolution referred to their consideration; yet, they are fully of opinion it would be improper to direct the payment of that sum out of the contingent fund.

"They, therefore, report it as their opinion that it will be improper for the Senate to adopt the resolution."

The report was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. TRACY notified the Senate that he should, to-morrow, ask permission to introduce a bill for granting to the principal and engrossing clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, each one hundred dollars, in addition to the compensation allowed by law, for extra services during the last year.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

THEODORE SEDGWICK, appointed a Senator by the State of Massachusetts, in place of CALEB STRONG, resigned, attended, produced his credentials, and the oath required by law being administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

Conformably to notice given yesterday, Mr. TRACY had permission to introduce a bill for granting an extra allowance to the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate; which bill was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

THURSDAY, December 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a Letter from the Secretary for the Department of the Treasury, accompanying statements of tonnage and imports for one year preceding the first of October, 1795; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill for granting an extra allowance to the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, was read the second time; and, being amended, it was, by unanimous consent, read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass; that it be engrossed; and that the title thereof be "An act for granting an additional allowance to the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate."

FRIDAY, December 23.

The Senate assembled, but transacted no business.

MONDAY, December 26.

Ordered, That MESSRS. BLOUNT, READ, and SEDGWICK, be a committee to report a bill giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Tennessee.

[JANUARY, 1797.]

Ordered, That Messrs. TRACY, HENRY, and BROWN, be a committee to inquire what business remained unfinished at the last session, which, in their opinion, is proper for the Senate to take into consideration at the present session.

TUESDAY, December 27.

JOHN EAGER HOWARD, appointed a Senator by the State of Maryland, in place of RICHARD POTTS, resigned, produced his credentials, and the oath required by law being administered, he took his seat in the Senate.

JOSIAH TATNALL, from the State of Georgia, attended.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

JAMES ROSS, from the State of Pennsylvania, attended.

Mr. TRACY reported, from the committee appointed to inquire what business remained unfinished at the last session, which, in their opinion, is proper for the Senate to take into consideration at the present session; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the report of the Attorney General, of the 28th April last, together with the documents therein referred to, relative to the territorial limits of the State of Georgia, &c.; and thereon to report what shall appear to them to have been the Southern boundary of the said State, from the sea Westward, at the time of the Confederation of American States; and, also, to report, by a description of boundary, what territory, lying to the Southward of the said State boundary, shall appear to belong to the United States."

It was agreed that this motion lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informs: the Senate that they had passed the bill entitled "An act for the relief of John Sears," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

THURSDAY, December 29.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of John Sears," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, ROSS, and PAINE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

On motion, permission was given to withdraw the motion postponed yesterday, in order to substitute the following:

"That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the report of the Attorney General of the 28th of April last, together with the documents therein referred to, relative to the territorial limits of the State of Georgia, &c.; and to report what shall appear to them to be the Southern and Western boundaries of the said State; and, also, to report, by a description of boundaries, what territory, if any, lying to the Southward and Westward of the said State boundaries, shall appear to belong to the United States; and what, in their opinion, it will be proper for Congress to do relative to such territory.

Ordered, That the motion be referred to Messieurs ROSS, MARSHALL, LAURANCE, HENRY, and HILLHOUSE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

FRIDAY, December 30.

A motion was made as follows:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for inflicting an adequate punishment on those who shall forge, counterfeit, or alter, the securities of the Bank of the United States; or those who shall utter such securities, knowing them to be forged, counterfeited, or altered, and on those who shall be aiding in the perpetration of either of the said crimes."

Ordered, That this motion be referred to Messieurs SEDGWICK, LIVERMORE, and ROSS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

MONDAY, January 2, 1797.

Mr. TRACY reported, from the committee appointed to inquire what laws will expire before the next session of Congress; and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. T. also notified the Senate that he should to-morrow ask permission to introduce a bill, in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

Ordered, That Messrs. TRACY, BROWN, and ROSS, be a committee to inquire whether any alteration, and if any, what alteration, in their opinion, will be necessary, in the ordinance establishing the Government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio.

TUESDAY, January 3.

Ordered, That Messrs. SEDGWICK, READ, and HENRY, be a committee to inquire whether any, and if any, what further provisions are proper to be made by law respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters.

Conformably to notice given yesterday, Mr. TRACY had permission to introduce a bill repealing the limitation to the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, which bill was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

The bill repealing the limitation to the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, READ, and SEDGWICK, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. GOODHUE notified the Senate, that he should, to-morrow, ask permission to introduce a bill to prevent the sale of prizes brought into the United States, by vessels belonging to any foreign Prince or State.

Conformably to notice given yesterday, a motion was made by Mr. GOODHUE, that he might be permitted to introduce a bill to prevent the sale of prizes brought into the United States by vessels belonging to any foreign Prince or State; and, after debate—

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

FRIDAY, January 6.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they had passed "resolutions relative to the balances found due by Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and the individual States," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to be priated.

MONDAY, January 9.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill repealing the limitation to the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

Herewith I lay before you, in confidence, reports from the Departments of State and the Treasury, by which you will see the present situation of our affairs with the Dey and Regency of Algiers.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 9, 1797.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, January 10.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill repealing the limitation to the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States; and the bill was amended accordingly, and ordered to a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

JOHN VINING, from the State of Delaware, attended.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed the 30th of December last, on the motion relative to forging, counterfeiting, and altering securities of the Bank of the United States, knowingly uttering the same, and aiding in the perpetration of those offences, reported,

"That, in their opinion, it is proper that the said resolution should be adopted by the Senate, and that a committee should be appointed to bring in a bill accordingly."

The report was read and adopted; and the committee who made the report were instructed to bring in the bill.

The bill repealing the limitation to the act in addition to "the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and to continue in force the same, was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass; that it be engrossed; and that the title thereof be "An act repealing the limitation to the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to continue the same."

Mr. BLOUNT, from the committee appointed for the purpose, reported a bill, giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Tennessee; which was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

THURSDAY, January 12.

AARON BURR, from the State of New York, and STEVENS THOMSON MASON, from the State of Virginia, attended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they had passed a bill, entitled "An act making provision for the claim of M. Poirey, as secretary and aid-de-camp to Major General Lafayette;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read and ordered to a second reading.

The bill giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Tennessee was read the second time; and, being amended, was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. PAINE notified the Senate, that he should to-morrow ask permission to introduce a bill for allowing to the District Judge of Vermont the sum of two hundred dollars, in addition to his present compensation.

FRIDAY, January 13.

The bill giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Tennessee was resumed.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed.

THURSDAY, January 26.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; which was read, as follows:

"The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respectfully report to Congress, that, in pursuance of the powers committed to them by the act, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States," passed in the last session of Congress, they have authorized sales of a part of the capital stock of the Bank of the United States, belonging to the United States, the proceeds of which have been applied to discharge certain debts according to law.

"The particulars and amount of the said sales, and the measures authorized by the Board for the execution of their trust, so far as the same have been completed, are represented in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 24th instant, and in the proceedings of the accounting officers therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted, and prayed to be received as part of this report.

"On behalf of the Board:

"JOHN ADAMS.

"January 25, 1797."

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, that, in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States," passed on the 31st day of May, 1796, and a resolution of the Board, passed on the 5th day of August last, he has caused two thousand one hundred and sixty shares of the Bank of the United States, belonging to the United States, to be sold, on a credit of sixty days, without interest, at the rate of five hundred dollars, or twenty-five per centum advance on the original capital.

The proceeds of the said sales, amounting to one million and eighty thousand dollars, have been received and placed in the Treasury of the United States, as appears by the proceedings of the accounting officers of the Treasury, herewith transmitted, showing the dates and particulars of the said sales.

As the proceeds of the said sales were destined to reimburse a part of the debt due to the Bank of the United States, it was agreed with the Bank that the moneys should be applied to the credit of the United States from the dates of the respective payments.

In addition to the proceeds of the said Bank stock, the Secretary has obtained the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, on the credit of the six per cent. stock, authorized to be constituted by the act before mentioned; and has, moreover, taken eventual measures for reimbursing the debt due to the Bank of New York.

When these measures shall have been executed and adjusted, they will be reported to the Board.

The fund of twelve hundred thousand dollars, obtained as abovementioned, has been applied to discharge the following debts due to the Bank of the United States, viz:

To the payment of the instalments due on a loan of $400,000, obtained pursuant to the act, entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes," passed on the 2d day of May, 1792	$300,000
To the payment of part of an instalment of a loan obtained pursuant to an act authorizing a loan of two millions, passed on the 18th of December, 1794	300,000
To the payment of two instalments of the subscription loan for Bank stock, due on the last days of December, 1795 and 1796	400,000
To the payment of the first instalment of the loan of $800,000, obtained pursuant to an act passed on the 21st of February, 1795	200,000

Amounting, as abovementioned, to - 1,200,000

All which is respectfully submitted, by OLIVER WOLCOTT,
Secretary of the Treasury.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 24, 1797.

Ordered, That the report, and documents accompanying it, lie on the table.

ilmington, in the State of North Carolina; and, after debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed.

Mr. LIVERMORE made report from the committee to whom was referred the bill allowing an additional compensation to the Judge of the District of Vermont; and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a letter from Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, with his account of expenditures in the War Department for the quarter ending 31st December, 1796; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Ordered, That Messrs. TAZEVELL, LANGDON, and BROWN, be a committee to examine, and report to the Senate, what number of States have ratified the amendments proposed by the two Houses of Congress to the Constitution, which amendments have not as yet been announced as forming a part of the Constitution, and report thereon to the Senate.

MONDAY, January 30.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode for examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner, of administering the oath of office to the President."

It was agreed that the motion lie until to-morrow.

Mr. GOODHUE reported from the committee to whom was referred the consideration of the compensations at present allowed to the officers of the Government and members of the Legislature, with a view, (under existing circumstances,) of making a more just and liberal provision for them; and the report was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee to whom was recommitteed the bill to punish frauds committed on the Bank of the United States, reported amendments; which were read.

Ordered, That they be printed for the use of the members.

TUESDAY, January 31.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, respecting the mode of counting the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States; whereupon,

Resolved, That Messrs. SEDGWICK, LAURANCE, and READ, be a joint committee on the part of the Senate, with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner, of administering the oath of office to the PRESIDENT.

FEBRUARY, 1797.]

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the subject of compensations to the officers of Government; and, after debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed.

Mr. TAZEVELL reported, from the committee on the subject of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which was read, as follows:

"That of the twelve amendments proposed by Congress, at their session begun and held in New York on the 4th of March, 1789, the following States ratified the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, prior to the first day of March, 1791, viz: New Jersey, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Delaware, New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island; which States, making three-fourths of the then thirteen United States, the said amendments have become a part of the Constitution.

"That the first amendment was ratified prior to the first day of March, 1791, by the following States, viz: New Jersey, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, New Hampshire, New York, and Rhode Island, and, subsequent to that period, by Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Vermont; which number not making three-fourths of the States at the period of ratification, the said amendment has not as yet become a part of the Constitution.

"That the second amendment was ratified prior to the 1st day of March, 1791, by the following States: Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Delaware, and, subsequent to that period, by Virginia and Vermont; which number not making three-fourths of the States, the said amendment has not become a part of the Constitution.

"That the amendment respecting the suability of States, which has been proposed by Congress since March, 1791, has been ratified by the following States: New York, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, Georgia, Delaware, Rhode Island, and North Carolina, as appears by authentic documents returned to Congress. The committee have strong reasons to believe that other States have ratified this latter amendment, and that the evidences of the fact have not been as yet returned to the proper Departments of the Government; wherefore, as the number returned do not amount to three-fourths of the States, the said amendment cannot, under present circumstances, be reported as forming a part of the Constitution."

Whereupon,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, That the PRESIDENT be requested to adopt some speedy and effectual means of obtaining information from the States of Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and South Carolina, whether they have ratified the amendment proposed by Congress to the Constitution concerning the suability of States; if they have, to obtain the proper evidences thereof.

Ordered, That the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

A motion was made, that a Journal, to be denominated the Secret Journal, shall be provided and kept by the Secretary of the Senate, in which shall be entered such parts of the proceedings of the Senate, in their Legislative capacity, as they shall deem proper to be kept secret; and it passed in the negative.

Mr. MARTIN laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of the State of North Carolina, enclosing the petition of I. Glasgow and others, praying Congress to extinguish the Indian titles granted to the said Glasgow & Co. by the State of North Carolina.

Ordered, That the letter and enclosures be referred to MESSRS. HILLHOUSE, HENRY, MARTIN, LAURANCE, and READ, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. MASON notified the Senate that he should, to-morrow, ask permission to introduce a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia Line, on Continental Establishment to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, and between the Little Miami and Sciota.'"

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

Whereupon, the VICE PRESIDENT addressed the two Houses of Congress, as follows:

In obedience to the Constitution and Law of the United States, and to the commands of both Houses of Congress, expressed in their resolution passed in the present session, I now declare that

JOHN ADAMS is elected President of the United States, for four years, to commence with the fourth day of March next; and that

THOMAS JEFFERSON is elected Vice President of the United States, for four years, to commence with the fourth day of March next. And may the Sovereign of the Universe, the ordainer of civil government on earth, for the preservation of liberty, justice, and peace, among men, enable both to discharge the duties of these offices conformably to the Constitution of the United States, with conscientious diligence, punctuality, and perseverance.

The VICE PRESIDENT then delivered the votes of the Electors to the Secretary of the Senate, the two Houses of Congress separated, and the Senate returned to their own Chamber, and soon after adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In consequence of the declaration made yesterday in the Chamber of the House of Representatives of the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, the record of which has just now been read from your Journal by your Secretary, I have judged it proper to give notice that, on the 4th of March next, at 12 o'clock, I propose to attend again in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, in order to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States to be taken by the President, to be administered by the Chief Justice or such other Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States as can most conveniently attend; and, in case none of those Judges can attend, by the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania, before such Senators and Representatives of the United States as may find it convenient to honor the transaction with their presence.

Ordered, That the Secretary carry an attested copy of this communication to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That Messrs. SEDGWICK, TAZEVELL, and READ, be a joint committee, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider whether any, and, if any, what, measures ought to be adopted for the further accommodation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, for the term commencing on the 4th day of March next.

Ordered, That the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the appointment of a joint committee on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have agreed to the report of the joint committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter and amend an act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,' in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and, by unanimous consent, the bill was read the second time.

Ordered, That this bill be referred to Messrs. BURR, GUNN, and HOWARD, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Ordered, That the memorial of Anthony Walton White, and the papers therein referred to, be committed to Messrs. BURR, TRACY, and ROSS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the joint committee to whom it was referred to join such committee as might be appointed by the House of Representatives to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, reported that, having further concurred with the committee appointed by the House of Representatives, that, in their opinion, the following resolution ought to be adopted by the Senate:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to give, by letter, to the Vice President elect, a notification of his election."

On motion, it was agreed to insert the PRESIDENT of the Senate instead of the Secretary; and,

On motion, it was agreed to reconsider the resolution, and to recommit the report from the joint committee.

Mr. SEDGWICK reported, from the joint committee last mentioned, that the committee on the part of the House of Representatives considered themselves discharged from their commission.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the report of the joint committee on the mode of notifying the VICE PRESIDENT elect of his election; and that a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, to confer with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, on the report of the joint committee abovementioned; and that Messrs. SEDGWICK, LAURANCE, and READ, be the managers at the conference on the part of the Senate.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

On motion, that it be

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed, and he is hereby directed, to lay before the President of the United States a copy of the Journal of yesterday, relative to the opening and counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and the declaration of the President of the Senate thereon; and, also, to present to the President of the United States a copy of the notification given by the President elect of the time, place, and manner, of qualifying to execute the duties of his office."

Ordered, That the motion lie until to-morrow for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary for the Department of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States during one year prior to the 30th day of September, 1796, in conformity to the resolution of the Senate, passed on the 10th day of February last.

The Letter and statement were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have rescinded their resolution on the report of the joint committee on the mode of notifying the VICE PRESIDENT elect of his election, and have agreed to the conference proposed by the Senate on the subject, and have appointed managers at the same on their part.

They also concur in the resolution for appointing a joint committee to consider whether any, and what, measures ought to be adopted for the further accommodation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, for the term commencing the 4th of March next; and have appointed a joint committee on their part.

FRIDAY, February 10.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, that the Secretary of the Senate wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him of the election of PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to commence with the 4th day of March next.

On motion, to insert "a committee" in place of "the Secretary," it passed in the negative. And the motion being amended, was adopted as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate lay before the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES a copy of the Journal of the 8th instant, relative to the opening and counting the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and the declaration of the PRESIDENT of the Senate consequent thereon; and, also, a copy of the notification given by the PRESIDENT elect of the time, place, and manner of qualifying to execute the duties of his office.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they agree to the report of the joint committee appointed by the two Houses to confer on a proper mode of notifying the VICE PRESIDENT elect of his election.

The House of Representatives disagree to the bill sent from the Senate for concurrence, entitled "An act for increasing the compensations allowed to the members of the Legislature and certain officers of the Government for a limited time."

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee of conference abovementioned, reported that the following resolution should be adopted by the House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That the notification of the election of the Vice President elect be made by such person and in such manner as the Senate may direct."

On motion, that it be

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate (in such manner as he shall judge most proper) to the person elected Vice President of the United States, for the term of four years, to commence 4th day of March next, information of his said election."

It passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the resolution this day agreed to by the House of Representatives, relative to the notification of the election of the VICE PRESIDENT elect, be referred to Messrs. MASON, HILLHOUSE, and SEDGWICK, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. MASON reported, from the committee last appointed; and, the report being read, was amended and adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be transmitted to THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq., of Virginia, VICE PRESIDENT elect of the United States notification of his election to that office; and that the PRESIDENT of the Senate do make out and sign a certificate in the words following:

"Be it known, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city of Philadelphia, on the second Wednesday in February, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, the undersigned Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the Electors for a President and for a Vice President; by which it appears that THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esquire, was duly elected, agreeably to the Constitution, Vice President of the United States of America.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 10th day of February, 1797."

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MONDAY, February 13.

On request, the VICE PRESIDENT was excused from further attendance in the Senate after Wednesday next.

Mr. COCKE laid before the Senate the address and remonstrance of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, requesting the interposition of Congress for the extinguishment of the Indian title to certain lands therein mentioned; which was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the committee appointed on the 31st of January last, on the Letter and enclosures from the Governor of North Carolina, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. SEDGWICK notified the Senate that he should, to-morrow, request permission to introduce a bill concerning the Circuit Courts of the United States.

Mr. TRACY reported from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of John Sears."

On the question to agree to the bill in paragraphs, it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the Senate do not concur in this bill.

TUESDAY, February 14.

Conformably to notice given yesterday, Mr. SEDGWICK was permitted to introduce a bill concerning the Circuit Courts of the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BLOODWORTH laid before the Senate the memorial and petition of I. Glasgow and others, for and by request of a large number of the holders of lands entered in the office of John Armstrong, Esq., late entry-taker of Western lands, and since ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; which was read, and Ordered, That it be referred to the committee appointed the 31st of January last on the Letter and enclosures from the Governor of North Carolina, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. SEDGWICK reported, from the joint committee appointed to consider whether any, and if any, what, measures ought to be adopted for the further accommodation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, for the term commencing the 4th day of March next; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

The bill concerning the Circuit Courts of the United States was read the second time and amended.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. SEDGWICK, LIVERMORE, and VINING, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER laid before the Senate the petition of Samuel Aborn, jun., and David Straight, of the State of Rhode Island, praying the aid of Congress in obtaining a new register for a certain schooner Polly, purchased in the West Indies, refused by the officer of the revenue on account of certain informalities in the sale of the said schooner; which petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and Receivers of Public Money;" a bill, entitled "An act repealing in part the 'Act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States,' passed the 8th day of May, 1792, and imposing certain duties on the capacity of stills of a particular description;" and a bill, entitled "An act granting a certain sum of money to the widow and children of John de Neufville, deceased;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you an official statement of the expenditure to the end of the year 1796, from the sums heretofore granted to defray the contingent charges of the Government.
G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 15, 1797.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bills last brought from the House of Representatives for concurrence were read.

Ordered, That they severally pass to the second reading; and it was agreed, by unanimous consent, that the bill, entitled "An act granting a certain sum of money to the widow and children of John de Neufville, deceased," be now read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. TRACY, LANGDON, and TAZEVELL, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that the bill, entitled "An act repealing in part the 'Act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States,' passed the 8th of May, 1792, and imposing certain duties on the capacity of stills of a particular description," be now read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. SEDGWICK, ROSS, and MARSHALL, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

After the consideration of the Executive business, a motion was made that the Senate now adjourn; when the VICE PRESIDENT addressed them as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

If, in the general apprehension of an intention to retire in that most eminent citizen, to whom all eyes had been directed, and all hearts attracted, as the centre of our Union, for so long a period, the public opinion had exhibited any clear indication of another, in whom our fellow-citizens could have generally united, as soon as I read that excellent Address, which announced the necessity of deliberation in the choice of a President, I should have imitated the example of a character with which I have co-operated, though in less conspicuous and important stations, and maintained an uninterrupted friendship, for two and twenty years. But, as a number of characters appeared to stand in the general estimation so nearly on a level, as to render it difficult to conjecture on which the majority would fall; considering the relation in which I stood to the people of America, I thought it most respectful to them, and most conducive to the tranquility of the public mind, to resign myself, with others, a silent spectator of the general deliberation, and a passive subject of public discussions.

Deeply penetrated with gratitude to my countrymen in general, for their long continued kindness to me, and for that steady and affecting confidence, with which those who have most intimately known me, from early life, have, on so many great occasions, intrusted to me the care of their dearest interests; since a majority of their Electors, though a very small one, have declared in my favor, and since, in a Republican Government, the majority, though ever so small, must of necessity decide, I have determined, at every hazard of a high but just responsibility, though with much anxiety and diffidence, once more to engage in their service. Their confidence, which has been the chief consolation of my life, is too precious and sacred a deposit ever to be considered lightly: as it has been founded only on the qualities of the heart, it never has been, it never can be, deceived, betrayed, or forfeited by me.

It is with reluctance, and with all those emotions of gratitude and affection, which a long experience of your goodness ought to inspire, that I now retire from my seat in this House, and take my leave of the members of the Senate.

I ought not to declare, for the last time, your adjournment, before I have presented to every Senator present, and to every citizen who has ever been a Senator of the United States, my thanks, for the candor and favor invariably received from them all. It is a recollection of which nothing can ever deprive me, and it will be a source of comfort to me, through the remainder of my life, that as, on the one hand, in a Government constituted like ours, I have for eight years held the second situation under the Constitution of the United States, in perfect and uninterrupted harmony with the first, without envy in one, or jealousy in the other; so, on the other hand, I have never had the smallest misunderstanding with any member of the Senate. In all the abstruse questions, difficult conjunctures, dangerous emergencies, and animated debates, upon the great interests of our country, which have so often and so deeply impressed all our minds, and interested the strongest feelings of the heart, I have experienced a uniform politeness and respect from every quarter of the House.

When questions of no less importance than difficulty have produced a difference of sentiment, (and difference of opinion will always be found in free assemblies of men, and probably the greatest diversities upon the greatest questions,) when the Senators have been equally divided, and my opinion has been demanded according to the Constitution, I have constantly found, in that moiety of the Senators from whose judgment I have been obliged to dissent, a disposition to allow me the same freedom of deliberation, and independence of judgment, which they asserted for themselves.

Within these walls, for a course of years, I have been an admiring witness of a succession of information, eloquence, patriotism, and independence, which, as they would have done honor to any Senate in any age, afford a consolatory hope, (if the Legislatures of the States are equally careful in their future selections, which there is no reason to distrust,) that no council more permanent than this, as a branch of the Legislature, will be necessary, to defend the rights, liberties, and properties of the people, and to protect the Constitution of the United States, as well as the Constitutions and rights of the individual States, against errors of judgment, irregularities of the passions, or other encroachments of human infirmity, or more reprehensible enterprise, in the Executive on one hand, or the more immediate representatives of the people on the other.

These considerations will all conspire to animate me in my future course, with a confident reliance, that, as far as my conduct shall be uniformly measured by the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully directed to the public good, I shall be supported by the Senate, as well as by the House of Representatives, and the people at large; and on no other conditions ought any support at all to be expected or desired.

With cordial wishes for your honor, health, and happiness, and fervent prayers for a continuation of the virtues, liberties, prosperity, and peace, of our beloved country, I avail myself of your leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

THURSDAY, February 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a PRESIDENT pro-tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the honorable WILLIAM BINGHAM was duly elected.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him of the election of the honorable WILLIAM BINGHAM, to be PRESIDENT of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives of this election.

On motion,

Ordered, That Messrs. SEDGWICK, BURR, and TRACY, be a committee to prepare and report the draught of an answer to the Address delivered yesterday to the Senate, by the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and Receivers of Public Money," was read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. READ, LANGDON, and ROSS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. BURR reported, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to alter and amend an act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,'" that the bill pass without amendment.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Illinois and Wabash Land Company; which is—

That it will be expedient to adopt the report of the committee of the Senate of the United States, made upon the memorial of this Company on the 26th of March, 1792, as follows:

"That the claims of the petitioners are founded on two deeds mentioned in the said petition; one of which to William Murray and others, who are called the Illinois Company, is dated July 5th, 1773, and the other to Lord Dunmore and others, who are styled the Wabash Company, bears date October 18th, 1775.

"That the said petitioners have proposed to surrender and convey to the United States all the lands described, or meant to be described, in the above mentioned deeds from the Indians, on the proviso, that the United States reconvey to the Company one fourth part of the said lands.

"That, in the opinion of the committee, deeds obtained by private persons from the Indians, without any antecedent authority or subsequent confirmation from the Government, could not vest in the grantees mentioned in such deeds a title to the lands therein described.

"That the petitioners do not suggest any such antecedent authority or subsequent confirmation in the present case; and, therefore, in the opinion of the committee, the said petitioners have not a legal title to the said lands.

"That the proceeds of the sales of lands in the Western Territory, belonging to the United States, are appropriated towards discharging the debts, for the payment whereof the United States are holden.

"The petitioners allege, that the consideration specified in the said deeds were paid to the Indians, and were, at least, as valuable as any that were given on similar occasions, and that the Indians, named in the said deeds, were owners of the land.

"On these points, the committee give no opinion; but for the reasons above expressed, they think it would not be expedient for the Government of the United States to accede to the aforementioned proposition of the petitioners."

Whereupon, Resolved, That the report be adopted.

On motion, to reconsider this resolution, for the purpose of reading a petition on the subject, it passed in the negative.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the joint committee of the 14th instant, on the measures for the further accommodation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, for the term commencing the 4th of March, 1797; which is as follows:

"That the committee have unanimously agreed to the following resolution as proper to be adopted, and that a bill be brought in accordingly, viz:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be sold, such parts of the furniture and equipage belonging to his household, as may be decayed and out of repair, and that the sum of fourteen thousand dollars, together with the proceeds of such sales, be appropriated for the accommodation of the household of the President of the United States, and to be laid out at his discretion and agreeably to his direction."

On motion, it was agreed to amend the report by inserting these words after "States," in the first instance, viz: "after the third day of March."

On motion, it was further agreed to amend the report by leaving a blank for the sum to be appropriated.

Ordered, That the report be adopted as amended, and that the committee who made it be instructed to bring in a bill accordingly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the "Resolutions relative to the balances found due by Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and the individual States."

Ordered, That this message lie for consideration.

FRIDAY, February 17.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to alter and amend an act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,' which was adopted; and,

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading. Agreeably to the instruction given yesterday, Mr. SEDGWICK reported, from the committee, a bill to accommodate the PRESIDENT; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate, and insisting on their "resolutions relative to the balances found due by Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and the individual States."

On motion, that the Senate recede from their amendment, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Blount, Brown, Cocke, Gunn, Henry, Howard, Hunter, Langdon, Marshall, Mason, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Burr, Foster, Goodhue, Hillhouse, Laurance, Livermore, Martin, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Sedgwick, Stockton, Tichenor, Tracy, and Vining.

So it was Resolved, That the Senate insist on their said amendment, ask a conference thereon, and that Messrs. Ross and STOCKTON be the managers at the same on the part of the Senate.

MONDAY, February 20.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the proposed conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the "resolutions relative to the balances found due by the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and the individual States;" and have appointed managers at the same on their part.

They have passed a bill, entitled "An act repealing so much of an act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act to provide a Naval Armament,' as relates to the officering and manning the frigates building in the United States; and appropriating money for the purpose of finishing the frigates United States, Constitution, and Constellation;" the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels;' and to an act, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same;" and the bill, entitled "An act allowing a drawback upon domestic distilled spirits, exported in vessels of less than thirty tons by the Mississippi; in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were severally read, and by unanimous consent these bills were now severally read the second time.

Ordered, That they be referred to Messrs. GOODHUE, LANGDON, and BRADFORD, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill to accommodate the PRESIDENT was read the second time and amended.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

Mr. READ, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States,'" reported sundry amendments, which were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to alter and amend an act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,'" was read the third time.

On motion to strike out the following words from the first section, viz: "and that all such parts of the said act which relate to the light dragoons, it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Goodhue, Hillhouse, Latimer, Laurance, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Sedgwick, Stockton, Tichenor, Tracy, and Vining.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Blount, Bradford, Burr, Brown, Cocke, Foster, Gunn, Henry, Howard, Hunter, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Mason, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate communicated a Letter from the Secretary for the Department of War, accompanying a list of invalid pension applicants; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, February 21.

The bill to accommodate the PRESIDENT was read the third time; and, being further amended,

On motion that it be Resolved, That this bill pass, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bloodworth, Blount, Bradford, Brown, Foster, Goodhue, Gunn, Henry, Hillhouse, Howard, Langdon, Latimer, Laurance, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Sedgwick, Stockton, Tattnall, Tazewell, Tichenor, Tracy, and Vining.

NAYS.—Messrs. Cocke, Hunter, and Mason.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass; that it be engrossed; and that the title thereof be, "An act to accommodate the PRESIDENT."

Mr. SEDGWICK reported, from the committee appointed for the purpose, the draught of an answer to the Address of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, on his retiring from the Senate; which was read.

On motion, that it be printed for the use of the Senate, it was disagreed to.

Ordered, That the report lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. MASON had permission to introduce a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia Line on Continental Establishment to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Sciota;'" which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee, in answer to the Address of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, on his retiring from the Senate.

On motion to recommit the report, it passed in the negative: and the report being amended, was adopted, as follows:

SIR: The Senate of the United States would be unjust to their own feelings, and deficient in the performance of a duty their relation to the Government of their country imposes, should they fail to express their regard for your person, and their respect for your character, in answer to the Address you presented to them, on your leaving a station which you have so long and so honorably filled as their President.

The motives you have been pleased to disclose which induced you not to withdraw from the public service, at a time when your experience, talents, and virtues, were peculiarly desirable, are as honorable for yourself, as, from our confidence in you, sir, we trust the result will be beneficial to our beloved country.

When you retired from your dignified seat in this House, and took your leave of the members of the Senate, we felt all those emotions of gratitude and affection, which our knowledge and experience of your abilities and undeviating impartiality ought to inspire; and we should, with painful reluctance, endure the separation, but for the consoling reflection, that the same qualities which have rendered you useful, as the President of this branch of the Legislature, will enable you to be still more so, in the exalted station to which you have been called.

From you, sir, in whom your country have for a long period placed a steady confidence, which has never been betrayed or forfeited, and to whom they have on so many occasions intrusted the care of their dearest interests, which have never been abused; from you, who, holding the second situation under the Constitution of the United States, have lived in uninterrupted harmony with him who has held the first; from you we receive, with much satisfaction, the declaration which you are pleased to make of the opinion you entertain of the character of the present Senators, and of that of those citizens who have been heretofore Senators. This declaration, were other motives wanting, would afford them an incentive to a virtuous perseverance, in that line of conduct which has been honored with your approbation.

In your future course, we entertain no doubt that your official conduct will be measured by the Constitution, and directed to the public good; you have, therefore, a right to entertain a confident reliance, that you will be supported, as well by the people at large, as by their constituted authorities.

We cordially reciprocate the wishes which you express for our honor, health, and happiness; we join with yours our fervent prayers for the continuation of the virtues and liberties of our fellow-citizens, for the public prosperity and peace; and for you we implore the best reward of virtuous deeds—the grateful approbation of your constituents, and the smiles of Heaven.

WILLIAM BINGHAM,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the committee who draughted the Address wait on the VICE PRESIDENT with the Answer of the Senate.

A message from the House informed the Senate that the House agree to the bill, sent from the Senate for concurrence, entitled "An act repealing the limitation to the act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to continue in force the same," with amendments, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Also, that they had passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act making an appropriation to satisfy certain demands attending the late insurrection, and to increase the compensation of jurors and witnesses in the Courts of the United States;'" the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven;" the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to apply a further sum to the expense of negotiations with the Dey and Regency of Algiers;" the bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue the act passed the thirtieth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled 'An act to regulate the compensation of clerks;'" and the bill entitled "An act to augment the compensation of the Attorney General of the United States;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last brought from the House of Representatives for concurrence were read.

Ordered, That they severally pass to the second reading.

Mr. SEDGWICK reported, from the committee, that, agreeably to order, they had waited on the VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with the answer to his Address, on retiring from the Senate—to which the VICE PRESIDENT was pleased to make the following Reply:

An Address so respectful and affectionate as this, from gentlemen of such experience and established character in public affairs, high stations in the Government of their country, and great consideration, in their several States, as Senators of the United States, will do me great honor, and afford me a firm support, wherever it shall be known, both at home and abroad. Their generous approbation of my conduct, in general, and liberal testimony to the undeviating impartiality of it, in my peculiar relation to their body, a character which, in every scene and employment of life, I should wish above all others to cultivate and merit, has a tendency to soften asperities, and conciliate animosities, wherever such may unhappily exist; an effect at all times to be desired, and, in the present situation of our country, ardently to be promoted by all good citizens.

I pray the Senate to accept my sincere thanks.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, was read the second time, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act authorizing an expenditure, and making an appropriation, for the prosecution of the claims of certain citizens of the United States, for property captured by the belligerent Powers," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. GOODHUE, LAURANCE, and TAZEWEILL, to consider and report to the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday, respecting the time of the next meeting of Congress.

Ordered, That Messrs. MARSHALL, BLOODWORTH, and LIVERMORE, be a committee to report a bill on the subject.

Mr. MARSHALL, from the committee last mentioned, reported a bill to alter the time of the next meeting of Congress; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the conferees, on "the resolutions relative to the balances found due by Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and the individual States."

On motion that the Senate recede from their amendment to the said resolutions, it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Brown, Foster, Gunn, Henry, Hillhouse, Langdon, Marshall, Mason, Ruthersford, Stockton, Tattnell, Tazewell, and Tichenor.

NAYS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Blount, Bradford, Burr, Cocke, Goodhue, Howard, Latimer, Laurance, Livermore, Martin, Paine, Read, Ross, Sedgwick, and Vining.

Resolved, That the Senate adhere to their amendment to the said resolutions.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to suspend in part the act, entitled 'An act to alter and amend the act, entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,' and to grant relief in certain cases arising under the said act,'" was read the second time, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act repealing in part, the act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, passed the 8th of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two; and imposing certain duties on the capacity of stills of a particular description," was read the third time; and sundry amendments agreed to yesterday having been reconsidered,

On motion, to add the following section to the bill:

"And be it further enacted, That, from and after the — day of —, no drawback shall be allowed on the exportation of any spirits distilled within the United States, from articles the growth thereof, any law to the contrary notwithstanding"—

it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to one, and agree to the other amendment of the Senate, to the bill entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act making an appropriation to satisfy certain demands attending the late insurrection, and to increase the compensation of jurors and witnesses in the Courts of the United States.'"

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives, for concurrence, entitled "An act to revive and continue the act passed the thirtieth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled 'An act to regulate the compensation of clerks,' together with an instruction to consider the expediency of inserting a clause therein for the allowance of one hundred dollars each, to the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, in lieu of the provision made by the Senate, reported, that, in their opinion, the said bill should pass without amendment; and, that it would be inexpedient to insert a clause of the same import with the bill heretofore sent to the House of Representatives, and still depending before them; which report was read and adopted.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act authorizing an expenditure, and making an appropriation for the prosecution of the claims of certain citizens of the United States, for property captured by the belligerent Powers," reported, that the bill pass without amendment.

Glasgow and others, relative to the lands entered in the office of John Armstrong, Esq., and since ceded to the United States, made a report, which was read.

SENATE.]

Proceedings.

[MARCH, 1797.]

Ordered, That the report be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ROSS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes, and his associates,'" made a report; which was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

Mr. TAZEWELL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to apply a further sum to the expense of negotiations with the Dey and Regency of Algiers," reported that the bill pass without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to some, and disagree to other amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post-Roads within the United States.'"

They have passed a bill, entitled "An act directing the Secretary of War to place certain persons on the pension list;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES having stated his objections to the bill, entitled "An act to alter and amend an act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,'" the House of Representatives proceeded to consider the objections to the said bill, and have resolved that it do not pass.

The objections of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES are as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

Having maturely considered the bill to alter and amend an act, entitled "An act to ascertain and fix the Military establishment of the United States," which was presented to me on the twenty-second day of this month, I now return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with my objections.

First. If the bill passes into a law, the two companies of light dragoons will be, from that moment, legally out of service, though they will afterwards continue actually in service; and, for their services during this interval, namely, from the time of legal, to the time of actual discharge, it will not be lawful to pay them, unless some future provision be made by law. Though they may be discharged at the pleasure of Congress, in justice they ought to receive their pay, not only to the time of passing the law, but, at least, to the time of their actual discharge.

Secondly. It will be inconvenient and injurious to the public, to dismiss the light dragoons as soon as notice of the law can be conveyed to them—one of the companies having been lately destined to a necessary and important service.

Thirdly. The companies of light dragoons consist of one hundred and twenty-six non-commissioned officers and privates, who are bound to serve as dismounted dragoons, when ordered so to do. They have received in bounties, about two thousand dollars; one of them is completely equipped, and above half of the non-commissioned officers and privates have yet to serve more than one-third of the term of their enlistment; and, besides, there will, in the course of the year, be a considerable deficiency in the complement of infantry intended to be continued. Under these circumstances, to discharge the dragoons, does not seem to comport with economy.

Fourthly. It is generally agreed, that some cavalry, either militia or regular, will be necessary; and, according to the best information I have been able to obtain, it is my opinion, that the latter will be less expensive, and more useful than the former, in preserving peace between the frontier settlers and the Indians; and, therefore, a part of the Military Establishment should consist of cavalry.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 28, 1797.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill, entitled "An act, in addition to the act, entitled 'An act-making an appropriation to satisfy certain demands attending the late insurrection, and to increase the compensation of jurors and witnesses in the Courts of the United States.'"

On motion, it was agreed to refer the further consideration of this bill to the next session of Congress.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have unanimously agreed to an amendment to the enrolled bill, entitled "An act relative to the compensations and duties of certain officers employed in the collection of impost and tonnage," by inserting "March, instant," instead of "March next," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

They agree to one, and disagree to another amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act repealing in part the act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, passed the eighth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and imposing certain duties on the capacity of stills of a particular description."

They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend and repeal, in part, the act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States.'"

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives to the last mentioned enrolled bill; and

Resolved, That they do concur therein.

The bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress was read the second time.

On the question to agree to the third reading, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Blount, Brown, Cocke, Foster, Henry, Langdon, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Paine, Tattnall, Tazewell, Tichenor, Tracy, and Vining.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Burr, Goodhue, Gunn, Hillhouse, Howard, Latimer, Laurance, Mason, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Sedgwick, and Stockton.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass to the third reading.

MARCH, 1797.]

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

The bill to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, was read the third time.

On the question to agree to this bill, there were—yeas 15, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Foster, Goodhue, Latimer, Laurance, Marshall, Paine, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Sedgwick, Stockton, Tichenor, Tracy, and Vining.

NAYS—Messrs. Bloodworth, Blount, Bradford, Brown, Burr, Cocke, Gunn, Henry, Howard, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Mason, Tattnall, and Tazewell.

So the bill was lost.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act to suspend in part the act, entitled ‘An act to alter and amend the act, entitled ‘An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,’ and to grant relief in certain cases, arising under the said act,” was read the third time and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the “Resolutions relative to the balances found due by Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and the individual States.”

They have passed a bill, entitled “An act providing for certain buoys to be placed in and near the harbor of Boston;” a bill, entitled “An act extending the time for receiving on loan the Domestic Debt of the United States;” and a bill, entitled “An act for the remission of the duties of tonnage on the vessels of James O’Brien and James Aylward;” in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last mentioned were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the committee to the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and the Receivers of Public Money;” and, having agreed to amend the bill, Ordered, That it pass to the third reading.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act providing for certain buoys to be placed in and near the harbor of Boston,” be now read the second time.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act directing the Secretary of War to place certain persons on the pension list,” was read, and it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that the bill be now read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. TRACY, TAZEVELL, and HOWARD, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act to amend and repeal, in part, the act, entitled ‘An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,” was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act to authorize the receipt of evidences of Public Debt in payment for the lands of the United States,” was read the third time, and passed.

THURSDAY, March 2.

Mr. Ross reported, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Attorney General, of the 28th of April last, relative to the territorial limits of the State of Georgia; which report was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The petition of Putnam Catlin and others, in behalf of the inhabitants of Luzerne county, in the State of Pennsylvania, was read, praying the interposition of Congress to enable them to have an impartial trial of their titles to certain lands therein referred to; which petition was read.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions of the House of Representatives, agreeing to some, and disagreeing to other amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled “An act in addition to the act, entitled ‘An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States.’”

Resolved, That they do agree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to their fifth and seventeenth amendments; and that they insist on all their other amendments to the said bill.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled “An act in addition to the act, entitled ‘An act for the relief and protection of American seamen,” in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act to amend and repeal, in part, the act, entitled ‘An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,” was read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. ROSS, HOWARD, and LAURANCE, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act in addition to the act, entitled ‘An act authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates,” which report was, that the bill do not pass; and it was adopted.

On the question to agree to the third reading of the bill, it passed in the negative, and the bill was lost.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled “An act authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to apply a further sum to the expense of negotiations with the Dey and Regency of Algiers,” was read the third time.

amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States.'"

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven," was read.

On motion, to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the second time, by unanimous consent, it was objected to.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a second reading.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act directing the Secretary of War to place certain persons on the pension list," reported—"That they have had the subject under consideration, and they find many applicants, whose merits appear in a favorable point of light, are not on the list now presented in the act passed by the House of Representatives, and that the papers attending the applications, both of those admitted and those rejected, are very numerous. Under these circumstances, the committee find it absolutely impossible to do justice to the applicants in the short time now left of the present session. They therefore are of opinion that the bill should be postponed till the next session of Congress, and recommend the following resolution to be adopted by the Senate, viz:

"Resolved, That all such persons as shall eventually be placed on the pension list, pursuant to the act passed the twenty-eighth February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, shall take their pensions for the whole time which shall have elapsed from the completion of their testimony, agreeably to the act passed on the twenty-eighth February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five."

The report was read and adopted.

Resolved, That the further consideration of the bill therein mentioned be postponed until the next session of Congress.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to amend and repeal, in part, the act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,'" was read the third time.

On motion to introduce a clause making provision for the establishment of a Major General, it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. TRACY reported from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act extending the time for receiving on loan the Domestic Debt of the United States," and, by unanimous consent, the bill was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Mr. ROSS, from the committee to whom was referred the petition and memorial of Peyton Short and George Turner, reported a bill to authorize the sale of the lands between the Great and Little Miami rivers, in the Western Territory of the United States, and giving a pre-emption of the same to certain purchasers and settlers; which was read, and, by unanimous consent, the bill was read the second time.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion made yesterday by Mr. PAINE, requiring the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury to report those persons entitled to compensation for services and expenses occasioned by the prosecution and trial of persons for crimes and offences during the late insurrection; which motion being amended, was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to report to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, all such persons as in his opinion are justly entitled to compensation, and also the sums to which they may severally be entitled, for necessary services and expenses which may have been occasioned by the prosecution and trial of persons for crimes and offences during the late insurrection, for which adequate provision has not already been made by law.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, adhering to their disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act repealing, in part, the act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States," passed the eighth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and imposing certain duties on the capacity of stills of a particular description. Whereupon—

Resolved, That the Senate do recede from their said amendments.

Mr. RUTHERFORD reported from the committee to whom was referred the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia Line on Continental Establishment to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Sciota,'" and the bill being accordingly amended, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass; that it be engrossed; and that the title thereof be, "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on Continental Establishment to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Sciota.'"

On motion to expunge the thirteenth rule for conducting business in the Senate, which is in the following words:

"Every bill shall receive three readings previous to its being passed; and the President shall give notice at each, whether it be the first, second, or third; which readings shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise"— it passed in the negative.

On motion to suspend this rule during the session, it passed in the negative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment, to

They agree to some, with amendments, and disagree to other, amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and Receivers of Public Money;"

They have passed a "Resolution for the distribution of an edition of the laws of the United States," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

On motion, it was agreed by unanimous consent to dispense with the rule, and that the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven," be now read the second time."

Ordered, That this bill be referred to Messrs. TAZEWELL, TRACY, and HENRY, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend and repeal, in part, the act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States.'"

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act for the relief and protection of American seamen,'" was read the second time.

Resolved, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the next session of Congress.

On motion, it was agreed by unanimous consent to dispense with the rule, and that the bill to authorize the sale of the lands between the Great and Little Miami rivers, in the Western Territory of the United States, and giving a pre-emption of the same to certain purchasers and settlers, be now read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass; that it be engrossed; and that the title thereof be, "An act to authorize the sale of the lands between the Great and Little Miami rivers, in the Western Territory of the United States, and giving a pre-emption of the same to certain purchasers and settlers."

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue the act passed the thirtieth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled 'An act to regulate the compensation of clerks.'"

Resolved, That they do agree to the said amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the "Resolution for the distribution of an edition of the laws of the United States," sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the resolution by inserting in the 23d line, after the word "Marshals," the words "and Attorneys;" and in the 30th line, before the word "and," to insert the words, "and to the Postmaster General."

Resolved, That this resolution pass with the amendments.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, agreeing to some, with amendments, and disagreeing to other, amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and Receivers of Public Money."

Resolved, That they do recede from their amendments disagreed to, and agree to the amendments to their amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven," reported amendments.

On motion to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the third time, a motion was made, as follows:

"Whereas, by the Constitution of the United States, all Legislative powers are vested in a Congress, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, with a qualified negative vested in the President of the United States:

"And whereas it is expedient, to the due exercise of their powers of legislation, that a reasonable time, and an opportunity for deliberate discussion, should be afforded to each branch of the Legislature, as also time for consideration allowed to the President of the United States:

"And whereas the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States has been kept back till the last day on which the present Congress can sit; whereby the Senate is, in effect, deprived of the power and opportunity of a deliberate investigation of the large appropriations made by the said act, and are called upon, in violation of the known rules of their proceedings, to pass an important act almost instantaneously, and without the possibility of the several members of the Senate even reading over, much less for a full and deliberate investigation of, a bill of the greatest importance, or, by a rejection of the said bill, to throw the public business into great confusion: therefore—

Resolved, That the withholding bills of so great importance till so late a period has in fact a tendency to infringe, if not totally to defeat, the Legislative power and check vested by the Constitution in the Senate of the United States.

Resolved, That three readings in one day of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven," shall not be drawn into precedent hereafter.

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States will not hereafter originate any bill for appropriating moneys for the support of Government, or of the Military and Naval Departments, nor any law of general importance to the public, at any time after ten days (Sundays excluded) before the day on which the second session of any Congress of the United States will expire under the Constitution; nor will the Senate receive and act upon any such bills, if originated in the House of Representatives of the United States at a day later than is herein before prescribed; nor will the Senate receive any other bill at a later day, in any session of Congress, than will allow three days (exclusive of Sundays) for the due and deliberate reading and discussion of such bills.

On which, a motion was made that the consideration of this motion be postponed to the next session of Congress; and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Blount, Bradford, Cocke, Foster, Goodhue, Gunn, Hillhouse, Howard, Langdon, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Mason, Paine, Tattnall, Tazewell, and Tichenor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Latimer, Laurance, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Sedgwick, and Stockton.

Resolved, That the bill last mentioned pass with amendments.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have postponed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on Continental Establishment to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Sciota;'" and the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the sale of the lands between the Great and Little Miami rivers, in the Western Territory of the United States, and giving a preemption of the same to certain purchasers and settlers"—until the first Monday of December next.

They have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Brown," and a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the adjustment and payment at the Treasury of the expenses of George Smith and John Robertson, for their ransom from captivity at Algiers;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

They have passed the bill sent from the Senate for concurrence, entitled "An act concerning the Circuit Courts of the United States," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

They concur in the bill sent from the Senate for concurrence, entitled "An act to alter the time of the next meeting of Congress."

They agree to the amendments of the Senate to the "Resolution for the distribution of an edition of the laws of the United States."

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Circuit Courts of the United States;" and

Resolved, That they do concur therein.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of John Brown," was read; and it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BRADFORD, GOODHUE, and HENRY, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to authorize the adjustment and payment, at the Treasury, of the expenses of George Smith and John Robertson, for their ransom from captivity at Algiers," was read; and it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to the committee last named to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate adjourned to six o'clock in the evening.

FRIDAY EVENING, March 3.

Mr. BRADFORD, from the committee to whom was referred the two bills last mentioned, reported that they severally pass without amendment; and, by unanimous consent, these bills were severally read the third time.

Resolved, That the Senate concur in these bills respectively.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the letter and enclosures from the Governor of North Carolina, relative to the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands granted to I. Glasgow and Co. by the State of North Carolina; the address of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, on the same subject; and, also, the petition of I. Glasgow and others, relative to lands entered in the office of John Armstrong, Esq., and since ceded to the United States; which report is as follows:

"That the State of North Carolina did, by a law passed on the 2d day of May, 1778, declare the Western boundary or line of said State, comprehending all the lands then claimed to have been ceded by the Indians or conquered from them, which line did not extend so far westwardly, or into the Indian country, as the present boundary line between the United States and the Indian tribes; declaring all past entries or surveys to be void, and prohibiting all future entries or surveys over and beyond said line, which was also recognised by a law passed the 13th of September, 1780. On the 17th of May, 1783, said State passed a law declaring it expedient to extend the Western boundary of said State, and that the same was, in and by said law, extended to the Mississippi, including the lands in question, and opening a land office for entering and surveying the same, for the discharge of certain debts of said State, contracted during the late war; excepting, from such entry and survey, certain tracts described in said act, and declared to be reserved for the Indians and other special purposes. The entries and surveys which have been made by the claimants on the lands in question, were under said act, and an act of the 2d of June, 1784; but it does not appear that the Indian title to said lands has ever been extinguished. The Treaty of Hopewell, between the United States and the Cherokee tribe of Indians, made on the 28th of November, 1785, established a line between the United States and said tribe, excluded a large portion of the lands which are claimed to have been entered and surveyed under said acts; at which Treaty, the agent of North Carolina attended, and entered his protest against it, as intrenching upon the rights of that State; this Treaty was, however, agreed to, and ratified by the United States and said tribe, on the 21st of November, 1789. North Carolina acceded to the present Constitution of the United States, and, on the 22d of December following, passed an act ceding to the United States all her claim to territory lying west of a certain line, and including all the said lands; in which cession it is, among other things, made a condition "that all entries made by, or grants made to, all and every person or persons whatsoever, agreeable to law, and within the limits thereby intended to be ceded to the United States, should have the same force and effect as if such cession had not been made; and that all and every right of occupancy and pre-emption, and every other right, reserved by any act or acts to persons settled on and occupying lands within the limits of the lands hereby intended to be ceded as aforesaid, shall continue to be in full force, in the same manner as if the cession had not been made, and as conditions upon which the said lands are ceded to the United States, which cession was, by an act of Congress of the 2d of April, 1790, accepted. On the 2d of July, 1791, the Treaty of Holston was made with the said Cherokee tribe of Indians, in which the present boundary line between the United States and the said Indian tribe was established, and all the lands lying beyond the said line secured thereby to the said tribe. It appears to the committee, that whatever right the claimants have can be no other than a pre-emptive right to said land, and only such of them as by conforming to the laws of the State of North Carolina, so as to have secured to themselves a title under such laws, and cannot claim of the United States anything more than a confirmation of that title; and therefore recommend the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That as soon as the Indian title to the said lands shall be extinguished, under the authority of the United States, by purchase or otherwise, provision ought, by law, to be made to secure to such of the said claimants, as, by conforming to the laws of North Carolina, have secured to themselves a title to the right of pre-emption under such laws, the occupancy and possession of such lands.

"Resolved, That provision ought, by law, to be made for opening a land office, for the sale of lands lying within the limits of the State of Tennessee, belonging to the United States, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, providing that the occupants shall have a priority in the location of such of the said lands as now are in their actual possession and improvement, upon such reasonable terms as may be fixed by law."

Ordered, That the further consideration of this report be postponed to the next session of Congress.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the first, and disagree to the second, amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven."

Resolved, That the Senate recede from their amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWARD reported, from the committee to whom was recommitteed the bill respecting the appointment of an health officer and harbor master for the port of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina.

Ordered, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed to the next session of Congress.

On motion, that it be

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Attorney General of the United States be directed to institute and prosecute such suit or suits, in law or equity, as, in his judgment, may be proper, to recover and obtain of John Cleves Symmes, and his associates, payment for the surplus lands contained in the grant made to him by the United States, or to vacate the said grant for so much land as the said grant has been improperly obtained for."

Ordered, That the consideration of this motion be postponed.

Ordered, That Messrs. STOCKTON and SEDGWICK be a joint committee, on the part of the Senate, with such as the House of Representatives may appoint on their part, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that, unless he hath any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a joint committee on their part, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him, that, unless he hath any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

Mr. SEDGWICK reported, from the joint committee last mentioned, that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES hath no further communication to make, except his wishes for the health and happiness of the members of the two Houses of Congress respectively. Whereupon,

The Senate adjourned without day.

SPECIAL SESSION.

SATURDAY, March 4.

To the Vice President and Senators of the United States, respectively:

SIR: It appearing to me proper that the Senate of the United States should be convened on Saturday, the fourth of March instant, you are desired to attend in the Chamber of the Senate, on that day, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to receive any communications which the President of the United States may then lay before you, touching their interests.

G. WASHINGTON.

MARCH 1, 1797.

In conformity with the summons from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, above recited, the Senate accordingly assembled in their Chamber.

PRESENT:

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

JOHN LANGDON and SAMUEL LIVERMORE, from New Hampshire;

THEODORE SEDGWICK and BENJAMIN GOODHUE, from Massachusetts;

THEODORE FOSTER, from Rhode Island;

Mr. BINGHAM administered the oath of office to the VICE PRESIDENT, who took the Chair, and the credentials of the following members were read :

Of Mr. FOSTER, Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. HILLHOUSE,
 Mr. HOWARD, Mr. LATIMER, Mr. MASON, Mr.
 ROSS, and Mr. TICHENOR.

And the oath of office being severally administered to them by the VICE PRESIDENT, they took their seats in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT then addressed the Senate
 as follows :

Gentlemen of the Senate :

Entering on the duties of the office to which I am called, I feel it incumbent on me to apologize to this honorable House for the insufficient manner in which I fear they may be discharged. At an earlier period of my life, and through some considerable portion of it, I have been a member of Legislative bodies, and not altogether inattentive to the forms of their proceedings ; but much time has elapsed since that ; other duties have occupied my mind, and, in a great degree, it has lost its familiarity with this subject. I fear that the House will have but too frequent occasion to perceive the truth of this acknowledgment. If a diligent attention, however, will enable me to fulfil the functions now assigned me,
 I may promise that diligence and attention shall be sedulously employed. For one portion of my duty, I shall engage with more confidence, because it will depend on my will and not my capacity. The rules which are to govern the proceedings of this House, so far as they shall depend on me for their application, shall be applied with the most rigorous and inflexible impartiality, regarding neither persons, their views, nor principles, and seeing only the abstract proposition subject to my decision. If, in forming that decision, I concur with some and differ from others, as must of necessity happen, I shall rely on the liberality and candor of those from whom I differ, to believe, that I do it on pure motives.

I might here proceed, and with the greatest truth, to declare my zealous attachment to the Constitution of the United States, that I consider the union of these States as the first of blessings, and as the first of duties the preservation of that Constitution which secures it ; but I suppose these declarations not pertinent to the occasion of entering into an office whose primary business is merely to preside over the forms of this House, and no one more sincerely prays that no accident may call me to the higher and more important functions which the Constitution eventually devolves on this office.

 These have been justly confided to the eminent character which has preceded me here, whose talents and integrity have been known and revered by me through a long course of years, have been the foundation of a cordial and uninterrupted friendship between us, and I devoutly pray he may be long preserved for the government, the happiness, and prosperity, of our common country.

On motion, it was agreed to repair to the Chamber of the House of Representatives to attend the administration of the oath of office to JOHN ADAMS, President of the United States ; which the Senate accordingly did ; and, being seated, the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES (attended by the Heads of Departments, the Marshal of the District, and his officers) came into the Chamber of the House of Representatives and took his seat in the Chair usually occupied by the SPEAKER. The VICE PRESIDENT and Secretary of the Senate were seated in advance, inclining to the right of the PRESIDENT, the late SPEAKER of the House of Representatives and Clerk on the left, and the Justices of the Supreme Court were seated round a table in front of the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES. The late PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, the great and good WASHINGTON, took a seat, as a private citizen, a little in front of the seats assigned for the Senate, which were on the South side of the House, the foreign Ministers and Members of the House of Representatives took their usual seats—a great concourse of both sexes being present. After a short pause, the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES arose, and communicated the following Address :

“ When it was first perceived, in early times, that no middle course for America remained, between unlimited submission to a foreign Legislature, and a total independence of its claims, men of reflection were less apprehensive of danger, from the formidable power of fleets and armies they must determine to resist, than from those contests and dissensions, which would certainly arise concerning the forms of government to be instituted over the whole and over the parts of this extensive country. Relying, however, on the purity of their intentions, the justice of their cause, and the integrity and intelligence of the people, under an over-ruling Providence, which had so signally protected this country from the first, the representatives of this nation, then consisting of little more than half its present number, not only broke to pieces the chains which were forging, and the rod of iron that was lifted up, but frankly cut asunder the ties which had bound them, and launched into an ocean of uncertainty.

“ The zeal and ardor of the people, during the Revolutionary war, supplying the place of government, commanded a degree of order, sufficient at least for the preservation of society. The Confederation, which was early felt to be necessary, was prepared from the models of the Batavian and Helvetic Confederacies, the only examples which remain, with any detail and precision, in history, and certainly the only ones which the people at large had ever considered. But, reflecting on the striking difference, in many particulars, between this country and those where a courier may go from the seat of Government to the frontier in a single day, it was then certainly foreseen by some who assisted in Congress at the formation of it, that it could not be durable.

[MARCH, 1797.]

"Negligence of its regulations, inattention to its recommendations, if not disobedience to its authority, not only in individuals but in States, soon appeared, with their melancholy consequences; universal languor; jealousies and rivalries of States; decline of navigation and commerce; discouragement of necessary manufactures; universal fall in the value of lands and their produce; contempt of public and private faith; loss of consideration and credit with foreign nations; and, at length, in discontents, animosities, combinations, partial conventions, and insurrection, threatening some great national calamity.

"In this dangerous crisis, the people of America were not abandoned by their usual good sense, presence of mind, resolution, or integrity. Measures were pursued to concert a plan, to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty. The public disquisitions, discussions, and deliberations, issued in the present happy Constitution of Government.

"Employed in the service of my country abroad, during the whole course of these transactions, I first saw the Constitution of the United States in a foreign country. Irritated by no literary altercation, animated by no public debate, heated by no party animosity, I read it with great satisfaction, as a result of good heads, prompted by good hearts; as an experiment, better adapted to the genius, character, situation, and relations, of this nation and country, than any which had ever been proposed or suggested. In its general principles and great outlines, it was conformable to such a system of government as I had ever most esteemed, and in some States, my own native State in particular, had contributed to establish. Claiming a right of suffrage, in common with my fellow-citizens, in the adoption or rejection of a Constitution which was to rule me and my posterity, as well as them and theirs, I did not hesitate to express my approbation of it, on all occasions, in public and in private. It was not then, nor has been since, any objection to it, in my mind, that the Executive and Senate were not more permanent. Nor have I ever entertained a thought of promoting any alteration in it, but such as the people themselves, in the course of their experience, should see and feel to be necessary or expedient, and by their Representatives in Congress and the State Legislatures, according to the Constitution itself, adopt and ordain.

"Returning to the bosom of my country, after a painful separation from it, for ten years, I had the honor to be elected to a station under the new order of things, and I have repeatedly laid myself under the most serious obligations to support the Constitution. The operation of it has equalled the most sanguine expectations of its friends, and from an habitual attention to it, satisfaction in its administration and delight in its effects upon the peace, order, prosperity, and happiness of the nation, I have acquired an habitual attachment to it, and veneration for it.

"What other form of Government, indeed, can so well deserve our esteem and love?

"There may be little solidity in an ancient idea, that congregations of men into cities and nations are the most pleasing objects in the sight of superior intelligences; but this is very certain, that, to a benevolent human mind, there can be no spectacle presented by any nation more pleasing, more noble, majestic, or august, than an assembly like that which has so often been seen in this and the other chamber of Congress, of a Government, in which the Executive authority, as well as that of all the branches of the Legislature, are exercised by citizens selected, at regular periods, by their neighbors, to make and execute laws for the general good. Can anything essential, anything more than mere ornament and decoration, be added to this by robes and diamonds? Can authority be more amiable and respectable, when it descends from accidents, or institutions established in remote antiquity, than when it springs fresh from the hearts and judgments of an honest and enlightened people? For, it is the people only that are represented: it is their power and majesty that are reflected, and only for their good, in every legitimate Government, under whatever form it may appear. The existence of such a Government as ours, for any length of time, is a full proof of a general dissemination of knowledge and virtue throughout the whole body of the people. And what object or consideration more pleasing than this can be presented to the human mind? If national pride is ever justifiable or excusable, it is when it springs, not from power or riches, grandeur or glory, but from conviction of national innocence, information, and benevolence.

"In the midst of these pleasing ideas, we should be unfaithful to ourselves, if we should ever lose sight of the danger to our liberties, if anything partial or extraneous should infect the purity of our free, fair, virtuous, and independent elections. If an election is to be determined by a majority of a single vote, and that can be procured by a party, through artifice or corruption, the Government may be the choice of a party, for its own ends, not of the nation for the national good. If that solitary suffrage can be obtained by foreign nations, by flattery or menaces, by fraud or violence, by terror, intrigue, or venality, the Government may not be the choice of the American people, but of foreign nations. It may be foreign nations who govern us, and not we the people who govern ourselves. And candid men will acknowledge, that, in such cases, choice would have little advantage to boast of, over lot or chance.

"Such is the amiable and interesting system of Government (and such are some of the abuses to which it may be exposed) which the people of America have exhibited to the admiration and anxiety of the wise and virtuous of all nations, for eight years, under the administration of a citizen, who, by a long course of great actions, regulated by prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude, conducting a people, inspired with the same virtues, and animated with the same ardent patriotism and love of liberty, to independence and peace, to increasing wealth and unexampled prosperity, has merited the gratitude of his fellow-citizens, commanded the highest praises of foreign nations, and secured immortal glory with posterity.

"In that retirement which is his voluntary choice, may he long live to enjoy the delicious recollection of his services, the gratitude of mankind, the happy fruits of them to himself and the world, which are daily increasing, and that splendid prospect of the future fortunes of this country, which is opening from year to year. His name may be still a rampart, and the knowledge that he lives a bulwark, against all open or secret enemies of his country's peace. This example has been recommended to the imitation of his successors, by both Houses of Congress, and by the voice of the Legislatures and the people throughout the nation.

"On this subject it might become me better to be silent, or to speak with diffidence; but, as something may be expected, the occasion, I hope, will be admitted as an apology, if I venture to say, that, if a preference, upon principle, of a free Republican Government, formed upon long and serious reflection, after a diligent and impartial inquiry after truth; if an attachment to the Constitution of the United States, and a conscientious determination to support it, until it shall be altered by the judgments and wishes of the people, expressed in the mode prescribed in it; if a respectful attention to the Constitutions of the individual States, and a constant caution and delicacy towards the State Governments; if an equal and impartial regard to the rights, interest, honor, and happiness, of all the States in the Union, without preference or regard to a Northern or Southern, an Eastern or Western position, their various political opinions, on unessential points, or their personal attachments; if a love of virtuous men of all parties and denominations; if a love of science and letters, and a wish to patronize every rational effort to encourage schools, colleges, universities, academies, and every institution for propagating knowledge, virtue, and religion, among all classes of the people, not only for their benign influence on the happiness of life in all its stages and classes, and of society in all its forms, but as the only means of preserving our Constitution from its natural enemies, the spirit of sophistry, the spirit of party, the spirit of intrigue, the profligacy of corruption, and the pestilence of foreign influence, which is the angel of destruction to elective Governments; if a love of equal laws, of justice, and humanity, in the interior administration; if an inclination to improve agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, for necessity, convenience, and defence; if a spirit of equity and humanity towards the aboriginal nations of America, and a disposition to meliorate their condition, by inclining them to be more friendly to us, and our citizens to be more friendly to them; if an inflexible determination to maintain peace and inviolable faith with all nations, and that system of neutrality and impartiality among the belligerent Powers of Europe, which has been adopted by this Government, and so solemnly sanctioned by both Houses of Congress, and applauded by the Legislatures of the States and the public opinion, until it shall be otherwise ordained by Congress; if a personal esteem for the French nation, formed in a residence of seven years, chiefly among them, and a sincere desire to preserve the friendship which has been so much for the honor and interest of both nations; if, while the conscious honor and integrity of the people of America, and the internal sentiment of their own power and energies must be preserved, an earnest endeavor to investigate every just cause, and remove every colorable pretence of complaint; if an intention to pursue, by amicable negotiation, a reparation for the injuries that have been committed on the commerce of our fellow-citizens, by whatever nation, and, if success cannot be obtained, to lay the facts before the Legislature, that they may consider what further measures the honor and interest of the Government and its constituents demand; if a resolution to do justice, as far as may depend upon me, at all times and to all nations, and maintain peace, friendship, and benevolence, with all the world; if an unshaken confidence in the honor, spirit, and resources of the American people, on which I have so often hazarded my all, and never been deceived; if elevated ideas of the high destinies of this country, and of my own duties towards it, founded on a knowledge of the moral principles and intellectual improvements of the people, deeply engraven on my mind in early life, and not obscured, but exalted by experience and age; and, with humble reverence, I feel it to be my duty to add, if a veneration for the religion of a people who profess and call themselves Christians, and a fixed resolution to consider a decent respect for Christianity among the best recommendations for the public service, can enable me, in any degree, to comply with your wishes, it shall be my strenuous endeavor, that this sagacious injunction of the two Houses shall not be without effect.

"With this great example before me, with the sense and spirit, the faith and honor, the duty and interest, of the same American people, pledged to support the Constitution of the United States, I entertain no doubt of its continuance in all its energy, and my mind is prepared, without hesitation, to lay myself under the most solemn obligations to support it to the utmost of my power.

"And may that Being, who is supreme over all, the Patron of order, the Fountain of justice, and the Protector, in all ages of the world, of virtuous liberty, continue his blessing upon this nation and its Government, and give it all possible success and duration, consistent with the ends of His Providence."

The oath of office was then administered to him by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Associate Justices attending. After which, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES retired, and the Senate repaired to their own Chamber.

On motion,

Ordered, That MESSRS. LANGDON and SEDGWICK be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that the Senate is assembled, and ready to adjourn, unless he may have any communications to make to them.

Mr. LANGDON reported, from the committee, that they had waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, who replied, that he had no communication to make to the Senate, except his good wishes for their health and prosperity, and a happy meeting with their families and friends.

The Senate then adjourned without day.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FOURTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 5, 1796.

MONDAY, December 5, 1796.

This being the day appointed by the Constitution for the annual meeting of Congress, in the House of Representatives the following named members appeared and took their seats, viz:

From New Hampshire.—ABIEL FOSTER, NICHOLAS GILMAN, JOHN S. SHERBURNE, and JEREMIAH SMITH.

From Massachusetts.—FISHER AMES, THEOPHILUS BRADBURY, HENRY DEARBORN, DWIGHT FOSTER, NATHANIEL FREEMAN, Jr., SAMUEL LYMAN, WILLIAM LYMAN, JOHN REED, GEORGE THATCHER, JOSEPH B. VARNUM, and PELEG WADSWORTH.

From Rhode Island.—FRANCIS MALBONE.

From Connecticut.—JOSHUA COIT, CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, ROGER GRISWOLD, NATHANIEL SMITH, and ZEPHANIAH SWIFT.

From New York.—THEODORUS BAILEY, WILLIAM COOPER, EZEKIEL GILBERT, HENRY GLEN, JONATHAN N. HAVENS, JOHN E. VAN ALLEN, PHILIP VAN CORTLANDT, and JOHN WILLIAMS.

From New Jersey.—JONATHAN DAYTON, AARON KITCHELL, and ISAAC SMITH.

From Pennsylvania.—ALBERT GALLATIN, SAMUEL MACLAY, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS MUHLENBERG, JOHN RICHARDS, SAMUEL SITGREAVES, and JOHN SWANWICK.

From Delaware.—JOHN PATTON.

From Maryland.—GEORGE DENT, WILLIAM HINDMAN, and RICHARD SPRIGG, Jun.

From Virginia.—JOHN CLOPTON, ISAAC COLES, GEORGE JACKSON, JAMES MADISON, ANTHONY NEW, and ROBERT RUTHERFORD.

From Kentucky.—CHRISTOPHER GREENUP.

From North Carolina.—THOMAS BLOUNT and MATTHEW LOCKE.

From South Carolina.—WILLIAM SMITH.

From Georgia.—ABRAHAM BALDWIN.

The following new members appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats, viz:

From Tennessee.—ANDREW JACKSON.

From Maryland.—WILLIAM CRAIK, in place of JEREMIAH CRABB, resigned.

From Connecticut.—JAMES DAVENPORT, in place of JAMES HILLHOUSE, appointed a Senator of the United States.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Pennsylvania, with the return of the election of GEORGE EGE, to serve as a member of the House in place of DANIEL HEISTER, resigned.

A quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number being present, it was ordered that the Clerk wait on the Senate, to inform them that this House was ready to proceed to business; but it appeared that the Senate had not been able to form a quorum by one member, and had adjourned.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH presented a petition from Thomas Lloyd, proposing to take, in short-hand, and publish the Debates of Congress at $1,000 per session salary. The expense of printing, &c. he estimated at $540, for which he would furnish the House with five hundred copies of that work; engaging to use every possible precaution, and pay prompt attention.

Mr. S. referred to the unfavorable reception of a proposal of this nature at the last session, and supposed this would not be more successful; however, he moved that it be referred to a committee.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. GALLATIN, and Mr. SWIFT, were appointed to examine the petition, and report thereon to the House.

TUESDAY, December 6.

Several other members, to wit: from Vermont, ISRAEL SMITH; from New Jersey, MARK THOMPSON; from Pennsylvania, RICHARD THOMAS; from Virginia, CARTER B. HARRISON, JOHN HEATH, and ABRAHAM VENABLE; and from North Carolina, JESSE FRANKLIN, WILLIAM BARRY GROVE, JAMES HOLLAND, and NATHANIEL MACON, appeared and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER observed, that, as there were several returns of new elections of members to serve in this session, it was proper that, pursuant to a rule of the House, a Committee of Elections be appointed.

A committee was accordingly appointed, of Mr. VENABLE, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. DENT, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. MUHLENBERG, and Mr. A. FOSTER.

President's Speech.

[DECEMBER, 1796.]

Mr. MACON moved that a Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business of last session be appointed, pursuant to the Standing Rules and Orders of the House, observing that, as the session would be but short, it would be necessary to be early in the appointment of committees.

Whereon Mr. GILMAN, Mr. R. SPRIGG, JUN., and Mr. MACON were appointed.

Notice was received that a quorum of the Senate was formed.

On motion, it was, therefore, resolved, that a committee of three members be appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in conjunction with a committee from the Senate, to inform him that a quorum of both Houses was assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may please to make. Mr. AMES, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. SITGREAVES, were accordingly appointed.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had formed a quorum: whereupon the Clerk went to the Senate with the resolution of this House. The Secretary soon after returned, informing the House that the Senate had concurred in the resolution, and formed a committee for that purpose.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that agreeably to an act passed the last session, the laws of the United States were publishing; but he observed that it would be of much more utility if the laws of the present session could be included; thus the whole of the present Congress would be inserted, together with the completion of the administration of the present PRESIDENT. He observed, that such a motion passed at the last session in the Senate, but was negatived by this House, on account of its affecting the contract made for printing; but he believed, from the knowledge he had gathered on the subject, no great difficulty could be in the way of its accomplishment. He therefore moved that a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to amend an act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States.

A committee was appointed of Mr. GRISWOLD, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. COLES.

FURNISHING NEWSPAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BRADBURY, it was Resolved, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers printed in this city, such as the members, respectively, shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings, provided they do not exceed the price at which subscribers in Philadelphia are served.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported that the committee had waited on the PRESIDENT, who was pleased to signify to them that he would make a communication to both Houses of Congress to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, in the Representatives' Chamber.

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

Another member, to wit: SAMUEL SEWALL, from Massachusetts, in place of BENJAMIN GOODHUE, appointed a Senator of the United States, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

A message was sent to the Senate, informing them that this House was ready, agreeably to appointment, to receive communications from the PRESIDENT; whereon the Senate attended and took their seats. At 12 o'clock the PRESIDENT attended, and, after taking his seat, rose and delivered the following Address:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

In recurring to the internal situation of our country, since I had last the pleasure to address you, I find ample reason for a renewed expression of that gratitude to the Ruler of the Universe, which a continued series of prosperity has so often and so justly called forth.

The acts of the last session, which required special arrangements, have been, as far as circumstances would admit, carried into operation.

Measures calculated to insure a continuance of the friendship of the Indians, and to preserve peace along the extent of our interior frontier, have been digested and adopted. In the framing of these, care has been taken to guard on the one hand our advanced settlements from the predatory incursions of those unruly individuals who cannot be restrained by their tribes; and on the other hand, to protect the rights secured to the Indians by Treaty; to draw them nearer to the civilized state; and inspire them with correct conceptions of the power, as well as justice of the Government.

The meeting of the deputies from the Creek nation at Colrairie, in the State of Georgia, which had for a principal object the purchase of a parcel of their land by that State, broke up without its being accomplished; the nation having, previous to their departure, instructed them against making any sale; the occasion, however, has been improved, to confirm by a new Treaty with the Creeks, their pre-existing engagements with the United States; and to obtain their consent to the establishment of trading houses and military posts within their boundary; by means of which their friendship and the general peace may be more effectually secured.

The period during the late session, at which the appropriation was passed, for carrying in effect to the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and his Britannic Majesty, necessarily procrastinated the reception of the posts stipulated to be delivered, beyond the date assigned for that event. As soon, however as the Governor General of Canada could be addressed with propriety on the subject, arrangements were cordially and promptly concluded for their evacuation; and the United States took possession of the principal of them, comprehending Oswego, Niagara, Detroit, Michilimackinac and Fort Miami, where such repairs and additions have been ordered to be made as appeared indispensable.

The Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States and of Great Britain, to determine which is the river St. Croix, mentioned in the Treaty of Peace of 1783, agreed in the choice of Egbert Benson, Esq., of New York for the third Commissioner. The whole met at St. Andrew's, in Passamaquoddy bay, in the beginning of October, and directed surveys to be made of the rivers in dispute; but deeming it impracticable to have these surveys completed before the next year, they adjourned to meet at Boston in August, 1797, for the final decision of the question.

Other Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States, agreeably to the seventh article of the Treaty with Great Britain, relative to captures and condemnation of vessels and other property, met the Commissioners of His Britannic Majesty in London, in August last, when John Trumbull, Esquire, was chosen by lot for the fifth Commissioner. In October following the Board were to proceed to business. As yet there has been no communication of Commissioners on the part of Great Britain, to unite with those who have been appointed on the part of the United States, for carrying into effect the sixth article of the Treaty.

The Treaty with Spain required that the Commissioners for running the boundary line, between the territory of the United States and His Catholic Majesty's Provinces of East and West Florida, should meet at the Natchez, before the expiration of six months after the exchange of the ratifications, which was effected at Aranjuez on the twenty-fifth day of April; and the troops of His Catholic Majesty occupying any posts within the limits of the United States, were within the same period to be withdrawn. The Commissioner of the United States, therefore, commenced his journey for the Natchez in September, and troops were ordered to occupy the posts from which the Spanish garrison should be withdrawn. Information has been recently received of the appointment of a Commissioner on the part of His Catholic Majesty for running the boundary line, but none of any appointment for the adjustment of the claims of our citizens whose vessels were captured by the armed vessels of Spain.

In pursuance of the act of Congress, passed in the last session, for the protection and relief of American seamen, agents were appointed, one to reside in Great Britain and the other in the West Indies. The effects of the agency in the West Indies are not yet fully ascertained; but those which have been communicated afford grounds to believe the measure will be beneficial. The agent destined to reside in Great Britain declining to accept the appointment, the business has consequently devolved on the Minister of the United States in London, and will command his attention until a new agent shall be appointed.

After many delays and disappointments, arising out of the European war, the final arrangements for fulfilling the engagements made to the Dey and Regency of Algiers, will, in all present appearance, be crowned with success, but under great, though inevitable disadvantages in the pecuniary transactions, occasioned by that war, which will render a further provision necessary. The actual liberation of all our citizens who were prisoners in Algiers, while it gratifies every feeling heart, is itself an earnest of a satisfactory termination of the whole negotiation.

Measures are in operation for effecting Treaties with the Regencies of Tunis and Tripoli.

To an active external commerce, the protection of a Naval force is indispensable: this is manifest with regard to wars in which a State is itself a party. But besides this, it is in our own experience, that the most sincere neutrality is not a sufficient guard against the depredations of nations at war. To secure respect to neutral flag, requires a Naval force, organized and ready to vindicate it from insult or aggression. This may even prevent the necessity of going to war, by discouraging belligerent Powers from committing such violations of the rights of the neutral party as may, first or last, leave no other option. From the best information I have been able to obtain, it would seem as if our trade to the Mediterranean, without a protecting force, will always be insecure, and our citizens exposed to the calamities from which numbers of them have but just been relieved.

These considerations invite the United States to look to the means, and to set about the gradual creation of a Navy. The increasing progress of their navigation promises them, at no distant period, the requisite supply of seamen; and their means in other respects favor the undertaking. It is an encouragement likewise that their particular situation will give weight and influence to a moderate Naval force in their hands. Will it not, then, be advisable to begin, without delay, to provide and lay up the materials for the building and equipping of ships of war, and to proceed in the work by degrees, in proportion as our resources shall render it practicable without inconvenience; so that a future war of Europe may not find our commerce in the same unprotected state in which it was found by the present?

Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible. As a general rule, manufactures on public account are inexpedient. But where the state of things in a country leaves but little hope that certain branches of manufacture will for a great length of time obtain, when these are of a nature essential to the furnishing and equipping of the public force in time of war; are not establishments for procuring them on public account, to the extent of the ordinary demand for the public service, recommended by strong considerations of national policy, as an exception to the general rule? Ought our country to remain in such cases dependant on foreign supply, precarious, because liable to be interrupted? If the necessary articles should in this mode cost more in time of peace, will not the security and independence thence arising form an ample compensation? Establishments of this sort, commensurate only with the calls of the public service in time of peace, will, in time of war, easily be extended in proportion to the exigencies of the Government, and may even, perhaps, be made to yield a surplus for the supply of our citizens at large, so as to mitigate the privations from the interruption of their trade. If adopted, the plan ought to exclude all those branches which are already, or likely soon to be established in the country, in order that there may be no danger of interference with pursuits of individual industry.

It will not be doubted that with reference either to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population, and other circumstances of maturity, this truth becomes more apparent, and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse; and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety? Among the means which have been employed to this end, none have been attended with greater success than the establishment of Boards, composed of proper characters, charged with collecting and diffusing information, and enabled by premiums, and small pecuniary aids, to encourage and assist a spirit of discovery and improvement. This species of establishment contributes doubly to the increase of improvement, by stimulating to enterprise and experiment, and by drawing to a common centre the results everywhere of individual skill and observation, and spreading them thence over the whole nation. Experience accordingly has shown that they are very cheap instruments of immense national benefits.

I have heretofore proposed to the consideration of Congress the expediency of establishing a National University, and also a Military Academy. The desirableness of both these institutions has so constantly increased with every new view I have taken of the subject, that I cannot omit the opportunity of once for all recalling your attention to them.

The Assembly to which I address myself is too enlightened not to be fully sensible how much a flourishing state of the arts and sciences contributes to national prosperity and reputation. True it is that our country, much to its honor, contains many seminaries of learning highly respectable and useful; but the funds upon which they rest are too narrow to command the ablest professors in the different departments of liberal knowledge for the institution contemplated, though they would be excellent auxiliaries.

Amongst the motives to such an institution the assimilation of the principles, opinions, and manners of our countrymen, by the common education of a portion of our youth from every quarter, well deserves attention. The more homogeneous our citizens can be made in these particulars, the greater will be our prospect of permanent union; and a primary object of such a national institution should be the education of our youth in the science of Government. In a Republic, what species of knowledge can be equally important? and what duty more pressing on its Legislature, than to patronize a plan for communicating it to those who are to be the future guardians of the liberties of the country?

The institution of a Military Academy is also recommended by cogent reasons. However pacific the general policy of a nation may be, it ought never to be without an adequate stock of military knowledge for emergencies. The first would impair the energy of its character, and both would hazard its safety, or expose it to greater evils when war could not be avoided: besides, that war might often not depend upon its own choice. In proportion as the observance of pacific maxims might exempt a nation from the necessity of practising the rules of the military art, ought to be its care in preserving and transmitting by proper establishments the knowledge of that art. Whatever argument may be drawn from particular examples, superficially viewed, a thorough examination of the subject will evince that the art of war is at once comprehensive and complicated; that it demands much previous study; and that the possession of it, in its most improved and perfect state, is always of great moment to the security of a nation. This, therefore, ought to be a serious care of every Government; and for this purpose an Academy, where a regular course of instruction is given, is an obvious expedient, which different nations have successfully employed.

The compensations to the officers of the United States in various instances, and in none more than in respect to the most important stations, appear to call for Legislative revision. The consequences of a defective provision are of serious import to the Government.

If private wealth is to supply the defect of public retribution, it will greatly contract the sphere within which the selection of character for office is to be made, and will proportionally diminish the probability of a choice of men, able, as well as upright. Besides, that it would be repugnant to the vital principles of our Government virtually to exclude from public trusts, talents and virtue, unless accompanied by wealth.

While in our external relations some serious inconveniences and embarrassments have been overcome, and others lessened, it is with much pain and deep regret I mention that circumstances of a very unwelcome nature have lately occurred. Our trade has suffered, and is suffering, extensive injuries in the West Indies, from the cruisers and agents of the French Republic; and communications have been received from its Minister here which indicate the danger of a further disturbance of our commerce, by its authority, and which are, in other respects, far from agreeable.

It has been my constant, sincere, and ardent wish, in conformity with that of our nation, to maintain cordial harmony and a perfectly friendly understanding with that Republic. This wish remains unabated; and I shall persevere in the endeavor to fulfil it to the utmost extent of what shall be consistent with a just and indispensable regard to the rights and honor of our country; nor will I easily cease to cherish the expectation that a spirit of justice, candor, and friendship on the part of the Republic will eventually insure success.

In pursuing this course, however, I cannot forget what is due to the character of our Government and nation, or to a full and entire confidence in the good sense, patriotism, self-respect, and fortitude of my countrymen.

I reserve for a special Message a more particular communication on this interesting subject.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives :

I have directed an estimate of the appropriations necessary for the service of the ensuing year, to be submitted from the proper Department, with a view of the public receipts and expenditures to the latest period to which an account can be prepared.

It is with satisfaction I am able to inform you that the revenues of the United States continue in a state of progressive improvement.

A reinforcement of the existing provisions for discharging our Public Debt was mentioned in my Address at the opening of the last session. Some preliminary steps were taken towards it, the maturing of which will, no doubt, engage your zealous attention during the present. I will only add, that it will afford me a heartfelt satisfaction to concur in such further measures as will ascertain to our country the prospect of a speedy extinguishment of the Debt. Posterity may have cause to regret, if from any motive, intervals of tranquility are left unimproved for accelerating this valuable end.

of the House of Representatives :*

My solicitude to see the Militia of the United States placed on an efficient establishment has been so often and so ardently expressed that I shall but barely recall the subject to your view on the present occasion; at the same time that I shall submit to your inquiry, whether our harbors are yet sufficiently secured.

The situation in which I now stand, for the last time, in the midst of the Representatives of the People of the United States, naturally recalls the period when the administration of the present form of Government commenced; and I cannot omit the occasion to congratulate you and my country on the success of the experiment; nor to repeat my fervent supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe and Sovereign Arbitrer of Nations that His providential care may still be extended to the United States; that the virtue and happiness of the people may be preserved; and that the Government which they have instituted for the protection of their liberties may be perpetual.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 7, 1796.

When the PRESIDENT had concluded his Address, he presented copies of it to the PRESIDENT of the Senate and the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives. The PRESIDENT and the Senate then withdrew, and the SPEAKER took the Chair. The Address was again read by the Clerk, and on motion, committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 8.

JAMES GILLESPIE, from North Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

A new member, to wit: GEORGE EGE, from Pennsylvania, in place of DANIEL HEISTER, resigned, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. GRISWOLD, from the committee appointed to bring in a bill to amend the act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States, reported a bill, which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. W. SMITH presented a petition from Thomas Carpenter, praying encouragement to a publication of the debates of Congress from a short-hand manuscript, to be taken in the House, of which he had issued proposals; which was referred to the committee appointed to examine the petition of Thomas Lloyd on the same subject.

Mr. HEATH said, that by the standing order of the House, a Committee of Claims ought to be appointed, as the claims were numerous, and become very pressing on the House; he would therefore move, that a Committee of Claims be now appointed; which was accordingly done, and Mr. D. FOSTER, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. MACLAY, Mr. HEATH, Mr. MACON, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. WILLIAMS, were appointed on the said committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved, "That two Chaplains of different denominations be chosen, one by each House, to exchange weekly;" which was agreed to.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

On the motion of Mr. W. SMITH, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the PRESIDENT'S Address, according to the order of the day. The Speech was read by the Clerk.

Mr. D. FOSTER moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that a respectful Address ought to be presented from the House of Representatives, to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of the session, containing assurances, that this House will take into consideration the many important matters recommended to their attention."

Which was unanimously agreed to, and Mr. AMES, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. MADISON, Mr. SINGREAVES, and Mr. W. SMITH were appointed a committee to draw up the Address. The Committee rose, and the resolution was adopted by the House.

Mr. W. SMITH presented a petition from Thomas W. Baker, postmaster at Charlestown, praying an increase of salary, as articles of necessity had become dearer, and his business is become more weighty, which was ordered to lie on the table until a committee be appointed on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. THATCHER then moved

"That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what alterations are necessary to be made in the act for establishing Post Offices and Post Roads within the United States, and to report by bill or otherwise:"

Mr. THATCHER, Mr. BAYLEY, Mr. COLES, Mr. COIT, Mr. GROVES, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. EGE, and Mr. ANDREW JACKSON, were accordingly appointed on that committee.

Mr. W. SMITH made mention of the petition of Henry Hill, which had been last session referred to the Committee of Claims, but too late to be taken up by the House. He therefore moved that it be now committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MACON thought it would be more in order for the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, which was yesterday appointed to report first, as this business would of course be included; however, his only objection was to preserve order.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he saw no necessity of waiting the report of that committee; he thought the business of that committee lay in reporting such business to the House as would otherwise escape the notice of gentlemen, not to prevent members making motion on any case; he thought this had been the practice of the House.

Mr. MACON said, the gentleman was right in part; it had been usual, in time past, to bring notions of this kind immediately before the House, but the last session was the first time a committee of this kind had been appointed, in order to remove some ill consequences attending such a practice.

Mr. SPEAKER said, that this, with all other business remaining from the last session, would be sent to the committee. He thought if the House took up this report separately, it would not be altogether so orderly as to leave it for a committee to report thereon.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that this would be putting too much power into the hands of the committee, whereby they may protract business, which required haste in its decision.

Mr. BALDWIN thought, that as the committee would soon meet, their object would be to discharge the most urgent business earliest. He thought if there was not anything very pressing in it, the most regular way would be to let it come before the House through the committee. However, if there was anything pressing in the case, he would not stand in its way.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, that as this committee usually reported early, no great inconvenience could arise from awaiting it.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he knew not anything extraordinary pressing in this case, and therefore had no objection to withdraw his motion and wait the report of the committee.

FRIDAY, December 9.

DAVID BARD, from Pennsylvania, JOSIAH PARKER, from Virginia, and NATHAN BRYAN, from North Carolina, appeared and took their seats in the House.

Mr. HINDMAN presented a petition from Samuel Chester, who had been a recruiting sergeant in the Army, and spent twenty years in the service in training recruits, and is now near sixty years of age, and though not wounded, yet his constitution is so debilitated that he is incapable of supporting himself; he therefore prays relief from the House. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MACON, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, reported a number of bills and petitions left undecided on at the last session.

Mr. W. SMITH moved, that the usual number of copies of the report on the said bills, &c., be printed for the use of the members; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. SMITH moved, that the report of the committee on the petition of Henry Hill should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for Monday next; which was agreed to.

Mr. HEATH observed, that as this case was of a very complicated nature, he would move that the usual number of copies of the report of the Committee of Claims on it should be printed for the use of the members; which passed.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER said, that it had been usual for the House to come to some order on the PRESIDENT'S Address, which was to refer it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. On which Mr. WILLIAMS moved, that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which was done accordingly.

Mr. BAYLEY moved, that a Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be appointed, when Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. SEWALL, Mr. COIT, Mr. PARKER, Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. DENT, were named for that committee.

Mr. BAYLEY then moved, that when this House adjourn, it adjourn till Monday at eleven o'clock.

[The reason stated during the last session for the House not meeting to do business on Saturdays was, that the standing committees were numerous, besides many special committees for different purposes, whose business was frequently very important and troublesome, it was therefore necessary that Saturday be allowed for the committees to sit, else business would be much protracted, and become too burdensome on gentlemen in committees.]

MONDAY, December 12.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, EDWARD LIVINGSTON; from Pennsylvania, ANDREW GREGG; from Maryland, GABRIEL CHRISTIE; from Virginia, WILLIAM B. GILES, ANDREW MOORE, and JOHN NICHOLAS; and from South Carolina, ROBERT GOODLOE HARPER, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed for that purpose, reported an answer to the Address delivered by the PRESIDENT to both Houses of Congress, which was read by the Clerk. Mr. AMES then moved, that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow; which was agreed to; and also, that the usual number of copies be printed for the use of the members.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate concurred in the resolution for the appointment of Chaplains, and that they have chosen the Rev. Bishop WHITE.

Mr. D. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, reported that they had found many memorials which had not been acted on at the last session, on account of the lateness of its continuance, and not through any negligence on the part of the committee. He then moved a resolution in effect as follows:

"Resolved, That all claims, referred to the Committee of Claims of the last session, and not by them reported on, be now referred to the Committee of Claims of the present session, pursuant to the rules of this House;" which was agreed to.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. MADISON presented a memorial from the Commissioners of the Federal City, stating the many advantages that would result from the building of a National University at the said city—being the place appointed for the permanent Seat of Government of the United States; observing, that it had been the subject of much conversation, but no effectual measures had been adopted towards its accomplishment; that a portion of land sufficient for the building, together with fifty shares on the Potomac river, which was becoming very valuable, had been appropriated by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; that there would doubtless be many liberal donations and subscriptions both in this country and in Europe towards its support; it would also introduce youth from other countries, and tend to the general wealth and prosperity of this, by the more general dissemination of useful knowledge. They pray that Congress would take such measures as that they may be able to receive any donations which may be made to the institution.

Claim of Henry Hill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. M. moved that it be referred to a select committee, and he conceived that it would be proper for the same committee to take up that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which relates to the same subject.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia, whether it would not be more orderly for the memorial to lie on the table until that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech came under discussion in the House? he suggested this idea from the consideration that it would look more respectful to the Chief Magistrate, to let it come from him, as he had recommended it to the attention of the House in his Address.

Mr. MADISON replied, that it would be more consistent with order for the memorial to go through a select committee.

Mr. SMITH said he would not object. The motion passed, and a committee of three members were appointed.

Mr. JACKSON presented a petition for cutting a new road from Virginia and Maryland to the Northwestern Territory, by which the post would be much facilitated, and the adjacent country advantaged; which memorial was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that that part of the report of the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, respecting certain refugees from Nova Scotia and Canada, be referred to a Committee of the Whole House; which was accordingly agreed to, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

Mr. W. also moved that the House now go into the ballot for a Chaplain. Dr. GREEN and Dr. PRIESTLEY were nominated. Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. GREENUP were appointed tellers, who, on counting the votes, declared for Dr. ASHBEL GREEN 35, for Dr. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY 27, and for the Rev. Mr. BLAIR 6. Dr. GREEN was declared duly elected.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved the order of the day, for the bill to amend the act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States; which being agreed to, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole thereon; and, after reading the bill, rose and reported it without amendment. The House then took it up, agreed to it, and ordered it to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

CLAIM OF HENRY HILL.

Mr. COIT moved the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Henry Hill. The House formed itself into a Committee of the Whole, and read the report of the Committee thereon; which, on account of the complexity of the case, it will be necessary to give at length:

"That, on the 15th of February, 1783, a contract was made under the authority of the Superintendent of Finance, with John Banks, for supplying the Southern Army; and it was stipulated, among other things, that payment should be made in gold or silver, at Philadelphia. Banks's accounts were settled in 1783 or 1784, to the mutual satisfaction of him and the public officers, excepting so much as was contained in a charge of $9,768 81, including principal and interest, against Banks. This charge was made, and the sum retained, on the ground that $8,612 24 principal, and $1,156 57 interest, was in Mr. Charles Pettit's hands, which he claimed on account of a claim he, as quartermaster, had against the United States, and the Treasury officers claimed as moneys deposited for John Banks, on account of the above contract, and that Mr. Pettit held the said sum for Banks. Mr. Pettit claims a balance due him, in the quartermaster's department, and is willing to allow that sum on his claim, or if there is not a balance in his favor, is willing to pay it. Hence it results that the sum of $9,768 81 is credited to the United States by Mr. Pettit, and has been charged against John Banks, and reserved out of the balance of the sum.

"This account having been once settled, the Treasury officers refuse to resettle it, as it is an established rule at the Treasury not to open accounts for a new settlement which has once undergone a liquidation and settlement by the proper officers.

"The committee suppose, in a case like this, where it is manifest a double charge, in favor of the public, has been made, and that charge, consisting of one item only, about which mistakes cannot possibly occur, that propriety and justice would dictate an allowance of the sum. The petitioner had an assignment of this claim from Mr. Miller, who claimed the right of Mr. Banks.

"The committee are of opinion that it would be improper for them to determine who are the actual and equitable representatives of John Banks, so far as respects this balance, as the right of the claimants may receive a Judicial determination.

"It is sufficient that the balance be placed to the credit of the person to whom it belonged on the 31st day of December 1783, the time the sum was retained out of Banks's payment. They, therefore, submit, for the consideration of the House, the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That the accounting officers of the Treasury cause the sum of $9,768 81, charged to the contract account of John Banks, on the 31st of December, 1783, to be credited to the said John Banks; and that the sum so credited be charged to the account of such other person as, in their opinion, shall be justly chargeable therewith."

Mr. HEATH moved an amendment to the report, that the words in the latter part, after John Banks, &c., be struck out, as he thought it would otherwise be interfering with the Judicial authority and making a disagreement between the latter part of the resolution and the former part.

Mr. D. FOSTER said, it appeared that when Mr. Banks's account was settled, the sum in question was charged to his account, and it appeared that the United States had been credited in Mr. Pettit's account for that sum. He thought there could be no doubt on this, and, therefore, hoped the amendment would be negated. Mr. D. FOSTER, Mr. HEATH, and Mr. COIT, severally spoke on the subject. The motion was then put and negated.

Mr. COIT next moved the following resolution, to be added to the report:

"And that they charge the said John Banks with the several sums paid by the United States, to indemnify fy the estate of the late General Greene, for certain engagements entered into by him on account of the said Banks."

Mr. HEATH opposed this amendment, because it interfered with the Judicial power. Besides, as there were claims prior to the engagement between General Greene and Mr. Banks for this money, he thought it would be unjust to seize this money, because it was in their power. He thought the Executive power should not interfere with the Legislative, nor the Legislative with the Executive; and he hoped gentlemen in this House would never become accusers and judges too; such conduct he should judge extremely improper.

Mr. D. FOSTER hoped, also, that the last motion would not pass.

Mr. D. FOSTER at length moved that the Committee rise and report progress. The Committee accordingly rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, December 13.

Two other members, to wit: THOMAS CLAIRBORNE and JOHN PAGE, from Virginia, appeared and took their seats in the House.

A new member, viz: WILLIAM STRUDWICK, from North Carolina, in place of ABSALOM TATOM resigned, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The bill providing for the more effectual promulgation of the laws of the United States, was read a third time and passed.

REPORTING THE DEBATES.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the committee appointed to examine into the petitions of Thomas Lloyd and Thomas Carpenter, reported the following resolution:

"That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with ——— copies of the Debates of Congress, printed in this city, such as the members respectively shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings; provided that they do not exceed the price at which other subscribers are served therewith."

On motion, it was resolved that it be read a second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. W. SMITH then moved for the order of the day on the report of the Committee in answer to the PRESIDENT's Address.

Mr. GILES said, that as the printed copy of the answer was but just laid before the House, he hoped the gentleman would not insist on his motion, as he declared he had not had time to read it; he would therefore move that it be deferred till to-morrow.

Mr. PARKER seconded the motion. He said he was not able to judge whether the answer would meet his approbation or not; he wished time to be given for the consideration of it.

Mr. W. SMITH said he knew no instance in which the answer to the PRESIDENT's Address had been laid over, and he thought it ought to be despatched with all possible speed.

Mr. HEATH said, he hoped his colleague would not insist on his motion for letting it lie over till to-morrow; he thought it could as well be acted on to-day.

Mr. AMES observed, that it would look very awkward to let it lie over till to-morrow, as it was very unusual, if not unprecedented, so to do; he thought gentlemen might make up their minds about it if laid on the table about an hour; they could, in the meantime, despatch other business, which would come before them.

Mr. GILES said, he had experienced extreme inconvenience from gentlemen pressing for a subject before it had been matured in the minds of members; he thought it would be extremely improper and unusual, and in its consequences disagreeable, to go into the subject before gentlemen had time to reflect on it.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, that the more expeditious the House were on the answer to the PRESIDENT's Address the greater the effect of it would be. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no delay. He had in recollection a Message which was received from the PRESIDENT respecting the Colors of the French Republic, at the last session. Those very gentlemen who now wished a delay, then thought that, to let the subject lie over, would lose its principal effect, although several of the members wished it to lie over, and but for one day. Surely we have as much respect for the PRESIDENT as we have for the French Republic. He really hoped the business would not lie over.

Mr. W. LYMAN hoped gentlemen did not look upon this answer to the PRESIDENT's Address as merely complimentary. He declared he took it up in a very different light; he viewed it as of the most extensive consequence; it related to the subjects recommended to the notice of the House by the PRESIDENT, which might relate to the alteration of the laws, and, perhaps, to the forming new laws; and could gentlemen have time to form their minds on such an important part of their business? He had only seen the report this morning, and hoped he should have time to consider it before it passed through the House.

The SPEAKER said, that the subject before the House now was, whether the unfinished business should be postponed in order to make room for a Committee of the Whole to sit on the report of the committee on the answer?

Mr. PARKER observed, that he could not say whether he approved or disapproved of the answer before the House. He had not read the report; he therefore hoped that the unfinished business would be taken up and this postponed: he thought it was too important to be hastened. He wished gentlemen to be very careful how they committed themselves at a juncture so critical, and on business so momentous. We had just been told by the PRESIDENT that we did not stand well with the French nation; and the Senate, in their answer, had accorded with his observations on that subject. [Mr. P. was here informed that the business of the Senate ought not to be introduced here.] He therefore hoped a day might be allowed to take the subject into consideration.

Address to the President.

MR. WILLIAMS said, he had searched and could find no precedent in the Journal to encourage a delay of this business. He found that when a report was made by the committee on such an occasion, it was usual to be taken up by a Committee of the Whole House; and if gentlemen disagreed on the subject, it should be recommitted to the same committee who formed it, to make such alterations whereby it may meet more general approbation, or be amended by the House and passed. He hoped no new precedent would be made.

The SPEAKER again observed, that the question was on postponing the unfinished business to take up this report.

MR. W. SMITH said, that if this business was delayed it ought to be for substantial reasons. The principal reason gentlemen had urged was, that they had not had time to acquaint themselves with the answer. How, then, he asked, could they make their observations on it as they had done? The committee had, he thought, draughted it in such general terms that it could not be generally disapproved. There are but two parts in which he thought there would be differences of opinion, viz: that which related to the French Republic, and that which complimented the PRESIDENT for his services. As to the first, he thought it so expressed as to need no delay in the answer. With respect to the latter, he hoped no gentleman would refuse to pay a due regard to the PRESIDENT's services.

The SPEAKER again informed the House what was the question.

MR. W. SMITH said, we ought not now to reflect on any thing we may judge has not been done as we could wish. Could we refuse a tribute of respect to a man who had served his country so much? He thought a delay at present would have a very unpleasant appearance. He hoped we should go into this business immediately, agreeably to the former practice of the House on similar occasions. The unfinished business was yesterday postponed for want of proper information, and he thought the same reason was yet in force with respect to it. He hoped nothing would impede this business, lest it should appear like a want of respect in us. He hoped to see an unanimous vote in favor of a respectful answer to the Chief Magistrate, whose services we ought zealously to acknowledge.

MR. GILBERT saw no reason to depart from a practice which had been usual; he therefore hoped the report might come under consideration to-day. He thought if it laid on the table an hour or an hour and a half, gentlemen could then be prepared to consider it.

The SPEAKER again put the House in mind of the question.

MR. NICHOLAS said, if the business was pressed too precipitately, gentlemen may be sensible of their error when it was too late. Many bad consequences might attend hastening the subject before it was well matured. He could see no reason why the business should be precipitated upon the House—a proper delay would not show any want of respect to the PRESIDENT, as some gentlemen think. Would it be more respectful that an answer should be sent by this House, which, for want of time, had not been sufficiently considered? Certainly not. Far more so will it appear that after mature deliberation the members are unanimous in their answer. I therefore think the object of respect which the gentleman from North Carolina has in view will be completely answered by the delay.

Gentlemen talk about precedent. I am ashamed to hear them. There may be no precedent on the subject. But are we always to act by precedent? There is scarcely a circumstance occurs in this House but what is different from any that was before it. The PRESIDENT's Addresses to this House are always different. They relate to the circumstances of things that are, have been, and may be. Then, to talk of precedents where things cannot be alike, is to trammel men down by rules which would be injurious in the issue.

The Message of the PRESIDENT respecting the French Colors had been referred to. If gentlemen were then wrong, is that a reason why they should continue to act wrong? But this circumstance materially differs from that. That was merely an expression of sentiment, which could at once be determined, but this of sentiment, accompanied with deep and solemn reflection—it is so interwoven with the politics of the country as to require great circumspection. I hope gentlemen will not go into it until they are properly prepared. I wish to pay all possible respect to the Chief Magistrate, and cannot prove it better than by a sincere desire for an unanimous vote to the answer, which is only to be obtained by proper deliberation; and thus let him depart from his office with credit, and the enjoyment of our best wishes in his retirement.

The question for postponing the unfinished business to take up this report was then put and negatived—43 to 31.

The motion was then made for the order of the day on the petition of Henry Hill.

MR. D. FOSTER hoped the business would be further postponed, as the necessary information on the subject had not been obtained. It was accordingly postponed.

MR. W. SMITH again moved for the House to take up the answer to the PRESIDENT's Speech.

MR. MACON said, this was taking two different measures to accomplish the same object. He thought it was not in order, therefore should oppose it.

The SPEAKER said, the motion was perfectly in order. The other motion was, whether the unfinished business was to be delayed to make room for the answer; which unfinished business had now been dispensed with. A motion may now be made to fix this subject to a day certain, which would supersede the other motion.

MR. NICHOLAS then moved that this business be postponed till to-morrow.

MR. COIT hoped it would be postponed. This committee was appointed last Thursday, but had not made their report till yesterday. He found the answer on the desk this morning, but had not read it; and, though he had such confidence in the gentlemen who drew it up, as that he was now ready to vote for it, yet, as many gentlemen wished to consider it, he thought they ought not to be pressed to vote too hastily. He hoped the motion would be carried.

The motion was put and carried for a postponement.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

THOMAS HENDERSON, from New Jersey, and THOMAS HARTLEY, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took their seats in the House.

A Letter was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, with proposals for laying on direct taxes; which, with all the papers accompanying the same, were, on motion of Mr. MACON, ordered to be printed.

HENRY HILL.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Henry Hill, was the order of this day, and, having a priority to other business, should now be taken up.

Mr. D. FOSTER observed, that, on account of not being able to obtain the papers necessary to throw a proper light on the subject, he hoped the consideration of it would be postponed or recommitted. There are several of the members of the committee not sufficiently acquainted with the business; it therefore required time before it could be acted on.

Mr. HEATH hoped that it would be recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

The Committee of the Whole was then discharged, from a further consideration of the case, and the report was recommitted.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. W. SMITH moved for the order of the day on the petitions of Thomas Lloyd and Thomas Carpenter, whereupon the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, when, having read the report of the committee to whom it was referred,

Mr. MACON wished some gentleman who was in that committee, would be so good as to inform the House what would be the probable expense, and for what reason the House should go into the business. He thought the expense altogether unnecessary, whatever it may be.

If the debates of this House were to be printed, and four or five copies given to each member, they would employ all the mails of the United States. He also adverted to the attempt at the last session to introduce a stenographer into the House, which failed.

Mr. SMITH informed the gentleman that Mr. Lloyd's estimate of the expenses is, that he will supply the House with his reports at the rate of three cents per half sheet. His calculation is that he can supply the members at the expense of about $1,600 for the session. With respect to the gentleman's reference to last session, this was materially different from that: that motion was to make the person an officer of this House, and at an expense much greater. He thought this attempt would be of great use to the House. Regular and accurate information of the debates in the House would be a very desirable thing; he therefore hoped the resolution would prove agreeable to the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, that the House need not go into unnecessary expense: the members were now furnished, morning and evening, with newspapers which contained the debates; then why should the House wish for more? If one person in particular has the sale of his debates to this House, will it not destroy the advantages any other can derive from it? We ought not to encourage an undertaking of this kind, but let us encourage any gentlemen to come here and take down the debates. Last year they were taken down very accurately and dispersed throughout the Union.

By passing this resolution you will destroy the use of the privilege to any other than the person favored by this House. Why give one a privilege more than another? He observed, it had been common to give gentlemen the privilege to come into the House and take down the debates, which had been, last year, delivered time enough to give satisfaction to the members.

Mr. THATCHER said, he should wish for information from the committee how many persons there were to publish debates, as he understood there were several, and the members were to supply themselves from whom they pleased. He should likewise wish for information, how many each member was to have to amount to the value of $1,600?

Mr. W. SMITH said, there had been petitions received from only two persons—Thomas Lloyd and Thomas Carpenter. They intended, each of them, to publish the debates. There might be others; he knew not. There was no intention of giving any one a preference—gentlemen could subscribe for that they approved of most. At the calculation of Mr. Lloyd the members would have five copies each for the $1,600.

Mr. W. LYMAN said, the question was, whether the House would incur the expense of $1,600 to supply the members with copies or not? He thought there was no need of the expense. If the House do not think proper to furnish the members, they can supply themselves. A publication of them is going on at present, and many gentlemen had subscribed to it already.

Mr. DEARBORN did not think that $1,600 thus laid out would be expended to the best possible advantage. From the number of persons which we see here daily taking down debates, he thought we might expect to see a good report of the occurrences in the House. There was a book going about for subscriptions, which appeared to be well encouraged; he saw many of the members names in it. He thought that, by a plan like that, the reports may be as accurately taken as we may have any reason to expect if the House incurs this expense.

Reporting of the Debates.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. NICHOLAS observed, that members were now served with three newspapers. He thought to vote for this resolution on account of obtaining a more full and complete report than was to be had in the newspapers; thus it would supersede the necessity of taking so many papers. He thought this plan more useful to the member, and generally of more advantage to their constituents, as they could disperse those debates where otherwise they would not be seen.

Mr. THATCHER said, if the object of the motion was to supersede the receiving of newspapers, he certainly should vote against it. He did not consider the main reason why members were served with the newspapers was, that they may obtain the debates. No. He thought it more important, in their stations, that they should know the occurrences of the day from the various parts of the United States as well as from foreign nations. Though he might favor an undertaking of this kind, yet he would give preference to a newspaper, if they were to have the one without the other.

Mr. HEATH did not wish that the members, being furnished with debates agreeably to the motion, should supersede the receiving of newspapers, yet he should vote for it. Gentlemen had said the debates were taken more correctly last session than before, yet he had heard a whisper which was going from North to South, that our debates are not represented impartially. He wished the House and the people to be furnished with a true report; such a thing would be very useful: however, he did not wish to encourage a monopoly to those two persons. No. He would wish to give an equal chance to all who choose to come and take them. Shall we repress truth? I hope not; but disseminate it as much as possible. Last session, when I was, under the act of God's providence, prevented from attending the House, a member sent for a gentleman from Virginia, who was to act as stenographer, with whom the House and a printer in this city were to combine. Warm debates ensued on the propriety of the measure, and the gentleman returned home after the motion was negatived. I hope gentlemen will not grudge 1,600 dollars towards the support of truth. What we see now in the newspapers is taken from the memory, and not by a stenographer. The people will thank you that you have taken means to investigate truth. If any gentleman can point out a better mode to obtain this object, I hope he will do it that it may be adopted; till then I shall support the resolution.

Mr. SHERBURNE did not think, with the gentleman last up, that the interest of the country was concerned; the only thing they were concerned in was the payment of the money. The printing of this work did not depend on the motion of this House. Whether the House adopt it or not, the book will be published. It is a matter of private interest; a speculation in the adventurer, like other publications. The question, he conceived, meant only this: Should the members be supplied with these pamphlets at the expense of the public, or should they put their hands in their own pockets and pay for them individually? He thought the House had no greater reasons to supply the members with this work than other publications; they might as well be furnished with the works of Peter Porcupine, or the Rights of Man, at the public expense.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the gentleman was mistaken with respect to the work going on, whether supported by the House or not. It was true as it respected the work proposed by Mr. Carpenter; but, with respect to Mr. Lloyd, he declared he could not undertake it, except the House would subscribe for five copies for each member.

Mr. SWANWICK considered the question to be to this effect: whether the debates be under the sanction of the House or not? A gentleman had said, it will be a great service to the public to have a correct statement of the debates. I think the most likely way to obtain it correctly is to let it rest on the footing of private industry. We have a work, entitled The Senator, in circulation. I have no doubt but the publisher will find good account in the undertaking. Why should the House trouble itself to sanction any particular work? Gentlemen would then have enough to do every morning in putting the debates to rights before they were published, as they would be pledged to the accuracy of the reports. I never heard that, in the British House of Commons or Lords, such a motion was ever made, nor have I ever heard of such in any other country; then why should we give our sanction and incur a responsibility for the accuracy of it. He said he should vote against the motion, but would encourage such a work while it rested on the footing of private adventure.

Mr. THATCHER said, he differed much from the gentleman last up, as it respected the responsibility of the House on such a publication. He thought it might as well be said, that because there had been a resolution for the Clerk to furnish the members of this House with three newspapers, the House was responsible for the truth of what those newspapers contained; if it was so, he should erase his name from his supply of them, as he thought, in general, they contained more lies than truth. Two considerations might recommend the resolution. It would encourage the undertaking, and also add to the stock of public information: on either of these, he would give it his assent. Soon after he came into the city, a paper was handed him with proposals for a publication of this kind (The Senator.) He, with pleasure, subscribed to its support; as to general information, that was given already by newspapers, and though each member was to be supplied with five copies, yet very few would fall into hands where the newspapers did not reach. The work would go forward at any rate. If he thought the work depended on the motion, he should rejoice to give his vote toward its aid. On the question being put, only nineteen gentlemen voted in favor of the resolution; it was therefore negatived.

Address to the President.

The Committee then rose, and the House took up the resolution.

Mr. THATCHER observed, the question was put while he was inattentive: he wished it to lie over till to-morrow.

Mr. GILES wished to indulge the gentleman in his desire.

Mr. THATCHER then moved for the vote of the House, whether the report of the Committee of the Whole be postponed. Twenty-four members only appearing for the postponement, it was negatived.

The question was then put, whether the House agreed to the report of the Committee of the Whole and disagreed with the report of the select committee; which appeared in the affirmative. The motion was therefore lost.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Answer to the PRESIDENT'S Address; when the Answer reported by the select committee was read by the Clerk, and then in paragraphs by the Chairman, which is as follows:

SIR: The House of Representatives have attended to your communication respecting the state of our country, with all the sensibility that the contemplation of the subject and a sense of duty can inspire.

We are gratified by the information that measures calculated to insure a continuance of the friendship of the Indians, and to maintain the tranquility of the interior frontier, have been adopted; and we indulge the hope that these, by impressing the Indian tribes with more correct conceptions of the justice, as well as power of the United States, will be attended with success.

While we notice, with satisfaction, the steps that you have taken in pursuance of the late Treaties with several foreign nations, the liberation of our citizens who were prisoners at Algiers is a subject of peculiar felicitation. We shall cheerfully co-operate in any further measures that shall appear, on consideration, to be requisite.

We have ever concurred with you in the most sincere and uniform disposition to preserve our neutral relations inviolate; and it is, of course, with anxiety and deep regret we hear that any interruption of our harmony with the French Republic has occurred; for we feel with you and with our constituents the cordial and unabated wish to maintain a perfectly friendly understanding with that nation. Your endeavors to fulfil that wish, [and by all honorable means to preserve peace, and to restore that harmony and affection which have heretofore so happily subsisted between the French Republic and the United States,] cannot fail, therefore, to interest our attention. And while we participate in the full reliance you have expressed on the patriotism, self-respect, and fortitude of our countrymen, we cherish the pleasing hope that a mutual spirit of justice and moderation on the part of the Republic will insure the success of your perseverance.

The various subjects of your communication will, respectively, meet with the attention that is due to their importance.

When we advert to the internal situation of the United States, we deem it equally natural and becoming to compare the tranquil prosperity of the citizens with the period immediately antecedent to the operation of the Government, and to contrast it with the calamities in which the state of war still involves several of the European nations, as the reflections deduced from both tend to justify, as well as to excite, a warmer admiration of our free Constitution, and to exalt our minds to a more fervent and grateful sense of piety towards Almighty God for the beneficence of His providence, by which its administration has been hitherto so remarkably distinguished.

And while we entertain a grateful conviction that your wise, firm, and patriotic Administration has been signally conducive to the success of the present form of Government, we cannot forbear to express the deep sensations of regret with which we contemplate your intended retirement from office.

As no other suitable occasion may occur, we cannot suffer the present to pass without attempting to disclose some of the emotions which it cannot fail to awaken.

The gratitude and admiration of your countrymen are still drawn to the recollection of those resplendent virtues and talents which were so eminently instrumental to the achievement of the Revolution, and of which that glorious event will ever be the memorial. Your obedience to the voice of duty and your country, when you quitted reluctantly a second time the retreat you had chosen, and first accepted the Presidency, afforded a new proof of the devotedness of your zeal in its service, and an earnest of the patriotism and success which have characterized your Administration. As the grateful confidence of the citizens in the virtues of their Chief Magistrate has essentially contributed to that success, we persuade ourselves that the millions whom we represent participate with us in the anxious solicitude of the present occasion.

Yet we cannot be unmindful that your moderation and magnanimity, twice displayed by retiring from your exalted stations, afford examples no less rare and instructive to mankind than valuable to a Republic.

Although we are sensible that this event, of itself, completes the lustre of a character already conspicuously unrivalled by the coincidence of virtue, talents, success, and public estimation, yet we conceive that we owe it to you, sir, and still more emphatically to ourselves and to our nation (of the language of whose hearts we presume to think ourselves at this moment the faithful interpreters) to express the sentiments with which it is contemplated.

The spectacle of a whole nation, the freest and most enlightened in the world, offering by its Representatives the tribute of unfeigned approbation to its first citizen, however novel and interesting it may be, derives all its lustre—a lustre which accident or enthusiasm could not bestow, and which adulation would tarnish—from the transcendent merit of which it is the voluntary testimony.

May you long enjoy that liberty which is so dear to you, and to which your name will ever be so dear. May your own virtues and a nation's prayers obtain the happiest sunshine for the decline of your days and the choicest of future blessings. For your country's sake—for the sake of Republican liberty—it is our earnest wish that your example may be the guide of your successors; and thus, after being the ornament and safeguard of the present age, become the patrimony of our descendants.

Mr. VENABLE observed, on a paragraph wherein it speaks of the "tranquility of the interior frontier," he did not know what was the meaning of the expression: he moved to insert "Western frontier" in its stead.

Mr. AMES observed that the words of the report

DECEMBER, 1796.]

Address to the President.

[H. OF R.]

are in the PRESIDENT'S Speech; however, he thought the amendment a good one. It then passed.

In the fourth paragraph are these words: "Your endeavors to fulfil that wish cannot fail, therefore, to interest our attention." At the word "wish," Mr. GILES proposed to insert these words: "and by all honorable means to preserve peace, and restore that harmony and affection which have heretofore so happily subsisted between the French Republic and this country;" and strike out the words that follow "wish" in that paragraph. He said, his reasons for moving this amendment were to avoid its consequences. He really wished the report entirely recommitted, as there were many objectionable parts in it. He had been very seriously impressed with the consequences that would result from a war with the French Republic. When I reflect, said Mr. G., on the calamities of war in general, I shudder at the thought; but, to conceive of the danger of a French war in particular, it cuts me still closer. When I think what many gentlemen in mercantile situations now feel, and the dreadful stop put to commerce, I feel the most sincere desire to cultivate harmony and good understanding. I see redoubled motives to show the world that we are in favor of a preservation of peace and harmony.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he should not object to the amendment; but he thought it only an amplification of a sentiment just before expressed. He did not see any advantage in the sentiment as dilated, nor could he see any injury which could accrue from it. He hoped every gentleman in the House wished as sincerely for the preservation of peace as that gentleman did.

Mr. AMES wished to know of the gentleman from Virginia, whether he meant to strike out the latter part of this paragraph; if he did, he would object to it.

Mr. GILES said, he did not mean to strike out any more of this paragraph.

Mr. AMES wished it not to be struck out. By the amendment to strike out, we show the dependence we place on the power and protection of the French. While we declare ourselves weak by the act, we lose the recourse to our own patriotism, and fly, acknowledging an offence never committed, to the French for peace. He hoped the gentleman would be candid upon this occasion.

Mr. GILES said, he only wished this House to express their most sincere and unequivocal desire in favor of peace, and not merely to leave it to the PRESIDENT. He said, he had spoken upon this occasion as he always had done on this floor. He always had, and he hoped always should, state his opinions upon every subject with plainness and candor.

The amendment passed unanimously.

Mr. GILES then proposed an amendment to the latter part of the same paragraph, which would make it read thus: "We cherish the pleasing hope that a spirit of mutual justice and moderation will insure the success of your perseverance." The amendment was to insert the word "mutual." He thought we ought to display a spirit of justice and moderation as well as the French. This amendment, he thought, would soften the expression, and, acting with that spirit of justice and moderation, accomplish a reconciliation. The amendment was adopted.

On the Chairman's reading the last paragraph except one in the report, which reads thus: "The spectacle of a whole nation, the freest and most enlightened in the world," Mr. PARKER moved to strike out the words in italic. Although, said he, I wish to believe that we are the freest people, and the most enlightened people in the world, it is enough that we think ourselves so; it is not becoming in us to make the declaration to the world; and if we are not so, it is still worse for us to suppose ourselves what we are not.

Mr. HARPER said, he had a motion of amendment in his hand which would supersede the necessity of the last made, which, if in order, he would propose: it was to insert words more simple. He thought the more simple, the more agreeable to the public ear. His amendment, he thought, would add to the elegance and conciseness of the expression. He did not disapprove of the Address as it now stood, but he thought it might be amended. This, he said, would add to the dignity, as well as to the simplicity of the expression. He thought it would be improper to give too much scope to feeling: amplitude of expression frequently weakens an idea.

Mr. GILES said he saw many objectionable parts in the amendments proposed by the gentleman just sat down. He wished to strike out two paragraphs more than Mr. HARPER had proposed; indeed, he wished the whole to be recommitted, that it might be formed more congenial to the wishes of the House in general, and not less agreeable to the person to be addressed.

Mr. SMITH observed, that, as the Answer had been read by paragraphs nearly to the close, he thought it very much out of order to return to parts so distant.

The Chairman said that no paragraph on which an amendment had been made could be returned to; but where no amendment had been made, it was quite consistent with order to propose any one gentleman may think proper.

Mr. HARPER thought the maxim recommended in private life might be very applicable to us at this time, which is, Never to leave till to-morrow what can be as well done to-day. He was quite opposed to a recommitment, and his reason was, that the House at this time is quite competent to adopt all the necessary amendments. In cases of law, when evidences are to be collected in order to prove facts, it may sometimes be proper to delay; but here is no such thing. The Committee of the Whole can as well amend it as a select committee. Surely it may be made more complete by a large number than by a small. We have every means of information, and full power to do it now, and a delay is quite unnecessary. There are no points now unknown to the House; we are in possession of a complete knowledge of the whole, and can now form our minds on it; it is simple matter, on which we can soon decide. He hoped we should speedily conclude, on a subject of this nature, an Answer to the PRESIDENT, which can as well be done now as a month hence.

Address to the President.

Mr. W. SMITH opposed striking out any paragraph. It was, he said, the last occasion we should have to address that great man, who had done so much service to his country. The warmth of expression in the Answer was only an evidence of the gratitude of this House for his character. When we reflect on the glowing language used at the time when he accepted of the office of PRESIDENT, and at his re-election to that office, why, asked he, ought not the language of this House to be as full of respect and gratitude now as then? particularly when we consider the addresses now flowing in from all parts of the country. I object to the manner of gentlemen's amendments as proposed, to strike out all in a mass. If the sentiments were agreeable to the minds of the House, why waste our time to alter mere expressions while the sentiment is preserved? No doubt every gentleman's manner of expression differed, while their general ideas might be the same. He hoped mere form of expression would not cause its recommitment.

Mr. GILES did not object to a respectful and complimentary Address being sent to the PRESIDENT, yet he thought we ought not to carry our expressions out of the bounds of moderation; he hoped we should adhere to truth. He objected to some of the expressions in those paragraphs, for which reason he moved to have the paragraphs struck out, in order to be amended by the committee. He wished to act as respectful to the PRESIDENT as any gentleman, but he observed many parts of the Address which were objectionable. It is unnatural and unbecoming in us to exult in our superior happiness, light, or wisdom. It is not at all necessary that we should exult in our advantages, and thus reflect on the unhappy situation of nations in their troubles; it is insulting to them. If we are thus happy it is well for us; it is necessary that we should enjoy our happiness, but not boast of it to all the world, and insult their unhappy situations.

As to those parts of the Address which speak of the wisdom and firmness of the PRESIDENT, he must object to them. On reflection, he could see a want of wisdom and firmness in the Administration for the last six years. I may be singular in my ideas, said he, but I believe our Administration has been neither wise nor firm. I believe, sir, a want of wisdom and firmness has brought this country into the present alarming situation. If after such a view of the Administration, I was to come into this House and show the contrary by a quiet acquiescence, gentlemen would think me a very inconsistent character. If we take a view of our foreign relations, we shall see no reason to exult in the wisdom or firmness of our Administration. He thought nothing so much as a want of that wisdom and firmness had brought us to the critical situation in which we now stand.

If it had been the will of gentlemen to have been satisfied with placing the PRESIDENT in the highest possible point of respect amongst men, the vote of the House would have been unanimous, but the proposal of such adulation could never expect success. If we take a view into our internal situation, and behold the ruined state of public and private credit, less now than perhaps at any former period however, he never could recollect it so deranged. If we survey this city, what a shameful scene it alone exhibits, owing, as he supposed, to the immense quantity of paper issued. Surely this could afford no ground for admiration of the Administration that caused it.

I must acknowledge, said Mr. GILES, that I am one of those who do not think so much of the PRESIDENT as some others do. When the PRESIDENT retires from his present station, I wish him to enjoy all possible happiness. I wish him to retire, and that this was the moment of his retirement. He thought the Government of the United States could go on very well without him; and he thought he would enjoy more happiness in his retirement than he possibly could in his present situation. What calamities would attend the United States, and how short the duration of its Independence, if one man alone can be found to fill that capacity! He thought there were thousands of citizens in the United States able to fill that high office, and he doubted not that many may be found whose talents would enable them to fill it with credit and advantage. Although much had been said, and that by many people, about his intended retirement, yet he must acknowledge he felt no uncomfortable sensations about it; he must express his own feelings. He was perfectly easy in prospect of the event. He wished the PRESIDENT as much happiness as any man. He declared he did not regret his retreat; he wished him quietly at his seat at Mount Vernon; he thought he would enjoy more happiness there than in public life. It will be very extraordinary if gentlemen, whose names in the yeas and nays are found in opposition to certain prominent measures of the Administration, should come forward and approve those measures: this we could not expect. He retained an opinion he had always seen reason to support, and no influence under Heaven should prevent him expressing his established sentiments; and he thought the same opinions would soon meet general concurrence. He hoped gentlemen would compliment the PRESIDENT privately, as individuals; at the same time, he hoped such adulation would never pervade that House.

I must make some observation, said Mr. G., on the last paragraph but one, where we call ourselves "the freest and most enlightened nation in the world:" indeed, the whole of that paragraph is objectionable; I disapprove the whole of it. If I am free, if I am happy, if I am enlightened more than others, I wish not to proclaim it on the house top; if we are free, it is not prudent to declare it; if enlightened, it is not our duty in this House to trumpet it to the world: it is no Legislative concern. If gentlemen will examine the paragraph, (referring to that contained in the parenthesis,) it seems to prove that the gentleman who drew it up was going into the field of adulation; which would tarnish a private character. I do think this kind of affection the PRESIDENT gains nothing from. The many long Addresses we hear of, add nothing to the lustre of his character. In the honor we may attempt to give to others we may hurt ourselves. This may prove a self-destroyer; by relying too much on administration, we may rely too little on our own strength.

Address to the President.

[H. OF R.]

Another expression I would notice is in the last paragraph, wherein it says, "that your example may be the guide of your successors." I think it time enough to speak of the successor of the PRESIDENT when he arrives; whoever he may be, there is no doubt but he will do his duty to the best of his ability.

These sentiments seemed to be so mixed, that I could not separate them. I submit them to the Committee, and declare my desire that the whole of the report may be recommended.

Mr. HARPER thought it would be strictly in order to move a division of the question on this motion. The paragraph which he had the honor of moving to this House, instead of the seventh paragraph, was wholly personal to the PRESIDENT; the other, immediately preceeding this, which the gentleman last up included, related wholly to the country; it contained objects of great importance, and as the two so materially differ from each other, many gentlemen might wish to retain one, and strike the other out. The first question would naturally be on the first of the two. "When we advert," &c. He hoped this paragraph would not be struck out; this related altogether to the situation, to the happiness of the country, and its prosperity, and relates to the influence our happy Constitution has had towards producing and preserving that state of enjoyment. Could this be denied? Is there any man here, he would ask, who can deny that we are in a prosperous state, and that it is heightened by our present Constitution? I must assert that our prosperity is produced through the instrumentality of the wise system adopted. There may be degrees of prosperity, and different opinions on the subject. Some might think that the trifling derangements which have of late taken place in the commercial world are evidences of our want of prosperity. I think not. Some think such things are no proofs of a country's decline. Though the gentleman from Virginia has attributed the late failures in this city to the too great emission of paper money by Government, he must beg leave to differ from him; he thought it no proof of the want of prosperity. Will any man pretend to say that we are not free? That we are not happy? That our trade is less flourishing than formerly? That our agriculture was not increasing, or that our laws were less obeyed than usual? No; he thought none could deny this. And will any, can any say, that our present form of Government has not had an influence in producing this flourishing state of our affairs? Will any say, that had not such a form of Government been established, or a similar one, we should have been so free, so happy? He thought not. When we take a view of our situation before the existence of the present form of Government with respect to agriculture, trade, and commerce, and brought the comparison up to the present time, then he was persuaded gentlemen would acknowledge that we enjoyed a state of prosperity, and if we enjoyed it, wherein was the harm to declare it? We are in a very great degree prosperous, and that is in a very great degree owing to the present established Government.

The measures which this gentleman would wish to adopt might produce a system more happy: however, he did not think it would. That already adopted has been productive of great national happiness. We feel freedom exists; whence do we suppose it proceeds, but from the measures of Government? If this be the case, gentlemen must allow that in the words of the paragraph proposed to be struck out, there is not that impropriety imagined. If they concur with me in all those sentiments, (and which of them will say he does not concur in them,) where is the propriety to refuse the clause in the Address? I hope, said Mr. H., they will say with me, that the clause should stand, as containing an acknowledgment of our superior situation to the Government where it is due. He hoped the question would be divided.

Mr. NICHOLAS said it could not be divided. The gentleman last up must be mistaken to suppose so. The member may vote against the proposition of Mr. GILES, but either all must go, or none, according to the motion.

Some conversation here ensued between Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. GILES, and the Chairman, about a point of order in striking it out.

Mr. GILES then said, gentlemen might refuse to strike out the whole, and then move to strike out a part; and so attain their object. But, said he, admitting the paragraph to be founded on truth, were they, as legislators, to speak it in the face of the world? It is a matter of doubt; but suppose it true, what have we to do with it here? Suppose an individual were to go into his neighbor's house, and say to him, I am very rich, and you are poor; I am very happy, and you are miserable, would not his neighbor think it meant to insult him? Would it not degrade the poor man's misery? This conduct would surely be indelicate; and if indelicate and inconsistent in an individual, let us take every means to avoid this conduct as a nation.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, that whatever division of the question gentlemen would propose, was indifferent to him; the words of the answer were perfectly congenial with his wishes, and he was prepared to give his opposition to any of the amendments proposed. On mature deliberation, there was not a sentiment in the report but he highly approved. He could not see any thing unnatural or unbecoming in drawing just comparisons of our situation with that of our neighbors; this is the only way we can form a just view of our own happiness. It is a very necessary way to come to a right knowledge of our own situation by comparing it with that of other nations. He would not reproach another people because they are not so happy as we are; but he thought drawing simple comparisons in the way of the report was no reproach. He was not against bringing the comparison down to private life, as the gentleman from Virginia had done; he should think it wrong in a man to exult over his neighbor who was distressed or ignorant, because himself was wealthy or wise. Yet he saw no impropriety in his own family of speaking of their happiness and advantages, compared with that of others; it would awaken in them a grateful sense of their superior enjoyments, while it pointed out the faults and follies of others, only in order that those he had the care of may learn to avoid them: thus while our happiness is pointed out, the miseries of nations involved in distress are delineated to serve as beacons for the United States to steer clear of. He did not, with the gentleman from Virginia, in any degree, doubt of the wisdom or firmness of the Administration of America. In the language of the Address, he entertained a very high opinion of it, "a grateful conviction that the wise, firm, and patriotic Administration of the PRESIDENT had been signally conducive to the success of the present form of Government." Such language as this is the only reward which can be given by a grateful people for labors so eminently useful as those of the PRESIDENT had been. This was not his sentiment merely, it was the sentiment of the people of America. Every public body were conveying their sentiments of gratitude throughout the whole extent of the Union. Why then should this House affect a singularity, when our silence on these points would only convey reproach instead of respect. If these sentiments were true, why not express them? But if, on the contrary, what the gentleman asserted, that the Administration of the PRESIDENT had been neither wise, firm, nor patriotic, then he would concur with the motion for striking out; but he was not convinced of the truth of this assertion; and while this is not proved, he should vote against the motion.

Address to the President.

It has been said, sir, that the disagreeable circumstances which have lately occurred between this country and France is owing to a want of judgment in our Administration; his opinion, he said, was directly the contrary. He had occasion on a recent circumstance, at the last session, to express his opinion, it was the opinion of the House, and he thought it had not changed since that time. He saw no reason why the state of private credit should influence the deliberations of that House. He thought it not at all imputable to the Administration, nor should it be mentioned to tarnish the lustre of our state of prosperity; it is no more than a speck in the sun. It should not be mentioned to prevent our expressions of the obligations which we owe to the PRESIDENT for his services. As well might the late dreadful fires at Savannah and New York be imputable to a want of wisdom in the Administration. Why are we not told of them as well as the derangements among a few merchants? Such trivial matters were not to be spoken of in a national view. If that gentleman [Mr. GILES] does not regret the PRESIDENT's retreat from office, I do; and I believe America does: and this regret is not improper nor undignified.

That gentleman has said there are many others in America capable of filling the office. It may be so; there doubtless are; I do not wish to draw a comparison between the PRESIDENT and others. But does it follow thence that we should not regret losing a faithful public servant? We should regret him on account of his attachment to our Constitution—on account of the tried confidence universally placed in him. Confidence in the officers of Government under every form is necessary, and most particularly so in a Republican form: it is the vital principle whereby it is kept in existence—the chief source of its energy. We could not expect that so great a portion of public confidence would be laid on his successor, although he may be a man of equal integrity.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, he could not agree with the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HARPER,] because his motion was for substituting other words in the place of those in the report, without any reason whatever. If the gentleman, by altering the phraseology, can make the sentiment any better, by all means let it be done: but if the sentiment is not to be changed, why alter it merely to substitute other words? On the whole, Mr. S. observed, that he did not see the answer could in any degree be reproached. There are no sentiments in it but what are justifiable on the ground of truth: they are free from adulation. It is such an expression of national regret and gratitude as the circumstance calls for; a regret at the retirement of a faithful and patriotic Chief Magistrate from office. A regret and gratitude which he believed to be the sentiment of Americans.

Mr. SWANWICK began by observing that there were points in the Address in which all gentlemen seemed to agree, while on other parts they cannot agree. We all agree in our desire to pay the PRESIDENT every possible mark of respect; but we very materially disagree wherein a comparison is drawn between this and foreign nations. If we are happy and other nations are not so, it is but well for us; but he thought it would be much more prudent in us to let other nations discover it, and not make a boast of it ourselves. It is very likely that those nations whom we commiserate may think themselves as happy as we are: they may feel offended to hear of our comparisons. If we refer to the British Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speeches, he would tell us that is the happiest and most prosperous nation upon earth. How then can we commiserate with it as an unfortunate country? If, again, we look to France, that country which we have pointed out as full of wretchedness and distress, yet we hear them boast of their superiority of light and freedom, and we have reason to believe not without foundation. A gentleman had talked about the flourishing state of our agriculture, and asserted that our late commercial calamities were not proofs of our want of prosperity, which the gentleman compared to specks in the sun. That gentleman speaks as though he lived at a distance. Has he heard of no commercial distresses, when violations so unprecedented have of late occurred?

Address to the President.

[H. OF R.]

One merchant has to look for his property at Halifax, another at Bermuda, another at Cape Francois, another at Gonaives, &c., all agree that they have suffered, and that by the war. These are distresses gentlemen would not like to feel themselves. Mr. S. said he had felt for these occurrences. We are not exempt from troubles; probably we may have suffered as much as other nations who are involved in the war. It is a question whether France has been distressed at all by the war. She has collected gold and silver in immense quantities by her conquests, together with the most valuable stores of the productions of the arts; as statues, paintings, and manuscripts of inestimable worth; and at sea has taken far more in value than she has lost: besides, her armies are subsisting on the requisitions her victories obtain. And has England gained nothing by the war? If we hearken to Mr. Pitt, we may believe they are very great gainers. Surely the islands in the West and East Indies, Ceylon, and the Cape of Good Hope, the key to the East Indies, are advantages gained; besides the quantity of shipping taken from our merchants. Mr. S. thought if we were to compare, we should find those nations had gained by the war, while we had lost; and of course there was no reason for us to boast of our advantages.

When we send a ship to sea we cannot possibly know at what port she will arrive; so uncertain is our trade; in consequence of which the rates of insurance are doubled. Our funds are rather on the decline. Agriculture, it is true, is in a prosperous state. However, he thought the present, of all others, was not the time to draw comparisons. What is the probable effect of this kind of conduct? If we are happy, and make a boast of it, it will be sure to beget envy. Nobody is envious of the fortune of the poor, while every one envies the rich. Shall we invite new depreciations upon our commerce by such representations of our prosperity? It is a kind of indirect hostility to vaunt of our happiness, comparing it to nations in adversity: such language ill-becomes this Address. There is great indication of hostility; let us not add to the danger. We might express pleasure at our own situation of affairs without depreciating the prosperity of other nations. The gentleman from Virginia has said, we are the freest and most enlightened nation in the world. Surely this will only have an effect to create rivals and enemies: it will do us no good. I sincerely wish it to be recommitted, that it might be made more agreeable to the will of the House. He said he was sensible that all the House wished to express might be put in the Address, without drawing a comparison between this country and foreign nations: we had enough to do with them already, without taking more. Happy for us, said Mr. S., if we can keep up peace with them. We are every day suffering in our commerce, and in the impressing of our seamen. [He here referred particularly to the cruel treatment of Captain Jessup, who suffered most severely from the discipline of an English man-of-war, although Captain of an American vessel.]

If we have suffered those calamities, it is through a want of power to repress it. The unprotected state of our seamen and shipping, he said, demanded attention. The providing a Navy to support our rights was recommended by the PRESIDENT in his Speech. Many parts of that Address indicated the state of our affairs were not in that prosperous situation which had been represented. Let us then, said Mr. S., improve our own situation as much as possible, but avoid reflecting on other nations.

Mr. W. SMITH next rose, and observed that gentlemen wished to compliment the PRESIDENT, but took away every point on which encomium could be grounded. One denies the prosperity of the country, another the free and enlightened state of the country, and another refuses the PRESIDENT the epithet of wise and patriotic.

Mr. GILES here rose to explain; if he was meant, he must think the gentleman was wrong in his application. He said he had never harbored a suspicion of the good intentions of the PRESIDENT, nor did he deny his patriotism; but the wisdom and firmness of his Administration he had doubted. He thought him a good meaning man, but often misled.

Mr. SMITH again rose, and said, he must confess himself at a loss for that refinement to discover between the wisdom and patriotism of the PRESIDENT, and that of his Administration. It was moved to strike out this acknowledgment of wisdom and firmness. What were we to substitute as complimentary to him in its place? The first paragraph proposed to be struck out related to our speaking of the tranquility of this country, compared to nations involved in war. Could this give offence, because we feel pleasure in being at peace? It was only congratulating our own constituents on the happiness we enjoy. To appreciate the value of peace it was necessary to compare it with a state of war. It was the wisdom of this country to keep from war, and other nations hold it up as exemplary in us. The gentleman himself has declared his wish for the preservation of peace; and though he admires it, and nations admire it in us, yet we are not to compare our state with nations involved in the calamities of war, in order to estimate our enjoyments. The words of this Address are not a communication to a foreign Minister; it is a congratulation to our own Chief Magistrate of the blessings he, in common with us, enjoys. Mr. S. hoped the words would not be struck out.

The gentleman has said that the PRESIDENT had not been either wise or firm, as it respected our foreign relations. Will the gentleman point out one of the acts wherein the PRESIDENT has failed in this respect; let him put his finger on one place and say, here is an instance where he has failed in wisdom, in firmness.

With respect to what the gentleman refers to, when he says the want of wisdom and firmness in the PRESIDENT has brought us into this situation with France, Mr. S. would observe, that the note of the French Minister does not relate to the Executive, but to the Legislative part of our

Address to the President.

Government; there is no act of the PRESIDENT on the subject of a complaint of the French Minister, but what has been also the action of the Congress. How, then, can gentlemen cast the whole blame on him when every act was sanctioned by Congress? If there was any blame, it fell on the Congress. Mr. S. made mention of the act respecting prizes, which act he said passed with very little opposition in this House. Another was the Proclamation of Neutrality, of which we had at that time a general approbation from North to South by the addresses sent. This is what Mr. Adet called "the insidious act." It was as much the act of Congress as of the PRESIDENT. He hoped the influence of foreign Ministers would never separate the PRESIDENT from the other branches of Government, or the Government from the people.

If we are to please some gentlemen, we must not say we are in prosperity; we must not draw a comparison with other nations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] says, France and England say they are happy and prosperous. If those nations say they are prosperous, they surely cannot be offended at our calling ourselves so, as that gentleman supposes; at most they will only laugh at our folly for our comparison.

He said, he was very much surprised, and at a loss to know how the gentleman had changed his opinion so much since the last session; when the British Treaty was before them, he spoke much on the happiness of this country; he mentioned the great increase of commerce and manufactures which had taken place; he said they had outgrown themselves as a boy outgrows his clothes; but that gentleman will not now allow the prosperity of the country to be mentioned. With respect to that part of the Address which mentions our being a free and enlightened people, that had been objected to. He wished to inquire of gentlemen, what nation was so free or enlightened as ours; he wished them to specify one.

In my review of all that I have read, said he, I know of none that enjoy so much civil and religious freedom as America, or is so enlightened, especially in the affairs of Government. Is there any nation on the earth, all things considered, that any gentleman would be willing to exchange for this? He presumed not.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] says he shall not regret the PRESIDENT's retirement from public life; observing that there are many who would fill his place with equal merit. But he would ask, where is the man who enjoys so great a portion of public confidence? Where is the man who could pilot this vessel of State through, amidst the storms and quicksands which this ship has experienced, without a wreck? We may here take a view of the insidious attempts of a foreign Minister (Genet) to involve this country in a war; and of the Western insurrection. Was it not to be regretted that such an useful man should retire from his public station? It has been said there is too much adulation in the report. Truth, sir, cannot be adulation. Let any one point to a place in the Address, and say there is no truth in this? No, sir, it is not adulation; it is justice; it is gratitude; it is only a recital of facts. We never can enough express our grateful obligations to a man who has done so much for us. Let us advert to the time of the PRESIDENT's coming into office, and to his re-election; study the Address that was then presented to him. Had he deserved a forfeiture of the respect then shown to him? Were we to strike out the words in the motion, it would be said that we were not only withholding our praise, but it must be construed into a reproach. If we were to strike out these expressions of gratitude, and some cold, dry compliments be substituted in their place, it would with good reason be judged by some, that he truly did want wisdom; that he had not been conducive to the prosperity of this country, and that he had destroyed public and private credit, and caused other mischiefs which were represented to exist.

When this great man was going to retire forever from public to private life, it would be expected that in the answer we send to his Address, we should express the strongest sentiments of love and gratitude to him for his eminent services to his country. Every State Legislature which has met since he signified his intention to retire, have sent their expressions of approbation and gratitude to him. Why should we alone be silent? Why send him into the shades of retirement with daggers in his heart? Such a mutilated answer as the one proposed, would disgrace him in his retirement.

Gentlemen are opposed to the wish that he might be a guide to his successors; but said Mr. S., I pray God, whoever he may be, he may follow the example, and tread in the steps of the man whose Administration I admire. I think there is nothing in the Address but what is consistent with a due respect to his character, and taking the whole no way liable to the objections made. He, therefore, hoped no alteration whatever would be made.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, that he did not rise to accept the challenge given by the gentleman who spoke last from South Carolina, and to point out a nation more free and enlightened than ours; nor did he mean to contest the fact of ours being the freest and most enlightened in the world as declared in the reported Address, but he was nevertheless of opinion that it did not become them to make that declaration, and thus to extol themselves by a comparison with, and at the expense of all others. Although those words were in his view objectionable, he was far from assenting to the motion for striking out the seven or eight last clauses of the Address. The question of order having been decided, Mr. D. said he would remind the Committee, that, if they wished to retain, or even to amend any section or sentence of all that was proposed to be struck out, they ought to give their negative to this motion, as the only means of accomplishing their purpose. It was sufficient, therefore, for those who were opposed to the question for striking out the whole, to show that any part included within it ought to be preserved. Not unnecessarily to waste time by lengthening the debate he would take the clause first in order, and confine his remarks to that alone. This part of the Address had certainly not been read or had been misunderstood and misrepresented by the member for Pennsylvania.

Did it draw a comparison, as had been suggested by that gentleman, between the relatively happy state of the country in the present, and the year immediately preceding? Did it go further than to say, that the situation of the United States was more prosperous at this period than at that which immediately preceded the operation of the present Government? Certainly it did not; and were proofs necessary to substantiate this fact, or arguments wanted to enforce it? The state of this country under this Government was that of order and union; their situation at the period alluded to was a melancholy scene of disunion and dissolution. This happy change was ascribed and justly ascribed, in the report, to our free and excellent form of Government, and the interposition of an overruling Providence in our national affairs, neither of which he trusted a majority of that House would be prepared to deny or dispute. He could not discern the least possibility of giving offence to other nations in contrasting the blessings derived to this country from a state of peace with the calamity in which a state of war involves those who are so unhappy as to be engaged in it. The expressions were such as could not be construed either to impeach, or indeed to have any allusion to, the forms of Government under which they lived. If those forms were such as best suited the disposition and circumstances of those who had adopted them, and were best calculated to render them happy, surely it must be admitted that war was not less a calamity even to those the most favorably circumstanced in that respect, and it could not therefore be considered a reflection upon them to call it so, nor to deprecate such a state of things, or to contrast it with that of peace, which this country was so happy as to enjoy. He had hoped that the mover, upon reviewing this clause, would have excluded it from his motion; but, as he did not think proper to do so, Mr. D. could say, with great confidence, that a majority of the House could not be found to rise for striking out a proposition which embraced the acknowledgment of a state of good Government as preferable to disunion and anarchy; and a state of war as preferable to that of peace, and contained expressions of gratitude to Providence for an overruling care, signally manifested in our affairs.

Mr. AMES said, if gentlemen meant to agree to strike out the whole as proposed, in order to adopt those words substituted by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER,] he must observe, that he thought this would be as far from giving satisfaction to others, who it appeared wanted no substitute. He, therefore, hoped that kind of influence would not prevail on this occasion. The gentleman who made the motion did it to accommodate matters, and not because he himself objected to the answer reported.

It is well known that a committee of five members, opposite in sentiment, was appointed to prepare a respectful Address in answer to the PRESIDENT'S Speech. [Here the original instructions were read.] As it was the duty of the committee to prepare a respectful Address, it cannot be matter of surprise, although it may of disapprobation with some, that the committee did their duty, and have taken notice of the several matters recommended to the House in that Speech. Respecting the particular notice they have taken, it might have been thought that some difficulty would occur. He said he need not observe that the committee had reason to imagine that the form of the report would be agreeable to the House, as they were unanimous; although there had been in the wording some little difference of opinion, yet all agreed substantially in the Address, from a conviction of the delicacy of the subject. For that reason, if that only, unless the sentiments in the report of the Address should be found inconsistent with truth, he hoped no substitute of a form of words merely would prevail, as it would no longer be that agreed to in the committee, nor could come under their consideration equal to the printed report. He therefore trusted that when the committee came to the question, whether to strike out or not, gentlemen would be guided by no other motive to vote for striking out, than an impropriety in the sentiments through an evident want of truth in them; and if such cannot be discovered, why strike out the expressions?

He said he had no disposition to go into the discussion, nor indeed was he prepared so to do, for, from the unanimity of sentiment which prevailed in the committee, he did not expect it would meet such opposition. When he heard gentlemen come here and doubt the truth of the sentiment contained in the first paragraph in question, he chose to make application to facts; to facts which appeared obvious. If there was one voice in America on any subject, it is a declaration of confidence in our Constitution; it was a well-founded sentiment that the happiness of our present state, and the peace we enjoyed, was owing in a great measure to the wisdom and patriotism of the PRESIDENT. These were facts which could be proved, and which were established, without vouching documents; if it is necessary to produce instances to prove this, I seek it in every man's heart, except the gentleman from Virginia. He appealed to every gentleman; who did not regret the retirement of the PRESIDENT? He thought there was a propriety in making a declaration of this kind, though he meant not to indulge himself in exhibiting by detail. It had been said that we should not compare the flourishing state of this country with the distressed state of European nations; or the state of this country with its situation prior to the existence of the present Constitution. If he mistook not, this was the case. He appealed to good sense, whether a doctrine of this kind was not extravagant? Was it not natural for a man to dwell with delight on his own enjoyments? For a man in prosperous circumstances to increase his own happiness, by drawing comparison with a man not so? The man who did not this, left one-half of his harvest unreaped. But here we are not merely making the declaration of our preference of situation to other nations, but we are making our acknowledgement to the beneficent hand of God, who has thus distinguished us; he wished not to control the consciences of gentlemen, but he thought it both natural and becoming. A just sense of our obligations to this power, and a grateful acknowledgment, is the most proper employment of the mind. And how can a proper estimation of those favors be known, but by drawing comparisons with others in dissimilar situations. Suppose a ship experiences a wreck, and some of the crew are lost; ought not the man who has escaped with his life be thankful, that while his companions perished, he was saved? If, in the dreadful catastrophe of fire, its raging flames are stopped at my next neighbor's house, have I not reason to thank God for stopping it short of my house? What man can be thankful enough at having escaped? He thought it not more unbecoming to introduce such expressions of gratitude in this way, than for a clergyman to introduce them in his daily prayers.

It has been said, that to contrast our state with that of nations at war, would give them offence; but I think it very becoming in us to exult and be thankful too for our state of peace.

If that objection be real, it might be easily obviated by adding "unhappily" after the word "war." It would be improper to exult over the misfortunes of others. By introducing this word, it will show that we deplore their troubles; he thought when calamities did exist in the world, it cannot be wrong that we rejoice because they are not our own.

It had been observed by some gentleman, that the cry of foreign influence is in the country. He did not see such a thing exist. He would not be rudely explicit as to the foundation there was for such a cry; but when it was once raised, the people would judge whether it was fact or not. He could not tell how this influence was produced, but the world would draw a view how far we were under foreign influence. Mr. A. here alluded to the influence which foreign agents wished to have over the minds of the people of this country in order to support a factious spirit, probably to the appeal lately made to the people. He also alluded to a circumstance when the Imperial Envoy, M. Palm, in 1727, at London, published a rescript, complaining of the conduct of that Court; the spirit of the nation rose, and discord was sown. In consequence of which the Parliament petitioned the King to send the Envoy out of the country for meddling with the concerns of their nation. That is the nation which we call corrupted. Yet a similar affair has occurred here, and it is not to be reprobated; we are not to complain of it, nor even hear it, according to this doctrine. Independence is afraid of injuries, and almost of insults. We must forbear to exult in our peace, our light, our freedom, lest we should give offence to other nations who are not so. This may be the high tone of independence in the views of some people; but I must confess it is not so in mine; but it is probable those people may be wiser than I am, and their views extend farther. Foreign influence exists, and is disgraceful indeed, when we dare not admire our own Constitution, nor adore God for giving us to feel its happy effects. He thought, respecting the recent complaints of the French Minister, that there was not even a pretext for the accusation.

Mr. A. next referred to that part of the PRESIDENT's Address, wherein he says, "standing for the last time," &c., congratulating us that the experiment of this form of Government had so well succeeded. The committee was charged to draw up a respectful Address to the PRESIDENT. It is an appeal to our constituents whether our labor has failed or not. The paragraph objected to was an appeal to facts. If he had entertained the ideas of some gentlemen in that House, who denied the prosperity of the country, reprobated our neutrality, thought our measures tending to despotism, and viewed the Executive as wanting in wisdom and firmness, that our present measures originated in corruption, and that our recent failure sprung from too great emissions of paper money; if this was true, he should think a Republican Constitution a chimera in its nature, and a curse in practice. But I entertain no such ideas; I think this Constitution has succeeded remarkably well; this is also the language of our constituents; and if true, whatever foreign nations may think or say (for he did not much care what they did) it was very right in us to make the declaration. And if the moment was come when the strength of our Government was to be tried; if we are on the eve of a war with France, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] alleges; never was a time when it was more proper to adhere to our duty, and cling to our Government, asserting our rights, supporting ourselves against foreign power and influence; and let their agents, who vilify our Government, find that we are not afraid to support our dignity or moderation. I would not wish to say to any foreign nation, we defy you; but I would say to any, we will hold fast our rights, our liberty, and independence. I would say to our Executive in this time of danger, rely on us; we are neither Frenchmen nor Englishmen, but we are Americans. If the doctrine stated by that gentleman be true, it is right, and now is the very time we should make these declarations, and show our unanimity, and not our imbecility or discord.

It had been observed by a gentleman, that the PRESIDENT, no doubt, is a very honest man and a patriot, but he did not think him a wise man.

Mr. GILES here rose to explain. He said that, in his assertions, he meant not to reflect on his private character. He referred to his Administration. No doubt but the gentleman possessed both.

Mr. AMES said, he considered well what the

DECEMBER, 1796.]

Address to the President.

[H. OF R.]

gentleman had said. As a private man, his integrity and goodness cannot be doubted; but in his Administration—here we are to stop short; not a word about that; it won't bear looking into: it has been neither firm nor wise. If the House, in their Address to him, were to say, we think you a very honest, well-designing man, but you have been led astray, sometimes to act treacherously, and even dishonest, in your Administration—we think you a peaceful man, and though much iniquity may have been practised in your Government, yet we think you are not in fault; on the whole, sir, we wish you snugly in Virginia. Such sentiments as these I do not like. Is this an Address or an insult? Is this the mark of respect we ought to show to the first man in the nation? Mr. A. observed that he did not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] who said that the PRESIDENT would carry daggers in his heart with him into his retreat from public life, if we refuse him our testimony of gratitude. No, he bears in his breast a testimony of his purity of motive; a conscious rectitude, while in public life, which daggers could not pierce. He would retire with a good conscience. Perhaps it would be said this was adulation, but let it be remembered this was truth; this was not flattery; let gentlemen deny this; let them prove that this is not the will of their constituents. The country would judge our opinions when we come to give our yeas or nays; then the real friends of that man will be known.

The gentleman wishes him back to Virginia, was glad he designed to go; he did not regret his resignation. His name will appear in that opinion. The whole of the PRESIDENT's life would stamp his character. His country, and the admiring world knew it; and history keeps his fame and will continue to keep it. We may be singular in our opinions of him, but that will not make his character with the world the less illustrious. We now are to accept of his resignation without a tribute of respect. We are not to speak of him as either wise or firm. We can only say he is an honest man: this would scarcely be singular; many a man is honest without any other good qualifications. What circle would gentlemen fix the committee in to amend this Address, if they are not to give scope to these sentiments? Better appoint no committee at all. If we address the PRESIDENT at all, I hope, it will be respectfully, for loth respect is insult in disguise. I hope we shall not alter the original draught of the Address, but agree according to our former intentions to present a respectful and cordial Address.

Mr. SWANWICK rose to explain to those parts of the observations of some gentlemen who had lately spoken [Mr. DAYTON and Mr. AMES] on that part of the paragraph, which speaks of our gratitude to Providence. He should be sorry if such an idea was entertained from anything he had observed. It was not that part of the paragraph, but the part where we are contrasted with other nations, that he objected to principally. Although, he must observe, it was not spoken in a style common to devotion, to tell Providence how wise and enlightened we were. It does not boast of our philanthropy, to say how much wiser and better we are than other nations. He thought the gentleman's reference to a clergyman very curious. It would not be right in us to say to God, we thank thee, we are wiser or more enlightened than others! If we are so, let us rejoice in it, and not offend others by our boasting. Gentlemen say, we are happier than though we were at war; are we at peace? No: we are involved in the worst of wars. Witness our spoliations from Algerine, English, and French cruisers, from some of which he himself had suffered materially. The PRESIDENT does not think we are at peace: he recommends a Navy as the only efficient security to our commerce. How could that little island (England) command such influence in foreign dominions? It is by her navy. We cannot boast of such power. While we think ourselves much happier and stronger than others, others think us more diminutive; let us not boast. He feared that the revenues of this country would suffer materially through the great stagnation of commerce. He did not think they would be as productive as formerly. He feared it was too generally known, that this was not a time of very great prosperity. As he did not, for one, feel the prosperous situation of the country, he could not consent to violate his feelings by speaking contrary to them. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] last session, spoke with great eloquence and at great length of the horror of war; which he considered as inevitable if the British Treaty (then the subject of debate) was not carried into effect.

The PRESIDENT now tells us we are in danger of new evils. Is this the prosperity on which so many prayers are to be offered up, and so much boasting is about? He did not see occasion for it. That gentleman, Mr. S. said, would always find him as willing as himself to support the dignity of the nation, and to prevent other nations interfering with our advantages. He observed, now there was danger to be expected, Mr. AMES had forgotten the horrors of war; now, on the contrary, he can bid defiance, when it is the French we expect danger from. How this gentleman could reconcile these inconsistencies he knew not. The gentleman had drawn a comparison of a shipwreck to illustrate his remarks, but surely it was not a good figure. Are the nations of Europe shipwrecked? If we read their own publications of themselves, they will tell you they are the most free and enlightened people upon earth, and yet we call these an unhappy people; they may be so, and we may be happy, but do not let us draw comparisons. Mr. S. wished neither to undervalue our prosperity, nor discard a just sense of the dealings of Providence; he only wished that we may not think and speak too much of ourselves. On the whole, he said, the better we manage our own concerns, the more advantage to us, and he wished we were happier than we were, but not to risk offending other nations by our boasting.

Mr. CHRISTIE moved for the Committee to rise. The House divided on the motion; 43 members appeared against it, 31 only in favor of it. It was lost.

Mr. GILES rose and observed that he should not have troubled the Committee with any further observations, but his ideas had been misrepresented; although he endeavored to prevent a possibility of misconstruction, yet it seems he had not been able to accomplish his wish. It was not wonderful, he said, that the PRESIDENT's popularity should be introduced into the debate when it had been so long in question. It had been too commonly done, he thought, but he hoped the influence of it would not be very great. As to the unanimity of the committee who drew up the Address, he cared very little about it; he should be extremely sorry to see it have any influence on the members of that House.

Gentlemen have said, that if we take out the expressions of our sense of the wisdom and firmness of the administration of the PRESIDENT, they cannot find any ground on which to compliment him; if so, he for one would not be willing to present an Address at all. But his views were quite different; he thought it could be effectually done without adulation. He could not consent to acknowledge the wisdom and firmness of his administration. Gentlemen had inquired for instances in evidence of this assertion. He said, that without seeking for more instances, that of the British Treaty was a standing proof in support of the assertion. Though many gentlemen believe nothing has been done injurious to the United States through that Treaty, yet I acknowledge I see very great danger; we are not now in that state of security which could be wished. It is well known that the operation of the British Treaty is the ground-work of all the recent complaints of the French Government. It may be said that many of the complaints of the French Minister originated from actions previous to the British Treaty. It may be so, but that was the means of calling forth complaints which, perhaps, would otherwise never have been made; else why did not this calamity befall us before? It certainly may be ascribed to that instrument. Gentlemen may talk as they please about the Law of Nations; but the Law of Nations is, that a neutral nation shall not do anything to benefit one belligerent Power to the injury of another. Mr. G. said, he thought matters carried a serious aspect, and he very much disapproved of the declaration of a gentleman [Mr. AMES] who says, now is the time of danger; we are on the eve of a war with France, now let us boldly assert our rights. At the time the British Treaty was debating on, that gentleman was overcome with the prospect of a war; he then depicted it in horrible forms; but now how different his language! He now seems not afraid to embrace all its horrors, and was zealously calling out for the nation to support the Administration. Why did we not hear this when the British spoliated on our commerce! If we are upon the eve of a war with France, as the gentleman supposes, it will be disastrous to this country; we have reason to deplore it; it will be calamitous indeed. France has more power to injure this country than any nation besides, and none we can injure less. What an influence can she command over our commerce? She can exclude us from our own ports; spoil our trade with Great Britain, and from her own extensive country; she can shut us out from the East Indies as well as the West Indies; ruin our trade in the Mediterranean, which, owing to the late conquests of the French, may be rendered very flourishing and important to us; and by her alliance, offensive and defensive, with Spain, we not only have another enemy, but lose our late advantages in the navigation of the Mississippi. Suppose, by the influence of her politics, the doctrine of liberty and equality was to be preached on the other side of the Alleghany mountains, what numerous enemies may they breed in our own country? France can wound us most, and we have the least reason to provoke her. It would be policy in her to go to war with us; by ruining our trade with England, she could give a violent wound to her enemy; yet that gentleman says, now is the time to assert our rights, now we are in danger. The war-whoop and the hatchet, of which the gentleman spoke so feelingly last session, is no longer in his thoughts. If this was the only reason he had, it would be enough to influence his vote against an acknowledgment of the wisdom and firmness that has dictated our Administration.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] had said that attempts were made to separate the PRESIDENT from the other branches of the Government. Mr. G. observed, that the Senate were his only advisers on the business of the Treaty. It was thought, and he believed with good reason, that if that Treaty had been laid on the table in this House for discussion, before it had received its sanction from the Executive, it never would have been carried into effect. He thought, and his constituents thought, that it was a ruinous measure. All America began to think, and will soon see, that it was a very unwise and injurious action.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SINGREAVES] had, he thought, very improperly drawn a comparison of a man, felicitating himself in the midst of his family, and comparing with his neighbor. He compared it to the deliberations of this House in our enjoyments. Adverting to the simile before mentioned, Mr. G. said, that neighbor may be here attending to the comparisons drawn in the House, [alluding to the Minister of a foreign nation present at the time.] An attempt had been made to oppose the striking out the paragraph in question, but he really hoped it would not obtain, as he wished it to be recommitted. He thought it might have the advantage, by adding some new members to the committee, of being altered to a more general satisfaction. But no influence under Heaven could ever induce him to vote for the present Address. He hoped it would not be thought he was wanting in respect for the PRESIDENT. No, said he, truly I do not love his measures, but have a cordial affection for the man. I wish, sir, to speak of him with respect and esteem. The reason I wish him from his present office is from a knowledge that he will be more happy at Mount Vernon than he can be amidst the turbulence of State affairs. I know the people can do without him. This is a Government of the people, and the people can choose another for themselves. I believe, sir, there is national gratitude due to him; but as respects the Treaty with Great Britain, I believe therein was a failing. I think, sir, there is such a sentiment as national gratitude from the people to him, but it is not incurred through that instrument. If gentlemen can form an answer without such expressions as those I have taken the liberty to object to, I wish they would. Certain I am it can be done, and that with very good satisfaction by those gentlemen, without hurting their own feelings.

Those who vote for striking out have been charged with a want of gratitude to God for national blessings. He could assert for himself that the view was to remove that sentiment, but he supposed something would be introduced by the committee with less exception and equal force. He thought there was scope enough to compliment the PRESIDENT without writing "scoundrel" on their own foreheads, by expressing approbation of measures which they always opposed.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose and said, he was sorry to trouble the Committee at such a late hour, but he could not be satisfied with giving a silent vote on an occasion when the PRESIDENT's popularity was doubted. He thought members ought to speak the will of the people they represent. He could assert that it was not merely his own opinion he spoke, but that of his constituents, when he voted for the Address as reported. He was sorry to hear the gentleman last up speak in the style he had done, although he owned it was not altogether new to him. The gentleman wished the first clause to be struck out. Mr. W. thought it was the duty of every pious man to thank God for the benefits he enjoys. And shall not we, as a nation, thank him for keeping us from a state of war? Gentlemen's ideas were to strike the whole out in a mass; but he hoped they would not be gratified. Mr. W. said, he was very sorry to hear the gentleman speak against the wisdom and firmness of the PRESIDENT, which assertion seemed to have its foundation in the Treaty concluded with Great Britain. He would ask the gentleman whether that act of ours should have any influence on our situation with France? Wherein have we differed from the compact made with France by our Treaty made with that country? We surely had a right to treat with Great Britain, else we could not be an independent nation; and France will not deny this. In 1778, the Ambassador of France informed the British Court that his nation had entered into a Treaty with the United States, and at the same time informed them that great attention had been paid by the contracting parties not to stipulate any exclusive advantage in favor of the French nation, and that there was reserved, on the part of the United States, the liberty of treating with any nation whatsoever upon the same footing of equality and reciprocity. But the gentleman [Mr.

GILES] says, we ought not to give an advantage to an enemy. Mr. W. said, that no advantage was given to Britain, but, on the contrary, the article complained of must be of advantage to France; it is an encouragement for American vessels to go to their ports; it insures them against loss, if they are interrupted in their voyage. It had been said that it would be to the interest of France to go to war with us; if they consider it so, all that gentleman can say will not prevent it. When we reflect on a Treaty entered into on this principle with Great Britain, should France complain? Mr. W. observed, on an expression of Mr. GILES, where he had mentioned the side his name would be in the Journals of the House, that as his opposition was against the PRESIDENT for his perseverance to prevent being drawn into a war; to imbrue our hands in blood to gratify the hatred or serve the interest of another, we ought to agree to the report; this being the last time we shall address him, the people wish and expect us to address him with respect and gratitude. Have not the State Legislatures addressed him in this manner? Even the State where the gentleman whom I have answered comes from? How, then, he would ask, will it appear hereafter, when the transaction of our proceedings comes to be read, how will it then appear that every part of the Government, except the General Federal Legislature, have acknowledged their obligations to that useful man? Surely we represent the same people as the Legislatures of the States do, and we should coincide in our measures to do their will. He was sorry, he said, the gentleman had said a single syllable degrading to that man's public character, and he hoped they should go no farther into the business. Let us endeavor to eradicate from our minds those opinions which we may have suffered to have acquired a growth which overshadows the dictates of truth and justice. Let us each individually consider whether we have not suffered our private interests to bias our public conduct, and, with a view to temporary advantage to ourselves, sanction measures which, unless timely checked, may put in hazard those blessings which a Constitution founded like that of the United States, not on the vision of a heated or distempered imagination, but on principles which, unchecked in their operation by the arm of violence or misrepresentation of calumny, must necessarily produce, and when we shall have traced in the wisdom which shall have directed, and the firmness which effected the Revolution, let us then consider the man who hath been the instrument.

At this point the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 15.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the answer to the PRESIDENT's Address, Mr. MÜHLENBERG in the chair.

The question before the committee was Mr. GILES's motion for striking out.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he sincerely wished that such an answer might be agreed to, as would give a general satisfaction. He hoped some mode would be adopted to unite the wishes of every gentleman; his disposition, he said, led him to vote for the paragraph; he thought himself at liberty so to do, as he was satisfied the Administration had been, in many instances, wise and firm. He thought it improper that such debate should take place at the present time. He could see no inconvenience that could arise from voting for the Address. The words on which most stress had been laid, were those expressive of the wisdom and firmness of the PRESIDENT's administration. He declared he thought it had much contributed to the success of this country; and if success had attended his measures, there could be nothing inconsistent in their acknowledging it; which was all the compliment necessary to give satisfaction. He thought he could vote for the Address without involving himself in all the sentiments advanced on the subject. Mr. N. observed, that some of the expressions in the Address were much stronger than he wished them. He knew his constituents regretted the PRESIDENT's resignation, and that whatever little interruption there might have been to weaken their esteem of him, he yet retained their confidence. With this explanation for my conduct, said Mr. N. I think myself at liberty to vote for the Address.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. My colleague, has in a great measure anticipated my sentiments on this occasion. I am sorry for the mistaken zeal the gentlemen of the committee should have shown for the PRESIDENT, by introducing expressions into the Address so exceptionable, and which should be subject to such an uncomfortable exposure of that character.

I was able yesterday only to attend a part of the debate, through indisposition, but what I did stay to hear, hurt me very much. I heard gentlemen speak ill of the common parent of our country, whom we all revere; and was a slip, but one criminal slip to rob the PRESIDENT of his good name? We have seen the goodness of the heart of that man, and with satisfaction. We have seen him wrestling with his own feelings to continue in the important and weighty business of Government; we have seen him contending with two great rival nations, and yet preserved peace. When he had made a slip, the people of America have stepped forward to assist him, and dropped the generous tear, sensible that to err is human, and that we are all liable to do wrong. I am sure that my colleagues and every one in the House hold the character and virtue of that man in high esteem. I am sorry to see that division of sentiment which has taken place; it would make the world believe that we wish to rob him of those qualifications. It is the justice and duty of this House to do that man, that patriot, all the honor they can, whilst it is the interest of this nation to hold in view those great points with generous satisfaction, and good wishes to the man who has stepped forward, and not in vain, to the support of our Republic in the war, and under Divine assistance was made our deliverer. And now for gentlemen to come here and speak of the troubles of the country, ascribing all our adversity to him, it is like applying cold water where the strongest energy is necessary. Again I would repeat, that if that man, our common parent, has committed errors, it is no more than we all may do: it is the general lot of all. If there have been faults in the Administration, I do not think they lie at his door, but at his counsellors; he has had bad counsellors; his advisers are to blame, and not him. I never saw how he could have done otherwise than he did. And now, sir, said Mr. R., it is our duty to bear those great actions and generous sentiments in our view, that, on his retirement from his public station, we may render him all the respect due to his character. Nor would I less remember our situation with France, that great and generous Republic, under whom we owe our liberty. Let us not give offence to her, but by every mark of gratitude and respect, act a part consistent with a just sense of our peaceable intention. Let us act with the greatest circumspection and deliberation.

I hope the present Address may be formed not to diminish our sense of respect for the great man to whom presented, while it gives unanimous satisfaction to all the members of this House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON was sorry the answer was not draughted so as to avoid this debate. He said, it was his sincere desire and hope that the candor of gentlemen who advocated the Address in its present form, and those who wished it amended, would so combine as to make it agreeable to all. He said he intended to oppose the amendments which had been proposed, although he did not see the Address every way right; with a view to reconcile parties, when the present motion was disposed of he should move to strike out some words, in order to insert others. He could not, like some gentlemen, draw consolation from the misfortunes of other nations; their distresses were rather matter of regret; nor did he see a propriety, as another gentleman had done, of likening our affairs with those of the members of a family; but, even if it would bear, he could not see that tranquility in this family as was expressed. His only objection, he said, to the paragraph in question, was the words "tranquil prosperity." He believed the United States did not enjoy that tranquil prosperity; on the contrary, he thought this was a time of great calamity in the country, and he thought that it was owing, principally, to the measures of the Government. There were other clauses in the Address, he said, he should, when they came to be considered, make objections to, and he thought they could be all easily removed by motions suitable; however, he said there were many sentiments in the Address in which he heartily concurred. He should vote against the striking out the eight clauses in question, as he thought such amendments could be proposed as would make the Address meet his hearty concurrence, and he believed give general satisfaction.

Mr. GILES's motion was then put, to strike out those clauses and negatived.

Mr. PARKER renewed the motion he made yesterday, to strike out the words "freest and most enlightened in the world."

Mr. HARPER said, that he believed the motion he yesterday offered had the advantage of superseding the necessity of that motion, as it would strike out a much greater portion of the Address in order to substitute words more simple and expressive than the several parts now contained. He would not again go over the ground he yesterday trod; but would barely submit the resolution to the committee. He did not propose to amend the Address because he felt any reluctance at expressing the sentiments contained in them, but because he thought the words proposed would more effectually bring about a reconciliation, and have the advantage of more simplicity and force of expression. His amendment was, to strike out that part of the answer, from the words "retirement from office," at the end of the seventh paragraph, to the words "may you long," &c., at the beginning of the last paragraph; and insert, "and to avail ourselves of this occasion, since no suitable one may hereafter occur, of disclosing those warm emotions of respect, gratitude, and affection, with which we, no less than our constituents, have been inspired by a life equally illustrious for the wisdom, integrity, and patriotism whereby its public conduct has been guided, and fortunate in the happy influence which the exercise of those virtues has produced on the prosperity of our country."

Mr. FREEMAN said, he could not vote for the motion the gentleman had made for striking out, nor the substitute proposed; because it left out a sentiment contained in the original which he very much approved, and which he would wish by all means to be included in the Address, viz: "Yet we cannot be unmindful that your moderation and magnanimity, twice displayed by retiring from your exalted stations, afford examples no less rare and instructive to mankind than valuable to the Republic."

Mr. HARPER said, those words could be easily admitted into the motion, which he had no objection to.

Mr. AMES hoped that the motion to strike out would not prevail; for, without being over tenacious on the subject, he must give a preference to the copy of the report which was printed; the members had the advantage of weighing it in their minds, which they would lose by adopting the substitute; besides, he thought the ideas were so crowded in that proposed, as to render it heavy; he hoped the reported Address would be agreed to.

Mr. HARPER's motion was then put and negatived. Twenty-five members only voting for the motion.

Mr. PARKER again moved to strike out "freest and most enlightened," &c.

Mr. W. SMITH said yesterday, in the discussion on the subject, gentlemen had assigned for their reason to strike out those words that other nations would be offended at us. It was usual, he said, for nations to applaud themselves, and he thought it could give no offence to any. He did not hear gentlemen mention what nation was meant. He presumed the only nation that could be alluded to was the French Republic. If, however, it can be proved that they have used similar language, he supposed it would give gentlemen some ease as to this particular. In looking over some papers, he had seen several bombastical expressions in a note of Barthelemy, a report to the Convention of Laviere, and of Cambaceres, in the name of the three committees. In one are these words "a Government so powerful as the French." In another he calls it "the most enlightened in the civilized world." In another, "the first in the universe." He hoped that while that nation could use expressions like these, the gentlemen of this House would not think the expressions referred to would give offence to that or any other nation.

Mr. PARKER said, when he made the motion he did not refer to any particular nation; he had neither France nor England in view; he did not wish to see us contrast our political situation with that of any other country. His objections to the words, he said, arose from our making the declaration ourselves. Our Government, he acknowledged, was free; it was the best in his opinion anywhere. He wished to believe the people as enlightened as any other; he believed they were, and if they were not they had only themselves to blame; but however enlightened or free we were, in his opinion we were not the proper organs to declare it; however enlightened we might be, he thought the last four years administration had convinced many, as well as himself, that the Administration was not the most enlightened; if they had they would not have suffered such shameful spoliation on our commerce and shameful acts of cruelty to our seamen. He said the two little monarchies of Denmark and Sweden, neither of which in point of extent can be compared with the United States, more (to use the comparison of the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday) than a speck is to the sun; nor are they either of them in population nearly equal to the United States; and although they are surrounded by the greatest warlike Powers in a belligerent state, yet they have preserved their neutrality inviolate; their ships have not been wantonly seized, nor have their seamen been torn from their ships, or whipped at the gangway of British ships-of-war, or been shot by their press-gangs. To mention the instances of British cruelty towards our seamen in every instance that could be adduced, would take up time unnecessarily; one alone, that recently happened, I shall relate:

The brother of a member of this House [Mr. FRANKLIN of N. C.] was impressed on board a British ship-of-war in the West Indies; he was unacquainted with seamanship, having only made a passage from North Carolina to the Islands; being awkward and not being a seaman he was discharged. The same evening a press-gang of the same ship fell in with him and made him a prisoner; in attempting to make his escape he was shot at. The ball was aimed at his body; it was not winged with death, but the young man was wounded in the hand.

Mr. P. observed, that the Helvetic Confederacy, the Swiss cantons, have been better treated than us;

H. OF R.]

Address to the President.

although their inhabitants were few and they had no shipping, yet in the midst of powerful contending armies that even surrounded them, they preserved their dignity. Whilst they have preserved their dignity ours has very much diminished.

Mr. P. said, when the baneful Orders of the 6th of November, 1793, were issued by the British Government, by which our vessels were seized, and our citizens torn from their country, it was proposed by this House to lay an embargo, which was to be followed, and was followed by a bill to break off all commerce with Great Britain, after a certain day, and also to sequester the British ships and other property in this country to make good for the losses illegally sustained; the first bill fell through in the Senate; the sequestration was given up in consequence of the Senate's rejecting the non-intercourse bill.

At this time, it was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES] we must be sober-minded and discreet; we must not provoke this powerful nation. She is armed at all points like a porcupine, her quills are sharply pointed, and she, is in confederacy with the most powerful nations in Europe; therefore, it will be wise to shut ourselves up like the terrapin, and wait until events change the affairs of Europe; but on no terms whatever go to war. A breach of intercourse would be war, and sequestration was actual war. His language prevailed, and the Executive sent an Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of St. James's. It must have been expected by the most free and enlightened Americans, that this extra Envoy was sent to represent and demand redress of our grievances. But too soon were they disappointed; for, on his arrival, the first note from his pen addressed to Lord Grenville, says, "he relies only on the justice and magnanimity of His Majesty." The baneful Treaty since verifies the act. Was this language for us to hold out to that nation from whom we had received such insults and injuries? Do we rely only on the justice and magnanimity of that country for support? The most petty State in the world would scorn to debase itself so much. Where then is our enlightened state? This, he said, was an act of an Administration, they were called upon to applaud, and say we were the most enlightened in the world. He believed the PRESIDENT never would have put his name to the Treaty that has brought us to the eve of a war with France, if he had not been advised by the counsel of others, who, he feared, were friendly to Great Britain, hostile to France, and enemies to their country. As to the PRESIDENT himself, he believed him to be a just, wise, and good man; he knew he was brave.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] tells us we are on the eve of a war with France, and in this case it is necessary we should unite and meet her. Where are we to meet her, says Mr. P.? Have we a Navy to transport troops to Europe? No; and if we had, could we expect to foil that great nation, who are fighting for their freedom, and who had obtained more victories, and conquered more men in a few months, than ever was done by the Romans in their most successful days? In case of a war with France, should we not be compelled to shut up ourselves like the terrapin in his shell [looking at Mr. AMES] could we carry on our trade abroad? Should we not be deprived of the islands of France in the West Indies, from whence we not only draw necessities for home consumption, but valuable cargoes for exportation? When the Treaty question was before us last session, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES.] in order to frighten the House into the appropriation for the British Treaty, told us the tomahawk was lifted up to strike the son, whose blood was to enrich the cornfield. The slumbers of the cradle were to be disturbed by the savage yell, and a variety of other high-toned, alarming metaphors, which I am not able to follow him in, as, in point of eloquence, the palm is yielded to him; but, after this, let me ask for his consistency; then we were to shut ourselves up in our shell, now we are to meet France; why has his tone so changed? When Britain insults us, we are to crawl into our shell; when France does, we must meet her: did that gentleman meet the British last war? Where was that gentleman when we were struggling for our liberty? I presume he shut himself up in his shell.

Mr. P. said he had seen such acts of rapine and cruelty committed by the British armies in America, that he could not think them great or magnanimous, but the most cruel of any other nation. He had seen a flourishing town destroyed, houses and vessels burned, and families ruined; and when he took Portsmouth, in Virginia, in 1781, not an hour after General O'Hara left it, he found, in a house nearly as large as the one we sit in, a great number of melancholy victims of British barbarity, (some of whom were among the most respectable,) the rooms crowded with people, dead and dying of the small-pox, not a single nurse to attend them, nor a drop of water to wet their mouths; this is among the evidences of British humanity.

These are the people we are to be allied to, to fight France. If we must go to war with France, and we are invaded by her, I must and will fight for my country; but, were I to have a choice, I would prefer a close connexion with France rather than Britain. Our Governments are more alike; we alike have fought for freedom; we have, in some measure, loosened the chains which ignorance and superstition had made, and which were supported by king-craft and priest-craft. I wish to see Republican liberty spread itself over the world; this is among the reasons why I should deprecate a war with France. Hence I hope that every measure will be used consistent with the honor of our country, to cement closely the bands of union between the United States and the French Republic.

Having said, perhaps, too much on this subject, I shall conclude with the words of a celebrated French author, (Voltaire), "I have graven on my heart a love of freedom, and a hate of Kings."

Mr. HARPER said, he had had not a disposition to follow the gentleman in his invectives against the Administration of this country, or in his reference to the conduct of another nation. Nor could he see what it had to do with the matter in hand. The question was, whether they should make the declaration or not; it did not appear to him important whether they made it or not. If it was true, other nations would see it. But why should gentlemen travel into this long field of invective? Suppose all these assertions were true, he should then vote against his own motion. Admit all was a mistake; that we are not what we think ourselves to be, and that it had its foundation in a base, wicked design, does it then follow that all the rest of America are equally wicked? We have been talking much about war, pacification, &c. It would seem to strangers who entered the House since the debate commenced, that the subject before the Committee was a declaration of war, whereas it is only whether we call ourselves a free and an enlightened people or not. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARKER] said, he felt himself pacifically inclined to all nations. Mr. H. supposed the truth was, that the gentleman was pacifically inclined towards the nation who seemed to be hostile at present against this country. [Mr. PARKER here rose to make some explanation.] Mr. H., however, hoped they should not travel into fields of discussion, nor give scope to their imaginations, to call forth from their recollection all the circumstances which could be detailed, but which would only serve to irritate and prolong business which required immediate discussion; he hoped, therefore, that they should confine themselves to the simple question, whether to strike out or not? What, he would ask, have peaceful or hostile dispositions to do with the question in hand? He had said, when compared with Sweden and Denmark, our Government had been very unwise, and had suffered depredations on our commerce. He did not wish to enter far into the discussion, but this he could say, that Sweden and Denmark, although they had 36 ships of war always ready to protect them, yet they had submitted to as great insults as we have; with less force we have obtained greater advantages than they. As to the Swiss Cantons, although they have no ships on the ocean, they were in alliance with the only nation that could annoy them; besides, their situation is such that their mountainous country will protect them against all invaders; they can sustain an independent character with more ease than most nations. He did not see any superior wisdom in their conduct; he must consider our conduct marked with more wisdom than either of them. Involved in a labyrinth with three or four of the strongest nations in the world, although we have not received those advantages we could wish, yet he thought we had come out quite as well as we had any reason to hope. Contrasted with Sweden, Denmark, and Switzerland, we have obtained those advantages which would afford us ample reason to admire the wisdom of our Administration; and those advantages were obtained while we staid at home and managed our own business.

DECEMBER, 1796.]

Address to the President.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. AMES said, if any man were to call himself more free and enlightened than his fellows, it would be considered as arrogant self-praise. His very declaration would prove that he wanted sense as well as modesty, but a nation might be called so, by a citizen of that nation, without impropriety; because, in doing so, he bestows no praise of superiority on himself; he may be in fact, and may be sensible that he is less enlightened than the wise of other nations. This sort of national eulogium may, no doubt, be fostered by vanity and grounded in mistake; it is sometimes just, it is certainly common, and not always either ridiculous or offensive. It did not say that France or England had not been remarkable for enlightened men; their literati are more numerous and distinguished than our own. The character, with respect to this country, he said, was strictly true. Our countrymen, almost universally, possess some property and some pretensions of learning—two distinctions so remarkably in their favor as to vindicate the expression objected to. But go through France, Germany, and most countries of Europe, and it will be found that, out of fifty millions of people, not more than two or three had any pretensions to knowledge, the rest being, comparatively with Americans, ignorant. In France, which contains twenty-five millions of people, only one was calculated to be in any respect enlightened, and, perhaps, under the old system, there was not a greater proportion possessed property; whilst in America, out of four millions of people, scarcely any part of them could be classed upon the same ground with the rabble of Europe. That class called vulgar, canaille, rabble, so numerous there, does not exist here as a class, though our towns have many individuals of it. Look at the lazaroni of Naples; there are twenty thousand or more houseless people, wretched, and in want! He asked whether, where men wanted everything, and were in proportion of 29 to 1, it was possible they could be trusted with power? Wanting wisdom and morals, how would they use it? It was, therefore, that the iron hand of despotism was called in by the few who had anything, to preserve any kind of control over the many. This evil, as it truly was, and which he did not propose to commend, rendered true liberty hopeless. In America, out of four millions of people, the proportion which cannot read and write, and who, having nothing, are interested in plunder and confusion, and disposed for both, is small. In the Southern States, he knew there were people well-informed; he disclaimed all design of invidious comparison; the members from the South would be more capable of doing justice to their constituents, but in the Eastern States he was more particularly conversant, and knew the people in them could generally read and write, and were well-informed as to public affairs. In such a country, liberty is likely to be permanent. They are enlightened enough to be free. It is possible to plant it in such a soil, and reasonable to hope that it will take root and flourish long, as we see it does. But can liberty, such as we understand and enjoy, exist in societies where the few only have property, and the many are both ignorant and licentious?

H. OF R.]

Address to the President.

Was there any impropriety, then, in saying what was a fact? As it respects Government, the declaration is useful. It is respectful to the people to speak of them with the justice due to them, as eminently formed for liberty, and worthy of it. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GILES,] on a former occasion, had said he adored the people; but now, when there was a wish to pronounce the attributes of his divinity, he was not found more fervent in his adoration than many who had made no such profession. If they are free and enlightened, let us say so; if they are not, he should no longer adore them; they would not certainly be worthy of honors quite divine. Mr. A. said they ought not only resay this, because it was true, but because their saying so would have the effect to produce that self-respect which was the best guard of liberty, and most conducive to the happiness of society. It was useful to show where our hopes and the true safety of our freedom are reposed. It cherished in return from the citizens a just confidence, a spirit of patriotism unmixed with foreign alloy, and the courage to defend a Constitution that a people really enlightened knows to be worthy of its efforts.

If the words were objectionable, it would be easy to alter them to avoid the objection without impairing essentially their force. A gentleman near him had suggested the propriety of saying we were "among the freest and most enlightened." He had no objection to the alteration, though he saw no reason for altering the phraseology, but he was willing to compromise with gentlemen, it not being essential. The citizens of a free Government ought, he said, to believe they were the most free and enlightened, because, having the power of making the Government what they please, if it was not the best, it would be their own fault for not making it so.

He believed the House would not be surprised if he took notice of what had been said in allusion to him in the course of the debate—allusions with which he could not be offended, because they were urged with so many expressions of the most flattering civility. But every gentleman would believe those things were not applicable to him, as their recollections would not fail to prove. What had been his language with respect to Britain? Did he say we were to submit? Did he say we were to defend our country? Was he then afraid as they were now, that soft words would not be soft enough? No; such language came not from him. Do nothing to irritate; wage no war; no hostility. Such, he called sequestration, and other acts of that nature. We were, he said, about to make war on British property, and such would have been considered a kind of minor war. He, therefore, wished to shut up ourselves in our shell like a tortoise. But, at the same time, he recommended troops to be raised, ships to be built, taxes to be laid, and a spirited claim of justice to be urged. The gentleman who wished at that time particularly to preserve peace, did not wish to hold out the olive-branch alone, by leaving the country defenceless. This many of their opposers absolutely did. These, he said, were their reasons, and they had been effectual. He would not go into an examination of the subject now. It was their wish to urge every exertion of the country, to have strained its faculties till they were ready to crack, and to have called forth the last dollar and the last man in defence of the country in case of necessity. Did this look as if they wished to truckle to Great Britain? Many of their opposers, so zealous then for retaliation and reprisal, were not for anything else—neither troops, ships, taxes, nor Treaty. This the yeas and nays on the Journals will establish. Will the opposers show half the spirit now that we felt and expressed at that day?

How happened it, he asked, that gentlemen were so angry because they had then heard the language of peace; and now, because the same language was heard? Not one of us desire hostility. Was it because Great Britain was then the object and France now? Wrongs from the former cannot be resented enough; and wrongs and insult, too, from the latter, require words of more ardor than a lover's. No man felt more for the wrongs of America than he did. He felt for the loss of ships and property; and more, that our seamen had so suffered. On no occasion had a drop of blood pressed through his heart more quickly than at their painful misfortunes. But, was it not the part of dignity and prudence to endeavor to obtain restitution for those wrongs rather than take up arms? Was it suited to national dignity to make use of the language that had been used on that occasion by many of his opposers? He thought both national and personal dignity forbade it; he had thought it equally intemperate and unbecoming.

Did not gentlemen seem to feel more for one individual than for an insult on the whole nation and its Government? The Administration might suffer contumely and abuse, and the country, too, without producing any emotions in the breasts of gentlemen; their feelings seem to take quite another direction. If the British Minister should outrage our Government, as the Minister of France had done, every one would be for avenging the wrong. He thought it right that they should now declare their determination of supporting the Executive in supporting our national honor and dignity, or let him see in season that he was to be abandoned.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] had justly said, that though we had no Navy to support our pretensions, we had come off better than Sweden or Denmark—countries which had been produced as patterns of wisdom. Though he did not suppose the British Treaty would be carried into effect, so as to satisfy every person who had suffered in his property by the British, yet he trusted the event would prove, in a considerable degree, satisfactory. He wished all other depredations on our commerce might be in the end as nearly compensated.

At the time when Government was pursuing her negotiation, we were embarrassed with Spain, with the Indians, and with the Western people. On the sea, our people were suffering in their property. The British Treaty was, therefore, made under disadvantageous circumstances. Too great an eulogium could not be bestowed on the Government, and truth would sometimes procure its universal assent, that we had recovered our territory, and made provision for the spoliation of our commerce; that we had settled our peace with Great Britain, Spain, Algiers, and the Indians; and that our ships were not taken so much as before. What Treaty will not do, (as the gentleman said some time back,) war must: but Treaty has proved effectual.

It seemed that as if gentlemen never could say enough on the subject of the British Treaty and of Great Britain. The Bank, Treasury, and other topics of declamation, which were formerly always in order, seem to be almost forgotten. Was this the way, he asked, in which they meant to recommend to the citizens the due respect for the acts of a majority of that House and of Congress? If they think this the best way of answering the ends of Government, and of producing confidence and harmony amongst the people, they did well. The means appeared disproportioned, or rather strangely opposite to that end. He was of a different opinion. He thought, and it was with due seriousness of deliberation he declared, the people were called upon to choose between them; between those who wished to support Government and those who avowed so unseasonable and so excessive a sensibility to a foreign interest and foreign nation; between those who condemned the insults offered to the Government, and those who seemed to approve them; those who thought the experiment of our Government had succeeded, and those who were bound in consistency with their own assertions, to say it was to be abandoned with disgust and in despair. He was of opinion they could not go on as they were, some pulling down, while others were building up; but the people could remove the evil by choosing a House who would be better agreed—the people being free and enlightened, would have no difficulty in choosing between them. Both sorts of men ought not to be there; either those who, like the Government, are in the right, or those who dispute, revile, and despise it. The people would, he doubted not, judge right. He wished the appeal to be made without delay, and so solemnly as to make it effectual.

Mr. CHRISTIE wished to make an amendment to the paragraph, which he thought would answer the end equally as well as striking it out: if agreeable to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARKER] he would move to put the word "among" after the word "freest," which would read "the freest and among the most enlightened. He could not say we were the most enlightened, but he did think us the most free; not that he was afraid of offending any nation, but he thought this a more consistent declaration.

Mr. SWANWICK said, nobody doubted but we were free and enlightened, but he thought their declaration was no evidence of the truth of it. He thought the last amendment very good, but it would be still better if the gentleman would put the word "among" a little further back, so as to read "among the freest and most enlightened." A pacific disposition could not be proved by anything so well as treating others with respect as well as ourselves; we may not be exclusively free or enlightened. He hoped it would be thus altered.

Mr. CHRISTIE thought we were the freest people in the world; he, therefore, could not agree to the amendment last proposed.

Mr. COIT could not say with the gentleman last up, that we were the freest, but he was very willing to agree with the amendment of a gentleman, that we are among the freest and most enlightened; he thought the first amendment much improved by this; he said it removed great part of the difficulty from the minds of many gentlemen; however, he hoped no unnecessary time would be taken up with such trifles.

Mr. GILES next rose to speak to some observations which were made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH,] on the mode of expression used in the words proposed to be struck out. That gentleman brings some examples from France of this boasting spirit, but he thought their example in those things should not have influence here. Mr. G. said, he believed he was one among those on whom that gentleman supposed such would have influence; but he could assure him, if he thought so, he was mistaken. He did not like that disposition in any one; it was to him extremely disagreeable; and he did not approve it any the better because the French nation had set the example. That vaunting style of the French nation was, to him, the most irksome of all their conduct.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] supposes, said Mr. G., that I no longer adore the people, because I will not allow them to be called, in this Address, the freest and most enlightened in the world. Perhaps I think as highly of the people as that gentleman does, but if so, it is not becoming in me to express it in that manner. If we are the most free and enlightened, it does not become us to make our boast of it, neither did Mr. G. think it right to tell the people so. The gentleman endeavored to do away the objection, by drawing a picture between a nation and an individual using that language. The Representatives of the people were the same as the nation. Mr. G. thought we were a free and enlightened people, yet it was very indelicate in that House to use the expressions. In an individual the case was quite different. He did not think the comparison just; however, if the House were determined to use the expressions he should not object, it was very immaterial to him.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] said some individuals were opposed to the Government. Mr. G. wished to understand the meaning of the term Government. If the gentleman meant the Government of the United States in all its branches, as organized by the Constitution, he did not think it would at all apply. Not one on that floor, he said, could love the Government in this sense more than he did; he never suspected what the law adopted; he had all his life embraced it with pleasure; but if the Executive alone was meant as the Government, Mr. G. thought that was sometimes censurable; however, he could not call that the Government, although it was a part of it, and a very essential part. He was sorry to find that this part of the Government had placed us in a very disagreeable situation. He said he was one of those who extremely disliked the Treaty with Great Britain. This was one of those acts which to his view was unwise in the Administration. He did not like any close connexion with that country; although some pecuniary advantages might arise from it, yet there was enough in his view by forming such a connexion as to overbalance all partial advantages.

What, said Mr. G., is our existing situation with respect to France? He thought the state of our affairs with respect to that country far from agreeable. The PRESIDENT announces something very uncomfortable, and accounts that have been received from France corroborate the testimony, and even adds to the danger; and where can we put the blame, but on our accommodation with Great Britain by the Treaty, by which we are liable to be interrupted by a nation infinitely more powerful? By the acquisitions of Spain and Holland to France we not only lose those who were our friends, but they become enemies in common with their ally; our commerce with all the world, and even with our own ports, is ruined by her privateers, which originates in that calamitous Treaty. He said he would appeal, if this is the case, whether the declaration of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] was well timed, to come forward and tell them what we will do; we were ready to meet them. If this is the happy prospect arising from what the gentleman calls a wise and firm Administration, he lamented it as fraught with evil. He thought that in the contract with Great Britain we had made a dangerous poison, which would soon be felt.

With respect to one allusion of the gentleman, he would say, that he felt the same adoration for the will of the people now, as he ever had done, and he hoped he always should; he thought no gentleman could charge him with contrary conduct; the sentiments he had always supported arose from a feeling and conviction of their propriety. He said he made these remarks because some gentlemen had indulged themselves in such personalities. He forebore to make any further observations, as he might, some time, take an opportunity to remark on some particulars in an expected communication, when it offered. With respect to the Address, he should vote against it.

MR. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, that some of the observations which had been brought into the present debate were of too delicate a nature to be commented upon or even repeated; he should not, therefore, follow the gentleman who spoke last, in his inquiry, how far this country was exposed to be annoyed by France in the possible, though happily not probable, event of a rupture with France?

As to the words "freest and most enlightened," which were more immediately the subject of discussion, he did not object against them on the ground of fact, but he considered the expression as resolving itself into a question of decorum and delicacy, the rules of which appeared to him to be violated, in their ascribing to themselves such a superlative preference, however true, in a comparison with every other people. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. CHRISTIE] very much softened the terms and rendered them more palatable.

Some remarks had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] which were irrelevant to the subject, and Mr. D. could have wished had been therefore omitted. Had he contented himself with challenging any member to point out a single instance of inconsistency in him, and pursued the subject no further, Mr. D. said, that his respect and friendship for the member from Massachusetts would have induced him to be silent; but, when that gentleman had wantonly gone out of his way to bring into view and arraign the policy of certain energetic measures which were at a former session contemplated to counteract the encroachments of Great Britain, he felt himself called upon to take some notice of them. Those measures, and sequestration in particular, had been on a former occasion asserted, and now again unnecessarily repeated, to have been intended as acts of hostility. Is it then, inquired Mr. D., an act of hostility simply to sequester, or in other words, to attach, and to arrest and detain in this country the property of the British nation, as a pledge or security for the indemnification of the citizens of the United States against the depredations of that nation; and is it no act of hostility against this country to have their property not merely sequestered, but condemned, confiscated, and wasted by the cruisers, subjects, Government, and Courts of that nation? Such, he was sorry to say, had formerly been the reasoning and assertion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The United States must not sequester, for it was war; but the plunder and confiscation of the property of our citizens was not to be termed hostility, but was only ground for negotiation. If it were possible for that gentleman to reconcile that striking inconsistency he might then free himself from the imputation. That he himself had advocated all the energetic measures which were proposed on a former critical occasion in that House was, Mr. D. said, his pride and his boast. He then thought, and he still thought, that if they had been carried into effect, the situation of this country, both as it respected the indemnification of our fellow-citizens who had been plundered and our commercial and political connexion with Great Britain, would be far more favorable than it could be said to be at that moment.

MR. AMES said, that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] had represented him as saying that he took it for granted that we were on the eve of a war with France. So far was this from being correct, he had grounded his expression carefully upon what fell from the gentleman himself.

Address to the President.

[H. of R.]

He said if we were on the eve of a war, as Mr. GILES insinuated, it was above all things necessary that we should cling around the Government, and not let an idea go forth to the world that there was a division of sentiment on the subject of the respective duties we owe to France and our own country. He knew not what more he could say with respect to France. He had advocated words strong enough for anything but a love-letter, and such were reported by the committee. It was possible, indeed, he might not feel all the ardor in her favor which was expressed by other gentlemen; for their's, he was free to say, he thought excessive and pernicious. It was not sweet enough to go down his throat, but much sweeter than he thought proper to make use of. He wished most cordially for peace with all nations, but if that could not be had he wished for an union of sentiment in support of our national character and dignity. He did not approve of anything like menaces, nor would he give the least encouragement to any hostile disposition; this, he said, had been the language used by other gentlemen in that House.

So much for that subject. With respect to what had fallen from the Speaker, it was possible on so many points, and with so many aspects of the same point, in the business of several years, he might not have acted consistently, though as to the matter in question, he neither admitted nor believed any such thing. He always acted as he thought best at the time; but at different periods he might, and this he said merely for the argument's sake, have acted differently. Sincerely, he was sure, he had acted, and the House would believe he had ever avowed his sentiments as he really felt them; but he could not see anything of this inconsistent kind in his conduct. Admitting that the capturing of our vessels by the British were acts of hostility—and there was great difference between such acts and the just causes of war—were we, he said, even then without reflection, investigation, or demand of justice, to return hostility for hostility? The French had also captured our vessels, and yet no one spoke of this as an act of hostility, or of sequestration, prohibition, or embargo, or blamed those who were silent. If one nation committed an act of hostility against another, was it not advisable, rather than immediately to retaliate, to endeavor to adjust the matter by negotiation? He thought so; the citizens of the United States unquestionably thought so, and that our Administration had great merit in so settling the late differences with Great Britain as to avoid war. It was true that the British had taken our vessels under a claim of right which they had to do so; and as contraband goods were liable to be seized, part of their conduct was clearly right by the Law of Nations, and a great part clearly wrong—so that it was difficult to determine which were acts of hostility. This of course required examination of facts, and adjustment of principles. The Treaty wisely provided for both. For this purpose a negotiation was opened, and was in a train that he sincerely hoped would be finally successful.

Gentlemen had been greatly offended by the terms "justice and magnanimity," addressed by Mr. Jay in his memorial to the British Government; but now our own country was threatened, wronged, and insulted, in a very extraordinary manner, no language was soft enough to be used towards their favorite Republic. This distinction was remarkable. The remarks on inconsistency would no doubt labor for a solution of this enigma. Our real patriots would labor with them to be satisfied why the language of custom and common decency should be so shocked in one case, and why even humility and supplication should seem too harsh for offended France in the other.

With respect to the present situation of our country with the French Republic, it was no reproach upon our Government that the French had issued complaints against us.

It was said the British Treaty was the ground of offence; if so, he hoped there was not a drop of American blood that was not carried with rather more heat and rather more hurry through the heart by such a declaration. No nation, he hoped, would ever have such influence over the people as to dictate to us what form of Treaty we should make with another nation. It was an insult that marked the utmost insolence of spirit on one side, and its lowest abasement on the other.

No cause of offence, Mr. A. said, could justly be taken on account of that Treaty, since the French Treaty was in common with our other Treaties declared to be of prior force by an article of Mr. Jay's, and were the articles of the two Treaties to clash, those of the French Treaty would destroy any opposing article in that made with Great Britain, so that that Treaty would continue the law of the land, the same as if no British Treaty existed. Our juries and courts could be relied on to carry the law of the land into effect.

Information had been received, Mr. A. said, and stated to the public in all the newspapers, that continual efforts were making in Paris to excite a spirit of animosity against this country, and this by persons who were, though unworthily such, American citizens. Whether the language held by gentlemen in this House on the present occasion would not have a tendency to increase, to encourage, and to assist that spirit, he left those gentlemen to determine: Whether to say we were wholly in their power, that they were the only Power which could annoy our territory, that they were invulnerable and irresistible and we defenceless, that they were in the right and we in the wrong, was becoming any character but that of Frenchmen. If we are on the eve of a war, said Mr. A., I blush for gentlemen who can use such language, at a moment when the Power with whom the war was contemplated is offering injuries and menaces to our country. If the event were to be war, he acquitted the Administration of blame. It had not provoked it; but it was, if we may credit such various and concurring information as we had, owing to the intrigues carried on at Paris. What auxiliaries they may have here, he would not pretend to say. It had been there represented that there was a division of sentiment betwixt the Government and the people of this country, and that they (the French) had only to speak the word, and the Government would fall like other despotisms, which they affected every where to overturn. If this was the fact, and so it had been represented, this House and this whole country ought to show it no countenance; he thought it the duty of the place where he stood to make it manifest to the French nation that it would not be borne; that in case of extremities he did not balance for a moment which country he should declare for, that of strangers or his own.

Mr. A. said, he himself did not believe there was any chance of war. The French could have no pretext for it, and as little interest or desire to drive us to that alternative. As this kind of threat, he doubted not, was to answer a certain purpose, and was timed at the very moment when it was expected to fix it, when that business had passed over, he supposed we should hear no more of war. We may suffer many wrongs and depredations on our trade, said Mr. A., but this country will seek redress, not by war in the first instance, but by negotiation as before. These were ideas which appeared to him very necessary to express, and which he considered it his duty to advance. Whatever be our Government, said he, whether perfect or not, we are bound to support it; and not, at such a period, to speak of injuries and evils which are not derived from the neglect or providence of our Government, and therefore ought not to chill the ardor of our zeal for its support. They are not true; but if they were, they should now be kept out of sight. Mr. A. concluded with an apology for having said so much, as it was well known he did not propose to speak often; he intended to have said but little, and hoped the Committee would see that he had been personally called upon, and therefore would excuse him.

Mr. GILES said, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] had charged him with improperly exposing the weakness of our country. The French Directory, said Mr. G., knows the situation of this country, as it respects our commerce, better than I do. There are circumstances in the United States as well known to them as to any gentleman in this House. He deprecated war, and he spoke of the disadvantages we should labor under, that gentlemen may be cautioned against it. He begged the gentleman to look back upon the very brilliant remarks he made the last session, on the power of Great Britain, and how unable the country was to meet them. Mr. G. then thought war much less probable than now; he then begged us not to provoke a war. With respect to the probability of a rupture with France, he wished gentlemen seriously to consider. It was a well known fact that the powers of their Minister were suspended: this, it was insinuated, was to have an influence on a certain election. This, he thought, was too improbable to be imagined. No man can be at a loss to conjecture at present, and we can with safety venture on the remark, that things begin in earnest to take a serious aspect. When, he would ask gentlemen, did they see this country placed in so critical a situation as at present with the French Republic? The time when that gentleman saw danger of a war, had not so serious an appearance as the present: the British Minister was not then recalled, nor his functions stopped. From the revocation of the British edict of the 6th November, he never thought there was danger of a war with that nation. But, he said, he felt serious danger with respect to France at this time.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] had alluded to information from Paris. If he supposed there was any other than communications between individuals, he was mistaken. Mr. G. said he had lately seen a friend from that country, a man well informed, who had given him information of affairs there, and who assured him that they were much offended at the British Treaty. Much had been said about improper correspondence with France, but he did not know of anything treasonable in this connexion. He believed some gentlemen had had idle dreams a great while; they are the wild phantoms of those gentlemen's imagination; ideas, merely the fabrication of visionary and prejudiced minds.

Mr. KITCHELL thought we had given a very good proof that we are not the most enlightened people in the world, by this discussion; and if we declare to the world that we are, that declaration will be a still more glaring proof. It appeared to him quite unnecessary; he thought it spending a great deal of time to no purpose; it was not important enough for that waste of time, when the session was to be so short; he therefore wished the question to be put.

Mr. SITGREAVES agreed that a very useless and improper latitude had been assumed in the discussion, and he thought that a few moments would not be misspent in recalling the attention of the Committee to the real question before them. The assertion that we are the freest and most enlightened nation in the world was found fault with, and while some gentlemen moved to strike it out altogether, others proposed to qualify it in different ways. Mr. S. believed that, in any modification of the expression, the criticism was in itself extremely unimportant; and if, as some gentlemen had treated it, it was a mere question of decorum, he should feel perfectly indifferent whether it was rejected or retained. But when he heard one member deny that we are the most free, and another that we are enlightened; and most especially when he heard that the expression was contended to be improper in relation to the acts and the administration of the Government, he confessed it did appear to him to be of some consequence not to part with the expression, lest, by doing so, the House should give countenance to these objections. For his own part, he believed the proposition to be true; he conceived the word "enlightened" as applicable to political illumination, and not to our rank in arts, sciences, or literature; and he considered the sentence as equivalent to an assertion that we enjoy the most enlightened system of political freedom extant. In this view of it, he thought it literally true; and, if true, he could not discern the indecorum of declaring so on the present occasion. He was strongly impressed with the propriety of the idea which he had suggested yesterday, that this should be considered as an act of intercourse purely domestic, an expression of self-gratulation on our superior happiness, which, by the forms of society, ought not to be noticed by any other nation. We may be deemed, without too bold a figure, to be speaking in soliloquy; and to listen to what we say would be no better than eaves-dropping: the indecorum would rest with those who overhear us, and not with ourselves. It could not be denied that such a belief of the superiority of our political situation ought to be cherished among us. If we did not believe it, we should take shame to ourselves, because our Government is the work of our own hands. If the belief that we are free and enlightened is valuable, the expression of it is also valuable, because it tends to preserve us so; it is a sentiment which we cannot dwell upon too much.

Address to the President.

[H. OF R.]

But, he contended, the propriety of this or any other expression could not be justly estimated by considering it in the abstract—it ought to be viewed in its application and use. We are about to lose the services of the PRESIDENT, who is admitted on all hands to have been an useful and patriotic officer. The House of Representatives are desirous that he should take with him to his honorable retirement the only reward which the nature and spirit of our political institutions admit of—the approbation of his country. It will surely be admitted that we ought to give to the expression of this approbation all the value of which it is susceptible; and it is obvious, from the slightest perusal of this paragraph in the Address, that the words in question give to it all its force and energy, and that without them, it would be an unmeaning compliment. The spectacle of a nation, neither free nor enlightened, offering to its first Magistrate the tribute of approbation and applause, would neither be “novel nor interesting.” Since the days of history are stained with numberless instances of prostituted praise and courtly adulation; but when it is the voluntary homage of a free and enlightened people, offered with sincerity to an illustrious fellow-citizen, it is truly a precious reward for patriotic labors. Those who object to this expression, therefore, ought to move to strike out the whole paragraph. To reject the words would totally defeat the intended compliment; to qualify them would spoil it. Mr. S., therefore, wished to retain them as they were reported.

Mr. THATCHER said, he did not think the object of the present question of much consequence, nor did he care much about it; however, he would wish to see the members more unanimous on the subject; he would, therefore, propose an amendment, which he thought would have some tendency towards it, which was to leave out the superlative, and let the passage read, “The spectacle of a free and enlightened nation.”

Mr. HENDERSON commended the ingenuity of the last motion, as he thought it would more concentrate the ideas of the members. He would vote for it.

Mr. CHRISTIE's motion was then put, and negatived.

Mr. THATCHER's motion was put, and passed in the affirmative.

Mr. LIVINGSTON asked, if it would be in order to make a motion on any part of the Address on which no question has been taken?

The Chairman answered yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then moved to strike out the words, “Tranquil prosperity with the period,” and insert, “Present period with that.” He said he had two reasons for wishing this motion might prevail: 1. He objected to it because the sentiment was not just; and, 2. Because the form of wording it did not please him. He could not say this was a time of tranquil prosperity. Were he to do so he should mock the misery of his constituents, whose distresses were so evident. Could he so speak when he saw trade on the decline, and commerce ruined; embarrassments which conspire against the assertion; and, while he saw an impropriety in that declaration of our tranquility and prosperity, he could not compare our misery and wretchedness to the nations in Europe, involved in war, with which the comparison is drawn. He thought, therefore, that the language of the Address might be retained while it drew consolation from that view, although it is not perfect tranquility and prosperity. The other objection he had to the passage was the wording of it, which he should not have thought of so much consequence as to have grounded a motion on it alone, but it appeared in so close connexion with the amendment proposed that he included it. He thought there was an inaccuracy to compare “tranquil prosperity” to “period.” How tranquility could be compared with a speck of time, to a period, he knew not. He doubted not the impropriety of the present expression would appear evident. He hoped, notwithstanding that tenacity on mere wording, which had been so adhered to by some gentlemen in the course of the debate, that all would agree in the Address. He should be extremely hurt could he conceive that we differed in an expression of gratitude and admiration to that great man. While he was desirous to express this, he could not do it at the expense of his feelings or principles. The former he might sacrifice, but the latter he could not to any man. He hoped, in all his proceedings, to attend strictly to principle. He said, he made these observations to make room for another motion tending to this subject, when this was dispensed with.

The amendment was put and carried—42 affirmative, 37 negative.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then moved to strike out the words from the next paragraph, “Wise, firm, and patriotic Administration,” and insert in their place, “Your wisdom, firmness, and patriotism has been.” He could not say that all the acts of the Administration had been wise and firm; but he would say, that he believed the wisdom, firmness, and patriotism of the PRESIDENT had been signally conducive to the success of the present form of Government. He was willing to give him every mark of respect possible, but he believed some of his public acts of late rendered the present motion necessary.

Mr. W. SMITH opposed the amendment, as he thought the gentleman who proposed it conceived the words to imply more than was meant by them—they are not meant to include every act of the Executive. He thought that the Administration in general had been wise, firm, and patriotic; that the wisdom and firmness of the PRESIDENT had been conducive to the success of the present form of Government. Had not the words been put in the reported Address, he thought it would not have been of consequence whether they were ever inserted; but the difference is very great. Now they are inserted they are made public, and, to erase them now, and substitute words in any manner deficient in sentiment to them, would be to carry censure and not respect. That the Administration of that valuable man had been wise and conducive to the good of this country, will not admit of a doubt; and for us to rob him of that honor which is his due, would be insult. And any thing short of the words in the Address he thought would not carry a proper mark of respect.

Mr. GILES observed, that he thought the Administration had been very deficient in wisdom. Many gentlemen, he said, were very particularly opposed to the British Treaty and to the great emission of transferable paper. Could it then be supposed these gentlemen could, in this instance, so change their opinion? The gentleman last up had said, that because the words were in the reported Address they ought not to be struck out. He thought that the House had now as much power to act as though the committee had made no report. He thought they ought not in any way to be influenced by the report of the select committee, but act as though they had to form the Address themselves. He believed that the PRESIDENT possessed both wisdom and firmness. He was willing to compliment the PRESIDENT as much as possible in his personal character, but he could not think it applicable to his Administration. He thought the amendment proposed would meet his concurrence, and he hoped it would be agreed to.

Mr. GILBERT hoped and presumed that the motion of his colleague would not obtain. He understood that the House addressed the PRESIDENT in answer to his Speech, always as a public man, and not in his private capacity. How extraordinary, then, will it appear in this House to refer only to his private conduct! It is, in substance, complimenting him as a private man, while the very words reprobate him in his public station. We are now to address him as PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES. We may tell him of his wisdom and his firmness, but what of all that unless we connect it with his Administration?

Mr. CRAIK said, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] seemed to think the matter very immaterial whether the discussion on this Address took place in a Committee of the Whole or in a select committee. In his view it was an object of the first magnitude, however gentlemen may think proper to declare on it in point of form. It was now made public, and it would have considerable effect on the people at large. This report, and all the discussion on it, will be published in the papers. Much has been said in this debate against the Chief Magistrate. The principal reason urged for striking out the expressions in question, was grounded on the opinion that some of the PRESIDENT's administration had not been wise or firm. Some object to them on the ground of the British Treaty, some on account of the emissions of transferable paper. If the amendments proposed are adopted, it will readily be taken that the PRESIDENT's conduct has not been wise, firm, nor patriotic; for if we take it from his public character, it will be to very little purpose to give it him in his private, as we address him as a public man. He thought he had displayed in his public as well as private character wisdom, firmness, and patriotism. And were there, he asked, a majority in that House who would agree to a tacit reflection on the PRESIDENT's Administration, while they were willing to compliment him as a private character? It was justly observed, by the gentleman last up, that the form of the motion would rob him of his good name as a public officer. Mr. C. said, he sincerely felt, as he hoped a great majority in that House felt, a sincere sense of gratitude due to that character, and a desire to express his unequivocal opinion of approbation and respect for the PRESIDENT's wise, firm, and patriotic Administration.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH.—The sin of ingratitude is worse than the sin of witchcraft; and we shall damn ourselves to everlasting fame if we withhold the mighty tribute due to the excellent man whom we pretend to address. Posterity, throughout all future generations, will cry out shame on us. Our sons will blush that their fathers were his foes. If excess were possible on this occasion, it would be a glorious fault, and worth a dozen of little, sneaking, frigid virtues. I abhor a grudging bankrupt payment, where the debtor is much more benefited than the creditor. The gentleman from Virginia misrepresents his own constituents—I am sure he does all the rest of the Union. On the present occasion we ought not to consult our own little feelings and sensibilities. We should speak with the heart and in the voice of millions, and then we should speak warm and loud. What! "Damn with faint praise;" and suppress or freeze the warm, energetic, grateful sensations of almost every honest heart from Maine to Tennessee! I will not do it! Every line shall burn! This is a left-handed way of adoring the people.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, the motion then before them was of great importance, and every man who thought favorably of the PRESIDENT's Administration should there make a stand. For, if the words were struck out, it would convey an idea to the world that it was the opinion of that House that the Administration of the PRESIDENT had neither been wise nor patriotic. Gentlemen might very well concur in the Address in its present form, who did not think that every single act of the PRESIDENT had been wise and firm, since it was his Administration in general which was referred to, and not each individual act. He hoped, therefore, the amendment offered would be decidedly opposed, and that the words proposed to be struck out would be retained.

Address to the President.

Mr. PAGE thought that Mr. LIVINGSTON'S amendment properly confined the compliment to the PRESIDENT. Without it that compliment would be extended to all those that had any share in the administration of the Government of the United States. Senators, Representatives, and Heads of Departments must share it with him. Mr. P. was willing to give credit to the PRESIDENT for his wisdom, firmness, and patriotism, of which he had seen sufficient proofs in the course of his Administration; but he conceived that, after what had been said, with too much warmth on both sides, that there was no propriety in using expressions in the Address which can possibly convey an idea that the House meant to compliment the wisdom, firmness, and patriotism of any other man. Mr. P. looked upon the amendment as conciliatory, and as conveying the true meaning of the Committee of the Whole. He was not willing to censure the PRESIDENT for following advice which he had thought constitutionally binding on him. He was as much unwilling to give others credit for his virtues.

Mr. HEATH said, gentlemen seemed to have various opinions and to entertain very different ideas about the manner this Address would apply to the PRESIDENT. It appeared to him that the manner in which the Address now stood could not possibly involve any difficulty. He did not see the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LIVINGSTON] would any way answer the purpose of the Address; it would not be attended with sufficient force to convey the respect necessary on the present occasion—applying only to the private character. The wording, he said, would not appear well according to the amendment. After the words, “present form of Government,” the words would be altered to refer entirely to the public character of the PRESIDENT. He liked the phraseology of the Address as reported much better than the amendments, and he hoped they would remain without alteration.

Mr. W. LYMAN did not think it so unimportant as some gentlemen who had spoken on the subject, whether the words be introduced or not. As the words related to an applause of the Government, he should vote for the amendment. It was desirable, he said, to keep out of view, as far as possible, any difference of opinion on such subjects; but, since it was brought into view and discussed, he should, with other members, speak his opinion. He never should abandon his sentiments till he was convinced they were wrong. If we insert the original words in the Address it will be giving our general approbation to the public conduct of the PRESIDENT, while it makes impression on the minds of the people that the opinions of many of us who have disapproved of adopted measures are changed. If this clause goes into the Address, and we do not speak our opposition to it, it will be telling the world that we were wrong in our former ideas of those measures. He must think, in many instances, the PRESIDENT had done wrong. He did not pretend to arraign his motives; they were probably pure. He thought he had misjudged. When called upon by this House to deliver up the papers, at the last session, relative to the negotiation of the Treaty with Great Britain, and he refused, he believed, in withholding them, he did wrong. He thought he misjudged in sending an Envoy to England to negotiate, and through the whole business of the Treaty.

This was his opinion at that time, and he never had changed it, nor should he ever change it until he saw reason so to do. Now, sir, said Mr. L., am I to tell the world that I approve the measures of that man while I declare these opinions? Such an assent would prove my instability and weakness. I am willing to acknowledge that I believe the PRESIDENT possessed of as much wisdom, firmness, and patriotism as any man, but cannot believe it has dictated his Administration. I believe he has been very serviceable to the formation and support of the present form of Government. If the adulation were to be stretched further than this acknowledgment it would become bombast.

How gentlemen who had disapproved of many of the former measures of the Executive could now vote for their general approbation he was at a loss to account. He did not, like many members, think it immaterial whether the words were used or not. He thought if the original passed it would prove many of their former acts were wrong. Is any gentleman convinced he was wrong in opposing these measures? If so, let him say so, let him manifest it; but, if he was then right, he must now be wrong if found approving the conduct of the Government. Every day proves that these measures were unwise; and, with this evidence, he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. GALLATIN thought the words objected to were conceived to mean more than they really did mean by gentlemen who supported the present motion; nor could he conceive how the words “firmness and patriotism,” proposed to be inserted, could apply to any thing but the public character of the PRESIDENT. On the first view of the Address, Mr. G. said, he thought with the gentlemen from New York and Virginia, and it was not without considerable hesitation that he brought himself to agree to this part of the Address. He found, however, on further examination, that they did not go so far as he at first thought they did. Had they approved of every measure of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, he should have voted against them. But, in the first place, he would observe, that his Administration did not include Legislative acts; so that whatever evils had arisen from the funding or banking systems were not to be charged to the PRESIDENT. They did not mean to pay compliments to themselves but to the PRESIDENT: therefore, the words in question related only to the Administration of the PRESIDENT alone, and not to those officers of State which had been supposed by some gentlemen. The first question was, then, whether that Administration had been marked with wisdom, firmness, and patriotism? And, he would briefly say, so far as related to the internal situation of the country, it had borne these marks. He did not recollect any instance where he could say here was any want of wisdom, or there of firmness or patriotism. If they proceeded to foreign affairs, a great number of members were found (he for one) who wished that certain acts had not taken place; and, if he thought, in giving approbation to this Address, he was approving of these measures, he would certainly vote against it. But, as the gentlemen from South Carolina and New Jersey [MR. SMITH and the SPEAKER] had observed, as the approbation went to the Administration in toto, it had respect to no particular act. Nor did he believe the literal sense of the words would apply to the business of the late Treaty. [He read the words.] The most clear meaning of these words related to the present Government and Constitution; and the word "success" could apply to those parts of Administration only which had had time to be matured. He did not believe that at the present period it could be said that the Treaty with Great Britain had been successful, and, therefore, could not be included within the meaning of the expression. Not meaning to pledge an approbation of that act, and not conceiving that the sentence could have such a meaning, he would vote against the proposed amendment, and for the original.

Address to the President.

The question was put on the amendment and negatived. The Committee then rose, reported the Address with the amendments, when the House took them up, and having gone through them—

MR. SITGREAVES wished to know at what time it would be in order to move an amendment in the fourth paragraph of the Address. On being informed by the SPEAKER that he might do it as soon as the report of the Committee of the Whole should be gone through with, MR. SITGREAVES then observed that some gentlemen had thought that the Address as reported by the select committee had not sufficiently expressed our earnest desire to preserve peace and restore the harmony which had heretofore subsisted between America and France; and an amendment had accordingly been proposed yesterday to give additional emphasis to this sentiment. As no gentleman on the floor could estimate more highly than he did the blessings of peace, or more sincerely wish for its preservation, he felt no disposition to object to an expression of this sentiment in language the strongest that could be devised; and therefore he had acquiesced in the amendment which had been proposed, although he thought the Address was well enough before. But, he said, there was another sentiment of at least equal importance, which ought on all occasions to be the inseparable companion of the other, and which ought always to be as unequivocally and as emphatically expressed, to wit: the determination to respect our own rights, and to maintain our own character, in case the restoration of harmony between the two countries should, from any untoward circumstances, be rendered impracticable, without a sacrifice of the one or a violation of the other. These two sentiments, he contended, should, on no possible occasion of difference among nations, be disunited; they should always appear side by side, and have equal height and equal breadth. And since an amendment had prevailed to give additional size to one of them, he made the present motion with a view to restore the equilibrium. He presumed it would not meet with any opposition, because the sentiment was right and just in the abstract, and because the expression of it was proper to give aid and countenance to the Executive in any existing negotiations. But, if gentlemen would recur to what had been advanced by the gentleman from Virginia, [MR. GILES], who had moved the other amendment, the propriety of the present one would strike them with irresistible conviction. That member, who professed to speak with a competent knowledge of the subject, and from sources on which he could place perfect reliance, had declared that whatever ignorance might be affected by us, or whatever ostensible grounds might be assigned, the whole dissatisfaction of the French Republic might be resolved into a resentment at the Treaty lately concluded with Great Britain; and that for this reason they have violated the positive stipulations of our Treaty with them—have ordered their cruisers to make depredations on our commerce, and have suspended the amicable functions of their Minister here. MR. S. next adverted to what is said by MR. ADET, who, in his note to the Secretary of State, declares that these evidences of a well-founded dissatisfaction "are to last until the Executive of the United States returns to sentiments and measures more conformable to the interests and friendship of the two nations." On this combined view of the subject, if the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia was correct as to their discontents, and if the menaces of the Minister were to be relied on as to their continuance, MR. S. said he was apprehensive the negotiations could not end amicably. On such terms, he was very free to confess that he did not wish they should end amicably. If peace and friendship with the nation of France was only to be preserved by an abandonment of a compact recently made with another nation, by a sacrifice of our independency and free agency, he did not wish on such terms to preserve peace with them. He could never consent to deliver up our honor and our rights to any nation on earth; and on such a condition he did not think the friendship of any country was worth the purchase. He thought it of importance to discountenance any expectation that such an abandonment of our national rights and dignity could be at all suffered, and that we should speak on the occasion a language equally distant from defiance and submission, but which could not be misconceived or misunderstood.

He observed, further, that the French Minister had affected to draw a line between our Government and our people, and to insinuate that the acts of the one were not in unison with the feelings and wishes of the other. Such a mistake ought, by all possible means, to be corrected; and it behooved us to declare, beyond the hazard of misconstruction, that whatever differences of opinion might have prevailed among ourselves with respect to any measures of the Administration, we should nevertheless all unite in one sentiment of self-respect, and of inviolable determination to resist aggressions and insults from abroad. We owed it to ourselves and our country to accompany our sincere desire for peace and harmony with the unequivocal assertion of regard to our national dignity and independence.

He moved, therefore, to strike out the words from "while" to "countrymen," and to insert at the end of the paragraph the following: "At the same time we assure ourselves that your just confidence in the fortitude, self-respect, and patriotism of our citizens will not in any event be disappointed, and that they will on no occasion forget what is due to the character and dignity of our Government and country."

Mr. S. said, before he laid the amendment on the table, he would just observe that the Address as reported by the select committee had been, as was stated by the Chairman, [Mr. AMES,] the result of accommodation and compromise in the committee; and if the draught had been acquiesced in by others, he would not have desired to disturb it. It would have been more agreeable to him, however, if something like the amendment had been adopted there; and now, that additional force had been infused into the expression of one sentiment, he conceived he was every way justifiable in attempting to express the alternative with equal emphasis.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he took it for granted the gentleman just sat down understood the meaning of his own motion better than he did. He had stated that we would aid the Executive in any negotiations he may undertake. He was not willing to do this. He had avoided saying anything in the course of the debate on the present dispute between this country and France. He was even silent when he heard insinuated that the misunderstanding between the two countries was fomented by American citizens in Paris. He had meant, indeed, at some future time, to have asked the gentleman who made the assertion, for the ground of his information, as he doubtless knew the circumstance of which he spoke so confidently to be on a good foundation. He had avoided speaking on that subject, because it was not right to enter into things in that state concerning a nation with whom we were about to be involved. He thought the expression singular and imprudent. He considered the dispute with France as not yet ripe for discussion. The PRESIDENT has told us he reserved this subject for a future communication. He said he had very little information on the subject himself; he had not yet even read the French Minister's note, having been but few days in the city. He said he was charged by his constituents to do what was right; and was he to pledge himself to support what the Executive should do? He had no doubt but the PRESIDENT would conduct himself so as to settle matters amicably with that Republic; but he should think himself unpardonable to pledge himself to anything he did not know. He thought their proceeding very extraordinary. He however thought a rule of this House would afford a remedy, which was, by calling for the previous question. He therefore moved the previous question.

Mr. HARTLEY said he feared the House was exposing these things too much, as it would find its way into every newspaper. He thought the House not called upon to enter into it so far as the motion of his colleague went. Great care, he said, should be taken in entering into business of this kind, in its unripe state. Probably the PRESIDENT was now adjusting the matter amicably; and particularly at this time we ought not to take any steps that have the least appearance to invite contention with that nation, or any one upon earth. This subject is not before the House now. He wished as much as that gentleman for information on the subject; but as information was not sufficiently before the House, he should think it more wise to be satisfied till it came in its proper course. He therefore hoped the gentleman would not force his motion upon the House, but withdraw it. When there seemed to be a disposition in this House to be unanimous, he hoped it would not be disturbed by such a motion. They had a delicate part to act, and he hoped they should not do any action for which they would have reason to blame themselves hereafter.

This nation, he said, had difficulty enough to keep out of broils. The world were now armed at all points, and we are not. If war was declared against France, he hoped it would be done unanimously.

On the motion of a member, the clause was read as amended.

Mr. BAILEY called for the yeas and nays, and, on division, 25 members appeared in the affirmative.

Mr. SITGREAVES was very sorry that his motion should cause anything like alarm in the mind of his colleague, and was still more at a loss to conceive on what it could be founded. The amendment which he had proposed did not convey the most distant implication of hostility; yet his colleague seemed to think so, when he talked of a declaration of war. Mr. S. had taken pains to express, very unequivocally, his earnest desire that peace and harmony should be preserved, if possible, consistently with our national honor—and could not help wondering at his having been so much misconceived. His colleague had said they should wait for information. Mr. S. did not know what information was wanted, or could be necessary, before the adoption of his amendment: it was not of a nature to require any. The PRESIDENT had stated that circumstances of a disagreeable complexion had occurred in our relations with the French Republic. He had expressed his regret at these differences, and his desire to cultivate peace and a good understanding; but he states further, that in doing this, he shall not forget what is due to the character of our Government and nation. These sentiments, which ought eternally to be combined, the PRESIDENT had not separated: why then should they be separated by the House? The amendment proposed to go no further than the PRESIDENT had done; it repeated his language, and contained nothing more than an assurance of that support which the Executive was entitled to receive from the Representatives of the people. It contained not a single expression that could justly be deemed irritating or offensive to the French or any other nation; and any idea of that kind must arise out of the gentleman's own feelings, and not from anything in Mr. S.'s proposition. He was so perfectly satisfied with the expediency of holding a language at once moderate and firm on this occasion, that he could not consent to withdraw the amendment; and was glad that the yeas and nays were called, which he should have done himself, if it had not been done by others. He was solemnly impressed that the sentiment could not be disavowed without a sacrifice of national honor, and that the circumstances of the times demanded the declaration of it.

In reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS,] he said that the amendment could not be considered, but by a most distorted construction, to pledge the House to the support of any specific measures, or of all the measures which might eventually be adopted by the Executive; it pledged them only to such a conduct as circumstances might render proper for a preservation of our character and independence as a nation; and this pledge, he hoped, would never be abandoned or forgotten.

Mr. CLAIBORNE hoped the question on the amendment would not be taken at all. Will this, he asked, be a paper fit to put into the hands of our negotiator, in this time of danger, to authorize him to say to the French nation, If you will not be satisfied with our conduct, we are not disposed to accede to any other terms? That gentleman's motion, he said, surely carried an extremely hostile aspect: he thought such language would have a bad effect. We ought not to pretend to negotiate with a sword in our hand. Men did not like to negotiate with a dagger at their breast. He hoped no question would be taken on words that must tend to hostility, but that we should take every means towards the preservation of peace with the French Republic.

Mr. GILBERT could see nothing in the question that had the least hostile appearance—nothing that alluded to a declaration of war. He was surprised how gentlemen could so interpret the motion. He thought it would be very unbecoming in a nation to talk of negotiation without that patriotism which tends to prevent incroachments. He thought these ideas were as closely connected with a just national dignity as body and soul. He should support the motion.

The SPEAKER said gentlemen went too far: the previous question was the point to which they must confine themselves.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to know what debate could take place if the members' mouths were to be muzzled, and prevented from speaking their sentiments: he certainly should speak his, while in order.

The SPEAKER insisted upon the member confining himself to the point of order.

Mr. SMITH said he now rose to express himself on the propriety of adopting the amendment, and against the previous question. Some gentlemen say that the resolution had better not be entered into now. He differed from them in that; he thought if any declaration at all was made, it ought to be now. His reasons were, because we are now answering the PRESIDENT's Speech; and the circumstances which have lately occurred seem to call for such a declaration; and because, in withholding it, we run great risks, inasmuch as we hold out a new idea to the French Government that we are so alarmed by the note of their Minister as to throw ourselves on the justice and moderation of the Republic. He thought there was much need to assert our national dignity, and prove that we do not throw ourselves on the mercy of that nation. Gentlemen have said they have no information on the subject: they surely could not be unacquainted with the appeal of the French Minister to the people of the United States. He thought it was just for the members of that House to speak on the subject. In that Minister's representation to the people, he has said that his nation is offended with ours, and that they will continue so until our Government returns to itself by a change of its conduct. This is the very time, Mr. S. said, for those gentlemen who were convinced that our Government has acted in its proper character—that we have not been changed by any act or threat of the French—this is the proper time for them to come forward and express the full reliance the Executive may have in the co-operation and support of this House. Surely there was no threat in this: the threat does not come from us, it comes from that Republic. The PRESIDENT informs us that he has done all he could towards an amicable settlement of the business, but that, notwithstanding all, they persisted in their complaints. However, he says he shall go on to pursue those measures which may tend to produce harmony; at the same time he shall not forget what is due to our nation. He closes the subject of the communication with the French with that sentiment. And can we avoid expressing our wish that he would do so: at the same time, declaring that he may place a firm reliance in our willingness to support his endeavors? The French Minister is offended on account of the Treaty we have made with Great Britain: he considers that we have violated our neutrality. If he pursues this idea, we must be involved with one or the other of those nations; and while we are in this dilemma, at such a serious period as this, will gentlemen say that it will be improper for us to declare to the PRESIDENT that we will pursue and support the measures of Government? We could do no less. Mr. S. said he thought it necessary to make these observations, in which he had kept himself as much in order (about which we are so hampered) as possible. This, said he, is the proper time to make such a declaration, as we may not have another; and he could not see how it was to be avoided at this time. He hoped the amendment would be agreed to.

Address to the President.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HARTLEY wished that part of the Address to be read with the clause proposed for amendment; which was done, and the SPEAKER at the same time read the rule of the House on the subject of order, and begged gentlemen to regard it. Mr. H. then said that he had mentioned to the House some time since that it would be prudent in this House to wait till the expected communication was made before the subject underwent any discussion; that having not been attended to, he should so far deviate from his own ideas as to offer a word on the subject. He was surprised, he said, that the British Treaty had offended the French Minister. Certainly we have a right to form such a Treaty as a majority of the Legislature approves. He was still sorry that the subject had undergone so much discussion at this time, as he thought our present situation so critical that we ought to act with the greatest caution. But, from the new views he had taken of the subject, he should support the motion of his colleague, as their support to the Government was become so necessary.

Mr. HARPER conceived it to be strictly in order to show that the proposed declaration was proper to be passed at this time. If he had a right idea of the previous question, it could not have an effect to smother debate. He should, therefore, go on to state one or two things which he thought important, and he would begin by declaring, that if he believed the resolution went to the pledging of the House to any particular measures they hereafter might see reason to disapprove, he would not only vote for the previous question, but against the motion altogether. If he understood the motion, it went no further than to say, "We join you in wishing to preserve the most sincere amity with the French Republic; but if all means to attain it fail; if it should happen that, notwithstanding all the exertions used, peace cannot be preserved, we shall hold ourselves bound to support you." If gentlemen examined the amendment, they would find it contained no more than this. If this was the declaration, he would ask—

[A member desired to know of the SPEAKER whether Mr. H. was in order? The SPEAKER replied, it was impossible to say how the gentleman meant to apply what he had said. He desired him to go on.]

Mr. HARPER said, it was his intention to show that the main question ought to be taken, and appealed to the feelings of every heart—to those honorable feelings of patriotism which distinguished American citizens—whether this was an improper declaration? If it were improper, he had widely misconceived their duty. He should think it the deepest disgrace to be at any moment free from the operation of these feelings. And, if this sentiment was honorable, he said, there could not be any occasion in which it would be improper to express it to other nations, declaring that we will guard the rights of our nation, preserving peace in possible; but that in the other alternative we fear not to support our Government. He knew of no situation in which it would be improper to express these sentiments. Are we, according to the sentiments of some gentlemen, to say to the American people, that we will use all honorable means, and if that will not do, that we will act dishonorably? Mr. H. said, if he believed all that had been said of our inability, of that submissive spirit which had been spoken of, he would join with gentlemen in their opinion. So weak, so out-cast a set of men should not disgrace such sentiments by uttering them. But he believed they should do right to utter them—

[Mr. W. LYMAN called Mr. HARPER to order.]

The SPEAKER said the gentleman was out of order. Mr. H. was about to go on, but the SPEAKER informed him he could rise only to explain. The question was here put, whether the member might rise to explain? Fifty-four members appeared in the affirmative—it was carried. [The SPEAKER read the rule on this subject, observing that it was with pain he was forced to declare the member out of order.] Mr. HARPER rose, and the SPEAKER wished to know whether he appealed from the decision of the Chair to the House? He answered in the affirmative; and, on leave being given, he explained to the House, that he meant to show that the main question ought to be put, as a proper declaration to be made at this time. He complained of this strictness against him, which was closing his mouth on an important question; he however submitted to the House. The sense of the House being taken, he was declared out of order—50 votes being against him; he then sat down.

Mr. VENABLE expressed his surprise that any member should have so persisted in forcing himself in this way upon the House in contradiction to the will of the members, the injunctions of the SPEAKER, and the express rules of the House.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to know who had made this gentleman [Mr. V.] a censor on the business.

The previous question was then called for by five members, viz: "Shall the main question to agree to the said amendment be now put?"

It passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 49, as follows:

The amendment of Mr. SITGREAVES was therefore laid aside.

Mr. BLOUNT then moved to strike out the following clause in the last paragraph: "For our country's sake, for the sake of Republican liberty, it is our earnest wish that your example may be the guide of your successors; and thus, after being the ornament and safeguard of the present age, become the patrimony of your descendants."

And on the question thereon, it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS.—Theodorus Bailey, David Bard, Thomas Blount, Gabriel Christie, John Clopton, Isaac Coles, Albert Gallatin, William B. Giles, Christopher Greenup, John Heath, James Holland, Andrew Jackson, George Jackson, Edward Livingston, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Samuel Maclay, Nathaniel Macon, Andrew Moore, Josiah Parker, John Patton, John Swanwick, Joseph B. On the question being about to be put on the answer as amended, Mr. BLOUNT wished the yeas and nays might be taken, that posterity might see that he did not consent to the Address.

The main question being put, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 67, nays 12, as follows:

Resolved, That the SPEAKER, attended by the House, do present the said Address; and that Mr. AMES, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. SITGREAVES, be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the same.

FRIDAY, December 16.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT to know when and where he would receive the answer of this House to his Address, reported that he had appointed to receive it at his house this day at two o'clock.

A petition was presented from William Crowley Jordan, of Philadelphia, stating the advantages that may be derived from the culture of silkworms, and the establishment of a manufactory of that kind in this country, which he supposes peculiarly calculated to their improvement. He prays the aid and patronage of Congress. Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report of the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1797; also, a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Treasury of the United States for one year preceding the 1st of October, 1796; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table, and, on motion, to be printed.

On motion of Mr. GALLATIN, it was resolved that a standing Committee of Ways and Means be appointed, whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House; to inquire into the state of the Public Debt; of the revenue and of the expenditure; and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon. Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. BRADBURY, Mr. N. SMITH, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. GREENUP, Mr. GILBERT, Mr. ISAAC SMITH, Mr. GALLATIN, Mr. PATTON, Mr. HINDMAN, Mr. MADISON, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. A. JACKSON, were appointed to that committee.

J. B. DUMON.

Mr. SHERBURNE presented a memorial of Jean Baptiste Dumon, son and heir of J. B. Dumon, late of Beauport, in Canada, praying to be reimbursed certain advances made by the deceased for the support of the Army of the United States, and also for losses and injuries sustained in his person and property, by adhering to the American cause during the war.

Mr. GILBERT said, this memorial had been before the House last session, and decided against; he thought if there were not some new circumstances displayed in the case, it could not again be recommitted to the same committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON hoped it would again come under the consideration of the House, although it was the last session rejected, yet the very peculiar hardship attending this man would apologize for the return of the memorial; besides, he said, it was acted on at the last session in a very thin House, and opposed by a very small majority.

Mr. SHERBURNE said, there had been instances before of petitions which were rejected at one Congress being brought forward at another. He said, last session, when this memorial was called up from the table, he was not present, which was necessary in order to speak on his knowledge of the case; the circumstances attending its rejection at that time, he thought, would allow it again to be presented.

Mr. GILBERT could not place it on the footing of right. He said, it being before that House last session, and not a different Congress, conspired against its appearance now; how far it was right to suffer the same business perpetually to come before the House, he should leave gentlemen to judge.

Mr. HEATH.—I hope, sir, no gentleman within the walls of this House will ever limit the rights of petitions. I hope the doors of this House will never be shut against petitioners. It is probable this case may be somewhat varied, circumstances may appear more clear; I therefore hope it will be acted on. We frequently have the very same case come forward after being rejected, and in the same session, only it has been presented with another face. I hope we shall not be strictly confined within the forms of a petty court of justice. We may act upon a more general, and I hope, more generous scale.

Mr. SWIFT said, he wished the right to be as extensive to petitioners as any person; he believed they should not have the same petition in exactly the same words: when a petition states new facts, it would be well to suffer it to come forward; but to have the same petition come forward time after time, year after year, and be as often rejected, he thought it improper to encourage. It is not to be presumed that the House would change opinions. If it was stated differently, and yet only the same facts remaining as before, he thought it did not change its nature; he did not see any new evidences in this memorial.

Mr. HEATH said no person could charge his memory whether the memorial was the same or not; he wished it to be referred to the committee to examine it; their report would speak to that.

Mr. SWIFT thought they might be compared, and if found the same, reject it; if not, commit it.

Mr. THATCHER did not think the gentleman's reasoning last up was sound. "If the same, reject, if not, refer it." He thought there was no reason in this, why it should not be referred to the committee. It might be the same petition, and might have been rejected, because it had not proper evidence, but it may now have new evidence in its favor, and there may be good reason to support the claim now, though there was not before.

It was then referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SWANWICK moved the following resolution; which was agreed to:

"Resolved, That all petitions which, during the last session of Congress, were referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, and not by them reported on, be referred to the present committee on that subject."

CANADIAN REFUGEES

Mr. WILLIAMS moved, that, according to the order of the day, the House resolve itself into a committee on the petition of the Canadian and Nova Scotia refugees.

Mr. PARKER opposed it, on account of going into a Committee on the PRESIDENT'S Speech; he said, there were many important points in it which required a speedy discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, these petitions had waited two or three years for the decision of Congress; it would take but a few minutes; he therefore hoped it would be acted on. The motion was lost.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. PARKER moved for the House to go into Committee on the PRESIDENT'S Speech.

Mr. THATCHER said, it had been usual for the answer to be presented first: if that had been the practice, it ought to be preserved; however, he thought it not right to take it into consideration until an answer was presented.

Mr. PARKER said, the answer was agreed to, which he thought the same. If, said he, we wait on the PRESIDENT at two o'clock, it will then be too late to take it up, and he thought there was now time enough before that to go through it, as when we adjourn, it will most likely be till Monday; he said some progress would be made before Monday, without loss of time. The session would be so short there was need to improve it all.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman read the PRESIDENT'S Speech by paragraphs.

Mr. PARKER moved the following:

"Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, That provision ought to be made for carrying into full effect the Treaty with the Dey and Regency of Algiers."

Mr. HEATH would be thankful to the mover for information what provision had been made last session, and what deficiency there might be, as he supposed the gentleman had sufficiently acquainted himself with the circumstance.

Mr. PARKER said he could not inform the gentleman; he was no way acquainted with the arcanas of the War Office; what had been done, he had no knowledge of. He supposed it would be best to refer it to a committee, and when their report came forward, it would inform the House. He said it was the business of the House to forward an inquiry into a circumstance, which, to his view, was necessary.

Mr. GILES hoped the resolution would not take effect; he thought we ought not to decide on the merit of the case until the business came before the House; he thought it quite premature. It ought at least to be suspended till we have a knowledge of the proper sum necessary to carry it into full effect. He was not prepared to vote for it.

Mr. BALDWIN said, such a subject ought to be referred to a committee: the Committee of Ways and Means he thought the most proper to examine into it, and report thereon.

Mr. PARKER had no objection to any modification the subject might take, so that it comes before the House.

Mr. SWIFT could not see what the Committee of Ways and Means could do with it; but he thought it the duty of the House to inquire what was necessary to answer that purpose. He meant to vote for the motion.

Mr. PAGE objected to it in point of form. He said a Committee of the Whole could not refer to any other committee. The Chairman informed the members that in the form the question was put, there appeared nothing inconsistent with order.

Mr. SITGREAVES said they ought to wait the arrival of the statement of accounts from the proper Department before any resolution was passed on the subject.

Mr. THATCHER hoped at present the resolution would not be agreed to, as he thought it quite premature; no doubt as the PRESIDENT had made mention of it in his Speech he would make a communication on that subject. It had been unusual to expect a communication till we had answered his Speech: he thought we ought to wait that communication; he will inform the House the sum necessary for that purpose.

On a division, the motion was negatived.

The several resolutions hereafter mentioned, were also agreed to by the Committee; which, having been severally taken up by the House, were twice read, and adopted, viz:

1. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that an inquiry ought to be made into the state of the Naval equipment, ordered by former acts of Congress; and whether any, and what, other Naval force shall be necessary for the protection of the commerce of the United States, and the support of their flag.

Mr. PARKER, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. HARPER, and Mr. SHERBURNE, were appointed a committee pursuant to the same.

2. Resolved, That so much of the PRESIDENT'S Speech as relates to the encouragement of manufactures, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

3. Resolved, That so much of the PRESIDENT'S Speech as relates to the promotion of agriculture, be referred to a select committee; and Mr. SWIFT, Mr. GREGG, and Mr. BRENT, were accordingly appointed.

4. Resolved, That inquiry ought to be made, whether any, and what, alterations are necessary to be made in the compensations allowed by law to the officers of the United States.

A committee was accordingly appointed, of nine members, viz: Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. DAVENPORT, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. PAGE, Mr. FRANKLIN, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. A. JACKSON.

5. Resolved, That inquiry ought to be made whether any, and what, further measures are necessary to reinforce the existing provisions for the discharge of the Public Debt.

On motion, it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

6. Resolved, That inquiry ought to be made into the actual state of the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States, and whether any, and what, further provision is necessary on that subject.

A committee of seven members was accordingly appointed for that purpose, consisting of Mr. W. LYMAN, Mr. COLES, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. PATTON, and Mr. VAN CORTLANDT.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of so much of the PRESIDENT'S Speech as relates to the establishment of a National University, and that the same be committed to the committee on the memorial of the Commissioners at the Federal City.

Mr. SITGREAVES moved that the bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia, presented the 25th of January last, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House; which was carried, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

TREASURY REPORTS.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the several Reports and statements from the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the annual expenditures of the War Department from the commencement of the present Government to the 31st of December, 1795, to laying and collecting direct taxes among the several States, agreeably to the rule prescribed by the Constitution; and to estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1797; and receipts and expenditures at the Treasury of the United States, for the year preceding the 1st of October, 1796, which were laid before the House this session, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PETITIONS OF LOAN OFFICERS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved that the petition from the Loan Offices be now considered. It appeared by a conversation among the members that this business had been last session referred to the Committee of Claims, but whether reported on or not, the House never took it up, nor was it inserted among the unfinished business. It was then resolved, that the several memorials and petitions of Nathaniel Appleton, Commissioner of Loans for Massachusetts; of James Ewing for New Jersey; of William Skinner for North Carolina; of Joshua Green, Richard Duryee, and others, clerks in Loan Offices, presented to the House at the last session, be referred to the committee on the subject of compensation.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the hour was nearly at hand, which the PRESIDENT had appointed for receiving the Address of the House, in answer to his Speech. The members, in a body, accordingly waited upon the PRESIDENT, at his house; and the SPEAKER pronounced the following Address:

"SIR: The House of Representatives have attended to your communication respecting the state of our country, with all the sensibility that the contemplation of the subject and a sense of duty can inspire.

"We are gratified by the information, that measures calculated to insure a continuance of the friendship of the Indians, and to maintain the tranquility of the Western frontier, have been adopted; and we indulge the hope that these, by impressing the Indian tribes with more correct conceptions of the justice, as well as power of the United States, will be attended with success.

"While we notice, with satisfaction, the steps that you have taken, in pursuance of the late Treaties with several foreign nations, the liberation of our citizens, who were prisoners at Algiers, is a subject of peculiar felicitation. We shall cheerfully co-operate in any further measures that shall appear, on consideration, to be requisite.

"We have ever concurred with you in the most sincere and uniform disposition to preserve our neutral relations inviolate; and it is, of course, with anxiety and deep regret we hear that any interruption of our harmony with the French Republic has occurred; for we feel with you, and with our constituents, the cordial and unabated wish to maintain a perfectly friendly understanding with that nation. Your endeavors to fulfil that wish, and by all honorable means to preserve peace and to restore that harmony and affection, which have heretofore so happily subsisted between the French Republic and the United States, cannot fail, therefore, to interest our attention. And while we participate in the full reliance you have expressed on the patriotism, self-respect, and fortitude of our countrymen, we cherish the pleasing hope that a mutual spirit of justice and moderation will insure the success of your perseverance.

"The various subjects of your communication will, respectively, meet with the attention that is due to their importance.

"When we advert to the internal situation of the United States, we deem it equally natural and becoming to compare the present period with that immediately antecedent to the operation of the Government, and to contrast it with the calamities in which the state of war still involves several of the European nations, as the reflections deduced from both tend to justify as well as to excite a warmer admiration of our free Constitution, and to exalt our minds to a more fervent and grateful sense of piety towards Almighty God for the beneficence of His providence, by which its Administration has been hitherto so remarkably distinguished.

"And while we entertain a grateful conviction that your wise, firm, and patriotic Administration has been signally conducive to the success of the present form of Government, we cannot forbear to express the deep sensations of regret with which we contemplate your intended retirement from office.

"As no other suitable occasion may occur, we cannot suffer the present to pass without attempting to disclose some of the emotions which it cannot fail to awaken.

"The gratitude and admiration of your countrymen are still drawn to the recollection of those resplendent virtues and talents which were so eminently instrumental to the achievement of the Revolution, and of which that glorious event will ever be the memorial. Your obedience to the voice of duty and your country, when you quitted reluctantly, a second time, the retreat you had chosen, and first accepted the Presidency, afforded a new proof of the devotedness of your zeal in its service, and an earnest of the patriotism and success which have characterized your Administration. As the grateful confidence of the citizens in the virtues of their Chief Magistrate has essentially contributed to that success, we persuade ourselves that the millions whom we represent, participate with us in the anxious solicitude of the present occasion.

"Yet we cannot be unmindful that your moderation and magnanimity, twice displayed by retiring from your exalted stations, afford examples no less rare and instructive to mankind, than valuable to a Republic.

"Although we are sensible that this event, of itself, completes the lustre of a character already conspicuously unrivalled by the coincidence of virtue, talents, success, and public estimation; yet we conceive we owe it to you, sir, and still more emphatically to ourselves and to our nation; (of the language of whose hearts we presume to think ourselves at this moment the faithful interpreters,) to express the sentiments with which it is contemplated.

"The spectacle of a free and enlightened nation offering, by its Representatives, the tribute of unfeigned approbation to its first citizen, however novel and interesting it may be, derives all its lustre (a lustre which accident or enthusiasm could not bestow, and which adulation would tarnish,) from the transcendent merit of which it is the voluntary testimony.

"May you long enjoy that liberty which is so dear to you, and to which your name will ever be so dear: may your own virtues and a nation's prayers obtain the happiest sunshine for the decline of your days and the choicest of future blessings. For our country's sake, for the sake of Republican liberty, it is our earnest wish that your example may be the guide of your successors; and thus, after being the ornament and safeguard of the present age, become the patrimony of our descendants."

To which the PRESIDENT made the following Reply:

"GENTLEMEN: To a citizen whose views were unambitious, who preferred the shade and tranquility of private life, to the splendor and solicitude of elevated stations, and whom the voice of duty and his country could alone have drawn from his chosen retreat, no reward for his public services can be so grateful as public approbation, accompanied by a consciousness that to render those services useful to that country has been his single aim: and when this approbation is expressed by the Representatives of a free and enlightened nation, the reward will admit of no addition. Receive, gentlemen, my sincere and affectionate thanks for this signal testimony that my services have been acceptable and useful to my country. The strong confidence of my fellow citizens, while it animated all my actions, insured their zealous co-operation, which rendered those services successful. The virtue and wisdom of my successors, joined with the patriotism and intelligence of the citizens who compose the other branches of Government, I firmly trust, will lead them to the adoption of measures which, by the beneficence of Providence, will give stability to our system of Government, add to its success, and secure to ourselves and to posterity that liberty which is to all of us so dear.

"While I acknowledge, with pleasure, the sincere and uniform disposition of the House of Representatives to preserve our neutral relations inviolate, and, with them, deeply regret any degree of interruption of our good understanding with the French Republic, I beg you, gentlemen, to rest assured that my endeavors will be earnest and unceasing, by all honorable means, to preserve peace, and to restore that harmony and affection which have heretofore so happily subsisted between our two nations; and with you, I cherish the pleasing hope that a mutual spirit of justice and moderation will crown those endeavors with success.

"I shall cheerfully concur in the beneficial measures which your deliberations shall mature on the various subjects demanding your attention. And while directing your labors to advance the real interests of our country, you receive its blessings; with perfect sincerity my individual wishes will be offered for your present and future felicity.

"G. WASHINGTON."

The members then returned to the House, and having resumed their places, the SPEAKER presented a copy of the PRESIDENT'S ANSWER to the Clerk; which he read.

A communication was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, with a statement of the drawbacks paid upon dutiable articles in the years 1793, 1794, and 1795, in pursuance of a resolve of the House on the first of June last. It was ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, December 19.

JOHN HATHORN from New York, and JOHN MILLEDGE from Georgia, appeared and took their seats.

A new member to wit: ELISHA R. POTTER from Rhode Island, in the place of BENJAMIN BOURNE resigned, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

ORGANIZING THE MILITIA.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States, was among the orders of the day. As that business had been a considerable time in hand, he wished it now to be taken up, in order to determine the principle, whether the Militia should be continued upon its present footing, or whether it should be divided into two classes, viz: a select corps and a reserved corps, as contemplated by the present bill. It could undergo any alterations for its improvement that may be necessary without new modifying it. Until this question was decided nothing could be done. For his own part, he said, he was no military man, but he had made it his business to inquire into the subject, and he found it to be the opinion of those well versed in military matters, that the plan proposed by this bill could not be carried into effect with success. He wished, however, the House to come to the decision. If it was their wish to continue the Militia upon the present plan, and not adopt the plan proposed by the bill, the first clause could be struck out—if this motion should be agreed to, he should then move for the Committee to rise, and a select committee to be appointed to prepare such alterations as may be proper for its general acceptance; this would considerably shorten the business; and as the session would be a short one, the sooner the House went into the subject the better; he therefore hoped the House would resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on that subject.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, when the first section of the bill was read, which is in the following words:

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, the Militia of the United States shall be composed of all able-bodied white male citizens of the respective States, resident therein, who shall, respectively, be of the age of twenty years, and under forty years. That the said Militia shall be divided into classes; the first class to be denominated the select corps of the Militia of the United States; the second class to be denominated the reserved corps of the Militia of the United States. The select corps of the Militia of the United States shall be composed of all able-bodied white male citizens, respectively, who shall be of the age of twenty years, and under the age of twenty-five years. The reserved corps shall be composed of all able-bodied white male citizens, respectively, who shall be of the age of twenty-five years, and under the age of forty years: Provided, That, in the choice of officers, either of the select corps, or reserved corps, no respect shall be had to the limitations of age aforesaid; the foregoing regulations to be subject, however, to the exemptions hereafter specified."

Mr. SMITH then said that, in order to come at the right method, he should move to strike out the first section of this bill, as above. At the time this bill was under discussion at a former period, there was much opposition to this clause: the great expense it would incur; the great inconvenience and the general embarrassment that would attend it, in drawing a number of industrious people from their business to form companies, were mentioned as great difficulties. He hoped that a select committee would be appointed, who may devise a better scheme than the present system appeared to be. In many States, he said, the Militia was upon a very good regulation; in others, it was upon a very bad one. He hoped, therefore, his motion would be agreed to.

Mr. DEARBORN said, he should second the motion, and with the same view as was expressed by the mover—that the business may be shortened by preventing a long discussion of the several parts, which would waste much time, and take up the whole at once. It appeared to him that the bill would not pass the House, as there were many parts of it he thought inadmissible into a Militia system; and, he said, the same objections would be made to them as had been before. The first clause, including the select corps, he said was repugnant to the will of the people, however, to that part of the country with which he was acquainted. He hoped that the clause would be struck out, in order to a recommitment of the bill.

Organizing the Militia.

Mr. HARPER believed considerable difficulty and embarrassment may attend the mode of organizing the Militia specified in the first clause of the bill; but he thought it an essential method toward forming a complete military system, which he thought the old way not efficient in; he, therefore, hoped this alternative would be adopted. Which of the two, Mr. H. asked, would the Committee prefer, a complete system, or one which had been found to fail so materially of its object, as the one now used? It is said that this plan will be attended with very considerable expense. He believed any effectual military system would be attended with considerable expense, whether the military necessary for the defence of the country is to consist of several select corps or a standing national establishment, (which was not wished by any,) or whether of the whole body of the people capable of bearing arms, each will be attended with a heavy expense. It has been said, that to draw our youth from their homes and labor to be instructed in military duty, would not only lessen the stock of labor, and, consequently, of national wealth, but be an injury to their morals. The time they were to remain in encampment to learn discipline, would be so short, that he thought the objections of gentlemen on that ground would vanish, if they would consider. It is said that two or three weeks will be enough for this purpose; and that the most convenient time would be in the Fall season; and the same length of time, some other season of the year, would be sufficient. Persons in agricultural lives, it is well known, can, at some seasons, be well spared from their labor, without any particular inconvenience for that short time; and, if that is too long a time, one week will be better than no time; they will be able, even in that little time, to acquire some knowledge of military exercise; thus, Mr. H. supposed, that difficulty was avoided. With respect to the morals of the youth being injured, as had been suggested, he would observe, that it was not contemplated to bring them into large encampments, nor to keep them long at a time, nor to be quartered in towns, either of which may possibly have a bad tendency; besides, the military discipline they would be kept under, and the military duty to be attended to, would preclude them from running into excess or disorder, as they will, while there, have enough to do during the whole week; the design is, to let their encampments be in small numbers, to prevent contamination. He acknowledged those objections may have some foundation, and were, in a small degree, in existence, but the importance of the advantages to be derived from such a plan as this, he believed, considerably overweighed them. As a proof that the present system is very defective, we may appeal to the many communications from the PRESIDENT on the subject; also, the very raw and undisciplined nature of those now termed Militia, when they are called out, and the evidence of military officers in general; witness a recent instance, when the Militia were called out; the chief support of that expedition depended upon voluntary public spirit, and entirely, or nearly, independent of any Militia laws; it was more from individual patriotism for the public service, than by an existing compulsory laws.

If, then, the present measures will not prove efficacious to accomplish so advantageous an end, it must be altered. And how must we alter it? While we keep in view the formation of a National Army of the whole United States, must we follow the old system? If you will not arm the people, and subject them to military duty, where is your force? You must either give up the idea of an efficient military force, or you must adopt a mode similar to that now proposed, and abandon the existing system.

This brings us to the plan proposed in the present bill. Whether the precise manner of modifying the principle of this bill be a right one; whether disciplining all persons between 18 and 25 years of age be right or not, he would not say, that he would leave to the committee to decide; there possibly might be a preferable regulation proposed, if so, he should be very willing to vote for its adoption; but something was necessary to be done, or the idea of our national defence must cease. Gentlemen from some parts of the country were not so strikingly impressed, nor so well informed of the necessity of this measure as he was. Mr. H. professed to be pretty well acquainted with the Eastern States. The whole body of the Militia could there be collected in a small circumference, as they were thickly settled; but when you come to a part of the country where, to assemble a company of Militia, you must travel 20, or in some places 40, miles square, this plan becomes impracticable. Admitting that the present system is wholly incompetent or improper, where the settlement is thin, the question then is, whether the system proposed in its stead would be injurious to the more thickly settled parts of the country? In the Eastern States, some additional burden may be laid on the people, and some inconveniences may there be felt; but would they be more than are now felt in some other parts? He believed the present system had greater inconveniences attending it in some places, and to greater extent, than could possibly attend this new system. In short, he believed that it would be everywhere practicable, even in the Eastern States; although, possibly not so necessary, yet he thought it would be of great service; while he was so sensibly impressed with these ideas, he could not agree to strike out the paragraph. He hoped it would have all the amendment it was susceptible of; but he hoped the form of the clause would be retained, and that the bill would be discussed throughout; but he believed no other system would be so serviceable as this, in half of the United States.

Mr. SITGREAVES confessed he felt a difficulty to decide on the subject now before the Committee. He had not the honor of a seat in that House when the subject underwent a discussion. He must confess the ideas of the gentleman from South Carolina appeared to be just. With respect to the State of Pennsylvania, from all the knowledge he had of it, and the conversations with a number of military officers, who had universally concurred, he sincerely thought, that there was an absolute necessity of new arrangements to give force and efficacy to the military system. None can doubt of the bravery and patriotism of our citizens; but bravery alone will not effect our security, without a military system to call forth that bravery into proper use. If bravery alone would do, our military arrangements would be ineffectual. True discipline, he said, was the life and soul of an Army. An Army well disciplined, with bravery, could encounter every difficulty. If it is true, that discipline is the only effectual way to obtain that desirable end, we had better use our utmost exertions to carry it into force; if it can only be acquired by a mode like that specified in the present bill, neither trouble nor expense should stand in the way of its accomplishment; trouble or expense is not of that consequence, as that we should avoid the main means to our national security. Mr. S. could not conceive that a day or two in a year was sufficient to acquire a sufficient stock of military knowledge. It was well known that that day or two, very great imperfections attended the arrangement, and no advantage was derived. He should, therefore, wish to hear stronger objections to the plan before he could vote for striking out the clause in question.

The bill before them, Mr. S. said, was the system of Baron Steuben. He knew this was a favorite system with the citizens of this State, and that it would prove very acceptable to them. It was said, there were some States in which the Militia is on a good footing, and requires no amendment. He wished some of the gentlemen from those parts would inform the Committee of the means which were there taken to make their military system so useful, that we may make use of similar measures in the Middle and some of the Eastern States; if not, he should not consent to part with the plan now proposed.

Mr. HENDERSON said, there was not a person in the Committee more disposed to amend the present military system than he was; but he must confess no person could object to the measures now proposed more than himself. Two or three grounds of objection operated in his mind against the Government going into this amendment, and he had not heard an argument that could remove them. What he had to observe on the subject came into his mind only since the discussion began. As to the principle of the bill, he thought it a bad one. In a Republican Government, military service ought to be as equally divided among its citizens as possible: this would not be the case if the present system was carried into effect. It is but a small proportion of our citizens who are included between the ages of 20 and 25 years; he, therefore, supposed that the burden would fall entirely upon one-fifth of the people; of these, a considerable part would pay their equivalent to be excused from serving; thus, the poorer and most indigent class of citizens will have the defence of the nation entirely thrown on them.

Mr. H. also thought the measure unconstitutional. It appeared to him that the General Government had no power to call out people to train them for military service; he rather thought it ought to be left with the different States to call out their own citizens for military discipline.

With respect to the policy of the measure, Mr. H. thought the plan of this bill would be subjecting the United States to a very heavy expense: more than Congress would like, or at present could spare. Suppose the select corps consist of 100,000 men, which could not be rating too high, this he should suppose to cost between three and four millions of dollars; he thought this a very great sum, the saving of which would be an important measure.

The plan he thought objectionable on another ground—it was but a few years since the General Government newly organized the Militia; since which the States scarce had time to regulate their systems, to make them agreeable to the General Government. This new system would cause a new derangement. were they called upon again to change their system. Should we, then, encourage the agitation of the public mind, already too much agitated, by adopting measures which would prove unpopular and disagreeable? Mr. H. believed the State of New Jersey, which he had the honor to represent, had a very respectable Militia, and the law they had established had been very effectual to promote that purpose; that State had very good troops, both horse and foot, which were supported at individual expense; they prided themselves in a respectable corps: he liked a Militia will better than a Militia law. And shall we discourage this spirit by an act which shall blast its endeavors? He hoped not. It appeared to him this would at once damp that spirit which tends to security. He hoped we should never adopt any compulsive laws. If Government only retains the confidence of the people, the Militia of, at least, that State, (of which Mr. H. knew most) would be ready at any demand the Government should make of them.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] had said, that the present system was effectual in most parts of the Union. Then, Mr. H. would ask, why change it? Why relinquish that system which was effectual in the most populous part of the Union, to accommodate a widely dispersed part, inhabited by comparatively a few? If, in the Eastern States, where are the majority of inhabitants, this system is found agreeable, why introduce a change? The gentleman's argument turned against his conclusion. Till he heard far more weighty arguments, he should vote for striking out the clause.

Mr. BALDWIN said, his mind was made up in favor of striking out the section. It may appear

DECEMBER, 1796.]

Organizing the Militia.

rather hasty on a subject of so much importance to take it up so soon; he had no objection to indulge gentlemen who may think so, by letting it lie over for some time. It is, as the gentleman first said, trying the principle. It might be recollected that this was one of the first objects that engaged the attention of the General Government. It was then put to its proper trial; it then underwent a very considerable discussion, and a very long and intelligent report was made on the subject from the Military department. After going sufficiently through it at that time, it was thought not practicable to decide upon it within our own walls, until we had laid the plan before the people, that the public opinion might be ascertained. Time enough had elapsed since then, and he thought they might determine, that it appeared against the measure; they thought the plan too laborious and expensive to be worth pursuing. The principle somewhat differs now from what it did at that time; it then not only contemplated a select and reserved corps, but a third corps was proposed. He supposed the subject was now brought up to see whether the House is now ready to determine upon the principle. Mr. B. said he was; he was ready to vote against it; but there may be some gentlemen not so well acquainted with it, who may wish time to consider; he wished to give them that opportunity. This plan, he thought not worth pursuing: whatever we do, we must go on some other. This is not the basis on which we can, with the least prospect of safety, build our military system. Mr. B. thought the old system, in use before the year 1789, might receive such improvement as to equal any yet proposed. The sooner we can decide on any efficient plan the better. He understood the mover meant the House only to determine upon the principle. However, he should vote for striking out the first section for the reasons given.

Mr. RUTHERFORD.—The gentleman who just sat down has so much narrowed the ground that he meant to have gone over, that he could not say much more on the subject than had been. He believed the Government of the United States had nothing to do with the Militia in the several sovereign States; this was his opinion, and it was the opinion of the people at large; however of nine-tenths of them. The Constitution is express upon this subject; it says, when the Militia is called into actual service, it shall be under the direction of the General Government; but until that takes place, the several States shall have command over their own children—their own families. If the United States take it up, they will defeat the end in view—they grasp too much. When a State has the idea that it is competent to its own business, it does not like the Union to interfere with its concerns. When the farmer begins to obtrude his direction upon his son, just commencing for himself, all spirit is lost with the son, and perhaps he never acts in the same forward manner afterwards. So it is with the Union and her children the States. If they are deprived of the spirit which they have cherished on this occasion, all is at an end, their spirit of valor is dashed: for the Government to enact Militia laws, is against the express decision of the Union. With respect to its unconstitutionality, Mr. R. concurred in opinion with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HENDERSON] that this law would tend to alienate the minds of the people of the Eastern States whose Militia were already well-disciplined. Mr. R. could say, that as far as relates to the State he represents, they have done what he thought right; they have entered into military array; they wanted no new regulations in the Militia laws. The law proposed, he thought, would cross-cut all the exertions of the individual States. So soon as the United States come to obtrude their laws into the Eastern States where they have brought the Militia into a very respectable situation, he feared it would blast their further endeavors. He hoped nothing more would be done in that House than to advise those States who had neglected their Militia to revise and amend their laws, and make them more effectual: this is all this House can do—all they have a right to do.

Mr. SITGREAVES hoped the business would not be delayed; in which he differed with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BALDWIN.] He thought there would inconvenience arise from postponing it. He said, it was proper that haste in this decision should be attended to; that the States might know how to proceed; they waited to know what Congress did on the subject, to direct them what to do themselves; their different Legislatures would then act accordingly. He knew this to be the case with the State of Pennsylvania. Mr. S. was not tenacious of his own opinion upon the principle of the bill; but he wished a hasty decision; it having undergone much discussion, he should not beat over the old ground.

Mr. HARPER was far from being of opinion that the bill should be disregarded; after so much pains had been taken, he did not think it lightly to be dispensed with. It ought to be recollected that this bill has been the result of the deliberation of two committees of two different sessions, which consisted of men of good talents, and well versed in military concerns, who had seen the defects of the present system. He thought, therefore, that when a system had been brought forward with so much care, and from such authority, it ought not to be turned out of the House with so little ceremony. He wished to know what gentlemen would give in the stead of this bill. He would observe that, to make objections was very easy: it was very easy for a gentleman to get up and say he did not like the bill, but he ought also to show us the remedy; he ought to present us with a system more excellent, else his opposition is of no force. Did gentlemen pretend to say the present system is good? it could not be presumed; we had the evidence of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, who has in three several communications made to this House, told us, it wanted Legislative attention. He called for the evidence of every military man in this House, and in the United States to prove the truth; let gentlemen tell us where is the man that complains of the principle of this system, that will improve it; where is the man that will give us something better? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BALDWIN] says the system has been published, and the public voice is against it: he could not conceive how far this could be the case. Mr. H. said he had not met with such opposition to this measure, although he had traveled pretty extensively almost from one end of the United States to the other, and had taken much pains to inquire the views of the people on this point; and as far as he had opportunity to hear, the present system was admitted as bad; and that something like the system now offered would be far more acceptable and useful; not that it might be as necessary in some parts as others. He could not see, as had been suggested, that the morals of the people would sustain any great injury; the Militia could be sent out in small parties to learn discipline. He thought that, without suffering any peculiar inconvenience in some of the States, they might give to the nation in general a system of great national advantage. Their labor would not be entirely lost, for an afternoon could then be devoted to business, and not prevent the learning of military discipline. When you go fifteen or twenty miles to assemble some parts of the company, how can they collect in a day? Longer time must be devoted, or great imperfection will be the result: it is necessary that, where people live so distant, a week or two be allowed, for which reason it will be inferred, that this part of the existing system will be altogether impracticable.

The gentleman from Jersey [Mr. HENDERSON] has said, that this plan would throw an unequal burden on some descriptions of citizens. Mr. H. thought the contrary; he thought the burden would fall equally on every description of people; every man in the course of his life would be obliged to perform his share in the service. That gentleman further says, that many will pay the fine, and thus be excused serving; but the bill contemplated no such exemption; no man ought to be excused but from utter inability; the plan of the bill meant, that all should, at some time of life, pass through this military discipline. The age fixed upon for the select corps was a time before men in general enter into business, and thus every one passing through this military discipline would diffuse such a habit as to be ready to defend their country whenever called to it. A man, because he was rich, should not be exempt; thus every citizen became a soldier, which was essentially necessary in a free Government. He hoped that, before gentlemen persisted in kicking this bill out of the House, in what he called an unceremonious kind of a manner, they would inform the Committee what they were to do, as it was certain the Militia in three-fourths of the Union wanted great regulations. In some parts he allowed they were on a very respectable footing. Charleston could produce two thousand regular, well-disciplined troops. But this was not the case in general to the Southward. And are we to let our Militia remain in its present situation, and throw our whole dependence on the Standing Army? If gentlemen will not tell us how to remedy the existing evil, why not put this principle before us into effect? [Mr. H. here again enforced his argument from the report of the committee, and the PRESIDENT's recommending it.] As to the expense, it was quite overbalanced by the great advantages that would be derived towards the support of our freedom. What efficient system could be devised without a great expense to the nation? Gentlemen's calculations run very high when they represent the expense of this select corps.

It has been said, that if this bill were to pass, it would derange all the present military exertions. It would not; this select corps would draw out of that: it would not prevent the citizens forming themselves into military corps as they may think fit. They were told that these volunteer corps have equipped themselves at a very great expense, this he knew; but he rather thought that all who composed the safeguard of our nation, should be equipped at the national expense; at present, the defence of the nation fell upon a few who were more rich, or more patriotic than others. He hoped the motion to strike out would not pass.

Mr. W. LYMAN said, that the gentleman who condemned the present system in toto, allowed that it was effectual in some parts of the Union: then it could not be so extremely deficient. Mr. L. allowed that the Militia in some parts were defective; but in other parts they are in a very respectable force. He believed the present plan might be improved; but an attempt to put in practice this plan of a select corps, where a country lies so thinly inhabited, would be impracticable, and almost impossible. With respect to the present system, the gentleman last up has made some very unfounded objections, to say that it is generally disapproved. The most objectionable part of the present system to him was, in its tending to distinguish those citizens who could not pay, while it excused those who could. If this could be removed, he thought a great improvement would be introduced. The present Militia, he thought, would be very ready to defend the country whenever occasion should offer, either from foreign or domestic assault.

If the principle of a select corps was introduced into the country, he thought disaffection would be introduced with it, which would be found to war against the interest of the country. As soon as you carry this select corps into operation, you have no other corps to depend upon; the other is lost. And can it be supposed it will be acceptable to those who have been volunteers in the service in a fine genteel corps? Will they condescend to be brought into this poor, compulsive situation, in common with others who never have acted in the service? They will revolt at the idea. He differed with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] as he believed the people would be generally dissatisfied with the bill. He should, therefore, vote for the motion for striking out, and before the bill went into the hands of a select committee, should observe respecting another principle in the bill on exemption, which he should waive until they came to it.

Mr. HARTLEY wished a little time might be given for the consideration of this subject, as there were several new members here who had not been present at former discussions of the subject. If they now agreed to strike out the first section, it would end the proposed plan. This was not an entire new plan. He believed, that in Switzerland, there was a corps of a similar kind, who were always called out before others; such a thing had been under contemplation in Pennsylvania. He granted it must be attended to, but hoped it would not be thought in that House that every man must bear arms; there were many conscientious people who would not on any account bear arms. This subject had been under consideration of a committee; he, at that time, furnished them with the Swiss code: they were armed and disciplined after this manner before this Government was formed. This select corps was to be armed at the expense of the United States. This appears the most considerable objection. It is contemplated to include all from 20 to 25 years of age; this could not take any very considerable portion of the citizens from their labor. The system at present used in Pennsylvania is very defective, and though ever so much so, if he understood the gentleman last up, nothing was to be done upon this subject; but it was to rest where it is. He hoped the Committee would rise, to give many gentlemen, who had but little knowledge of the business, time to inquire and consider on the bill.

Mr. GILBERT said he hoped the Committee would rise, and urged the same reasons as the last gentleman; it not having been discussed during the present Congress.

The motion was then put for the Committee to rise, when there appeared—ayes 37, noes 31.

The Committee accordingly rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

PENAL LAWS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that there had been a committee appointed, last session, on the subject of improving the penal code; but, for want of some necessary information, no report had been made. That information being now arrived, and doubting not the House was still desirous of ameliorating that code, he should beg leave to lay the following resolution on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what alterations are necessary in the Penal Laws of the United States, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. BRADBURY, and Mr. ISAAC SMITH, were appointed a committee for that purpose.

THE MILITIA BILL.

Mr. HARPER wished to know if it would be in order to move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the Militia bill, in order to move that it be recommitted to a select committee, which he did to free it from some of the objections which had been made to it in the House. Being informed it was in order, he thereupon moved it. Impressed as he was with the importance of the principle, he could not neglect any means that may tend to forward so necessary a measure, and to get it done as well as possible.

Mr. W. SMITH said, it having been determined in the Committee of the Whole to defer it until to-morrow, it was not possible again to reconsider it this day. If it was to be again brought up at this time, he hoped the House would determine whether any, and what alterations should be made in the bill, else how should the select committee know what to do with it, not being acquainted with the will of the House? He hoped that the motion would not now be agreed to, but recommitted to-morrow to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARTLEY was sorry the motion had been made; he hoped the gentleman would agree to put it off until to-morrow, as there were some military men, who were not now in the House, who would be very useful in the discussion.

Mr. HARPER could not think but the select committee, from this day's discussion, would have sufficient ground to amend the bill agreeably to the ideas of the House; he said it had better be referred now, as when the House had altogether rejected it, it then would be too late: they can form an idea of the temper of the House on the subject. I hope it will be referred, and if the committee are not able to do anything with it, at least they can bring it back again in the same state they took it. He, therefore, must press the motion on the House.

Mr. W. LYMAN thought it not right in the gentleman to send it to a select committee for amendment at this time. If he wished to modify it, he could propose an amendment, the result would then be known; but if sent to a select committee, and their report is unfavorable, it would be all labor in vain; he therefore hoped the motion would be lost.

Mr. CRAIK said, the business was so new to him, and he supposed to many gentlemen besides, that he wished it to be referred according to the motion. He thought that one day was not enough to consider it in. When it was new modified by a committee, it might have a very different appearance, and give general satisfaction. He had not received any information on the general state of the Militia, and he wished to have some little time to collect a proper view on the subject; great advantages may be derived from recommending it. In many parts of the United States, the Militia was very much complained of; whether this be just or not, he could not say, but he should support the motion.

Mr. KITCHELL could not see what good was to be derived from what the gentleman had in view. The House never came to a decision, and if a select committee be now formed, what are they to do? very little is to be gathered from what has been said: we ought to consider the principle before we recommit it; on which account he should oppose the motion.

Mr. HEATH thought with the gentleman last up that it could answer no kind of purpose to discharge the committee for the purpose of recommitting the bill: by its being properly discussed in Committee of the Whole, gentlemen could receive information, and form the best possible opinion on the subject to guide their future operations. He hoped the motion would not obtain.

The motion was negatived without a division.

DEFALCATIONS OF REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. HEATH said, owing to the want of sufficient energy in the Revenue Laws of the United States, considerable sums of money had been lost by the revenue officers, as was seen by the reports from the Treasury Department. He thought a mode might be devised, that a more sovereign remedy might be applied to prevent similar defalcations in future. He should therefore move the following resolution, which he wished to lie on the table:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what alterations are necessary to enforce the payment of money due from the various revenue officers of the United States."

TUESDAY, December 20.

SAMUEL JORDAN CABELL, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

THE MINT.

A Letter was received from the Secretary of State, enclosing the annual report of the Director of the Mint. This report was very long, and proposed means of rendering the establishment less expensive and more productive; one of the principal of which was, that the depositors of bullion should not have the same advantages as heretofore, but be charged with deficiencies on account of the inferior quality of their bullion, and other expenses attending the coining of it. As a necessity for this regulation, the Director mentions an instance, in which out of 96,000 ounces of silver deposited, nearly 24,000 ounces were under standard, the coining of which cost Government £500, and yet the depositor received back the same weight in coin without expense. This report was referred to a select committee of three members and ordered to be printed.

ACT OF LIMITATION.

The order of the day being called for—

Mr. DEARBORN said, before the order of the day was called, he would wish to observe, that there were a number of claims called liquidated claims, which ought not to be affected by the act of limitation. He, therefore, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into, and report the expediency or in expediency of designating certain claims against the United States, to be excepted from the operation of the act of limitation.

Mr. W. SMITH said, there were objections to this last session. As business of this kind went through the Committee of Claims, he thought it would be more regular for this to do so, as that committee was already appointed; he should therefore move an amendment to strike out the words "a committee be appointed," and insert, "the Committee of Claims be instructed."

Mr. DEARBORN did not object. His end was answered if the business was put in any forwardness. The motion, as amended, was then put and carried.

MILITIA BILL.

The House then, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the Militia bill.

The question being to strike out the first section—

Mr. WILLIAMS said, a well-regulated Militia must be acknowledged as the best support in a free Republic; and as every man must be interested in carrying into effect such a system, it became us to pay every possible attention to this very important subject. He thought the present system very exceptionable; and the one proposed and now under consideration, appeared to him compulsive, arbitrary, and not agreeable to the spirit of a Republican Government. The annual encampments would be very expensive and injurious to morals and industry. The regiments thus composed would extend over a great surface, and would want that compact solidity which military corps should possess. In the bill, all (except those exempted) between twenty and twenty-five years of age, are to do duty. This was a period that the purest morals ought to be inculcated in youth, instead of which we might reasonably expect that a greater part of them would, in consequence of their being encamped, imbibe immoral principles, which would be exceedingly difficult to remove. Besides, this is a period when young men take upon themselves an active part in life, and begin the world for themselves.

As the clause now stood, the public must be at a very great expense; such as, in our present circumstances, we are unable to bear. To agree to the first clause, would be legislating in the dark; as it was impossible to know what number of citizens there were within that age, of course we cannot form an estimate of the expenses. If such a system were to take place, we ought to have been furnished with the number as nearly as circumstances would admit. But as a gentleman observed the other day, that, before gentlemen negatived the present mode, they would do well to propose a better. Mr. W. said, he was of opinion that a legionary system would not only be far preferable to the one under consideration, but be more agreeable to the minds of the people; fully as efficient, and would call for but little aid from the public.

A legion, he said, was the most efficient corps in every point of view. A select legion might easily be formed from every brigade of Militia, agreeably to a certain rule of apportionment, which should be fixed by law. Most brigades could form one troop of horse, one company of artillery, and a battalion of infantry. The regiments which compose this brigade of reserved

[H. OF R.]

Militia, should be divided into infantry, cavalry, and artillery classes. These classes should be determined by lot, or by the arrangement of the commandant of the brigade. Every regiment should furnish a certain proportion of infantry, matrosses, and cavalry. The classes should be obliged to furnish the men for these corps completely equipped with arms and accoutrements, with a military hat or cap, with a coattee, and a pair of overalls. The classes which furnished these legionary soldiers to be exempted from the present military regulations. They shall be denominated the Reserved Corps, and shall only meet on the regimental parade once in three years, to be inspected and to recruit the legion. The classes, in case of desertion or expulsion, should be obliged, by pecuniary penalties, to replace the man who deserts or is expelled. If the classes refuse to raise the men directed by law, or the by-orders of a superior officer, every individual of such class should be fined with severity.

The term of the legionary enlistment to be for — years. During their service in the legion they might be exempted from all works on the road; from all civil duties as jurors, and from personal tax. Every three years of service to be distinguished by some honorary badge, and that period of service to exempt the legionary soldier from all military duties, except when the country was in danger.

The legionary soldier, when his time expires, to receive a military diploma, expressive of his patriotism and attachment to law and order. The legionary cavalry and infantry to be inspected and exercised in squads, convenient to their residence, — times in the year, by the Legionary Adjutant, who should be liberally rewarded by Government for his military services. The artillery should be encamped — days, and should be exercised and inspected by some able artillery officer in each division. This service to consist in practical experiments, and Government should provide for this expense. This corps to be entitled to a superiority in point of pay and military honor.

The legions of each State to be inspected yearly by the Adjutant General of each State, whose rank and emoluments should be respectable. He should make yearly reports of the legionary corps, of the Legionary Adjutants, and of the defects of the law, to the Commander-in-Chief of the State, and to the Secretary of War. He should be responsible for the good appearance and discipline of the legion, and therefore every Legionary Adjutant should be recommended or appointed by him. The first day the artillery should be inspected; the second day, the cavalry; the third day, the infantry; and the fourth day the legion should be exercised in mock engagements. The officers and soldiers of the legion to receive compensation for loss of time.

In order to accomplish an uniformity in arms, Government might furnish them and charge them to the classes at first cost. He believed most of the States could furnish the legion with arms.

The legion should bear the name of the county or brigade district, and should be officered in the first instance from the present officers of the Militia; the Brigadier General of the reserved corps should always command the legion, and superior encouragement should be given to the non-commissioned officers. The Brigadier General to be responsible for the raising of the legion, to apportion the requisition to each regiment, and the commandant of each regiment to apportion the regimental requisition to each company. Any neglect or disobedience of orders to be punished with severity.

The penalties of non-attendance and other offences would deserve consideration. He believed no system would be efficient, if the fines were not given to the officers commanding the companies, for their use and equipment; and no system will be so just as to determine every species of guilt by a court martial.

The court members should receive the same pay as if on any other duty.

When the legion was collected, to be subject to the articles of war, except as to corporeal punishment. It would be best to arrange a system for the legion from the annual reports of the Adjutant General to the Secretary of War, who should report annually the defects of the law.

Mr. W. said, it appeared to him that there was a certain proportion of our citizens better calculated and more disposed for military duty than others. The principle here laid down would give them an opportunity to distinguish themselves according to their genius; but in the clause in the bill before them, all were to be considered as forming the Militia, let their genius or abilities be ever so much at variance with the service. Of what use would it be, said Mr. W., to discipline men who disliked the service? In his opinion, it was only a loss of time.

Mr. W. concluded by saying, that he had thrown these ideas together, and submitted them to the consideration of the House. They appear to him to obviate many objections which had been urged against the bill before them, and to remedy existing evils. The House would perhaps think differently; if so, they would of course reject them. He should, at all events, vote for striking out the first section of the bill before them.

The question was then put for striking out the first clause, and forty-nine rising in the affirmative, it was carried.

Mr. W. SMITH then moved for the Committee to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; he hoped it would be refused, in order that the bill might be recommitted to a select committee.

Mr. W. LYMAN hoped, before the Committee rose, what related to explanations might be tried. It appeared to him they should decide whether the people called Quakers, and others who conscientiously refuse to serve in the Militia, should be indulged. He hoped the principle would be tried.

Mr. HARTLEY agreed in the same desire with the gentleman last up.

Mr. DEARBORN agreed in a desire with his colleague [Mr. W. LYMAN] that the principle of the bill might be tried, but he did not think it should now be done. The general principle of exemptions goes a great way, and he thought there should be a curtail of the present laws of exemption; he thought but few gentlemen would differ on that head. But it may as well be discussed when the report of the select committee was made. A general complaint of the present system was, that the burden fell on a few individuals. He was not tenacious of his opinion, but he would rather have it re-committed before much was said about it.

Mr. KITCHELL said, if the whole body of the people were formed, exemption might be allowed; but if not, he should form a contrary idea. However, he thought it would be time enough to talk about it when the committee reported. He hoped the Committee would rise, and that it be referred to a select committee. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged till it be re-committed to a select committee.

The Committee rose and reported progress, but on asking leave to sit again, the House divided—ayes 34, noes 35. Leave was accordingly refused.

Mr. W. SMITH then moved that the bill be re-committed to a select committee; which was carried. Sixteen, nine, and five, were proposed for that committee. The question was taken on the greatest number, and lost. Nine was then carried, and Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. SHERBURNE, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. PATTON, Mr. CABELL, Mr. LOCKE, and Mr. GREENUP, were appointed to that committee.

BALANCES DUE FROM STATES.

Mr. CORR wished to call the attention of the House to a subject which he thought of some importance—it was the balances due from certain States to the United States. Three years, he said, had elapsed since the report was made by the Commissioners on that subject. He did not know what order was proper to be taken, but something ought to be done; he thought the first step would be to ask the debtor States for payment. He would therefore submit the following resolution, to lie on the table till to-morrow:

“Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to report whether any, and what, further measures ought to be taken relative to the balances which, by the report of the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States were found due from certain States to the United States.”

PROTECTION OF SEAMEN.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that by some inadvertency, two clauses had been omitted in the bill for the protection and relief of American seamen. They were the clauses respecting certificates, on which the two Houses had differed in opinion. What has hitherto been done to supply the want of them has been by the PRESIDENT, and yet a great number of our citizens have been impressed. With a view of removing this difficulty, and again bringing the subject before the House, he moved the following resolution:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the act for the relief and protection of American seamen, and to report what amendments are necessary to be made thereto.”

Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. SWANWICK, and Mr. GROVE, were appointed the committee.

BOUNTIES TO OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Mr. BLOUNT said, that Congress passed a resolution in 1776, granting certain bounties and grants of lands to the representatives of officers and soldiers who were slain in battle, which he thought equally applied to those who died in the service. He said, both cases had formerly been considered as included, but latterly the Secretary of War had made a distinction. He should propose a resolution to the House, in order to have a declaration of their sense upon it. The resolution was to the following effect:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into and report their opinion on the equity and expediency of extending to the representatives of the officers and soldiers who died in the service the advantages allowed by the resolution of Congress, September 16th, 1776, to the representatives of those officers and soldiers slain by the enemy.”

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

Mr. HEATH called up the resolution he yesterday laid on the table, respecting obtaining moneys from revenue officers. After some conversation on the subject between Mr. D. FOSTER, Mr. HEATH, and Mr. CORR, as to its commitment, it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BLOUNT called up the resolution he yesterday laid on the table, on the grants to the survivors of soldiers who died in the service. On division, there appeared, ayes 37, noes 18.

A committee was appointed for that purpose of Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. CORR, and Mr. HATHORN.

Mr. PATTON moved that the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures made last session, respecting the kidnapping of negroes and mulattoes from different States, contrary to the laws of the said States, should be committed to a Committee of the Whole House. Agreed to, and made the order for Monday.

BALANCES DUE FROM STATES.

Mr. CORR moved the House to take up the resolution which he yesterday laid upon the table respecting the balances due from individual States to the United States. He observed, that those balances amounted, at the time of the settlement, to three and a half millions, and that, with the interest paid upon them, they were now four and a half, and it was therefore desirable that something should be done in the business.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, it was to be lamented that they could not come at the principle upon which the Commissioners had settled these balances. He thought, if this matter was duly examined, that those States which were made creditor States would not be found to be so. He thought the business of importance, and such as might not be hurried through the House. He did not expect the resolution would have been called up to-day, and therefore wished a few days might be allowed before it was decided upon.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the resolution went no farther than to inquire into the subject; he therefore thought more time was not necessary to it. If anything was meant to be done in it this session, it ought to be expedited. It must come under consideration some day, he said, and the sooner the better, both for the debtor States and the United States.

Mr. W. LYMAN wished it to go into a Committee of the Whole House, else how could it be executed? He wished to know what inquiry could be made. If gentlemen wished to inquire, no time more suitable than in Committee of the Whole. The principle upon which the accounts were settled was objected to. A select committee could do nothing with this. He wished never to refer to a select committee to have an opinion expressed. They can meet, they can inquire, they can report, but the use of it in this business would be nothing; he therefore hoped it would at once be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GILBERT said it had once been before the House. He thought no objection could now be made to its going into the hands of the Committee of the Whole. Various considerations may then be made on the subject. He trusted a due investigation would take place, and that the matter would be rightly adjusted.

The SPEAKER reminded the House the motion was to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COIT said, he had hoped this resolution was so framed as that no objection could have been made to it. Every one acknowledged something was necessary to be done. The most natural way, in his opinion, would be to make an application (which had not yet been made) to the debtor States for payment; but, since they had a committee specially appointed to adjust all money matters, notwithstanding what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN] to the contrary, he thought it best to direct the inquiry to be made by them.

Mr. BALDWIN said, it struck him yesterday that this was the most proper means to bring about this end that could be pursued. Some objections had been made to the principle. He said, the principle upon which the balance was struck was generally approved of. The whole of the settlement ought to be brought and sent to the several States from whom a balance is due. He took it for granted the Committee of Ways and Means would consider a proper method to propose for that purpose, and he thought very little difficulty would attend its settlement.

The resolution was agreed to.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought some progress may now be made in the business respecting Canadian refugees; he therefore called for the order of the day on that subject. The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole; Mr. MUHLBERG in the Chair.

A considerable number of papers having been read relative thereto, together with the last report of a select committee, which was against the petitioners.

Mr. GREENUP hoped the report would be agreed to. He was upon the committee who made it. He said, in their examinations, he could find no resolution under the old Government to allow these refugees the bounty lands prayed for, and therefore he thought they ought not to be allowed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON spoke in favor of the allowance, and called for the reading of a former report in their favor, which he hoped would be agreed to.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, upon inquiry of the Clerk, he found none of the reports upon this subject had been printed. He himself stood in the predicament of others who were unacquainted with the business. As it was a subject of complexity, he should therefore move that the Committee rise, in order to have the papers printed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said they had been printed last session; he hoped the House would not long delay this business, as the petitioners had been waiting many years. He did not mind its being deferred a few days.

The Committee rose and had leave to sit again, and the papers were ordered to be printed.

CASE OF JOHN SEARS.

Mr. CHRISTIE presented a petition from John Sears. He should assign his reasons for again troubling the House with this petition. It may be recollected it was referred last session to the Committee of Claims, who had reported favorably on it. The case was so plain that there was not a man in the House that doubted the justice of allowing it. The report was agreed to, and went up to the Senate, who had no time to inquire into the facts, and therefore they never acted on it. He was encouraged to hope the same facts would again influence this House to do justice to the petitioner.

Mr. MACON thought, admitting a second petition would introduce a bad precedent; but as this case was somewhat extraordinary, as it had passed the House, it might alter the case; but he wished, as it had gone to the Senate, it had originated there now, and a bill had been brought from thence; he felt unwilling to deviate from order.

After some conversation about order, the following resolution was moved and agreed to:

Resolved, That the memorial of John Sears, presented January 30th, 1795, be referred to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to report by bill or otherwise.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Commissioners of the Federal City, and that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech relative to a National University, reported a resolution to the following effect, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for Monday:

H. OF R.]

Balances due from States—Relief to Savannah.

* [DECEMBER, 1796.]

"Resolved, That it is at present expedient that authority should be given to enrol proper persons to receive in trust, pecuniary donations, in aid of the donations already given towards the establishment of a University within the District of Columbia."

REUBEN COLBORN.

Mr. DEARBORN called for the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Reuben Colborn, for compensation for building of batteaux, and for other service during the war; the report was against the petitioner.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject; when

Mr. DEARBORN said this claim had engaged the attention of the House last session, and that no doubt seemed to remain with the House on the propriety of disagreeing to the report, and allowing the claim, but whether the papers had been lodged at the proper office in Boston in due time—[Several letters and papers were read, to prove that the petitioner had done all in his power to get the account settled.] Mr. D. hoped, therefore, that this would be one of the peculiar cases against which the statute of limitation would not be permitted to operate.

After a few words from Mr. D. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of Claims, in which he acknowledged the justice of the claim, but that it was barred by the act of limitation—

Mr. COIT said, as some new facts had been mentioned, he wished the report to be recommitted.

The Committee accordingly rose, and the report was recommitted.

THURSDAY, December 22.

FRANCIS PRESTON, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

JOHN CLEVES SYMMES.

Mr. HENDERSON moved that the report of the Attorney General relative to a contract between the United States and John Cleves Symmes, be committed to a Committee of the Whole. It was made the order for Tuesday.

Mr. W. SMITH moved, that when the House adjourned it should adjourn till Monday.

Mr. COIT wished the gentleman to give his reasons why the House should not meet to-morrow, as usual.

Mr. W. SMITH said, his reason for making the motion was, that the different committees might have time to sit and prepare business to come before the House.

Mr. MACON was in favor of adjourning to Monday, as it would tend more to the despatch of business if the committees had time to prepare their reports, than the House meeting when there was no business to proceed with.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 26.

JOHN WILKES KITTERA, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat.

A bill was received from the Senate for adding $100 per annum, each, to the salary of two of their principal clerks; which bill was read the first time.

The committee to whom was referred the petition of John Sears, reported a bill for his relief. It was read a first and second time, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

A letter was received from the Secretary at War, enclosing a report on the petition of Hugh Lawson White, which was against the petitioner. It was read a second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for Wednesday.

BALANCES DUE BY STATES.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred to report whether any, and what measures ought to be taken relative to the balances found by the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States, to be due from certain States to the United States, reported a resolution to the following purport:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the United States be requested to give information to the several States which were by the Commissioners found indebted to the United States, of the sums in which they stand indebted, together with the interest due thereon to the present time, with a request that provision may be made for paying the same as soon as possible, which may be made in any of the six per cents., three per cents., or deferred stock of the United States, in the same manner as the United States had paid those States to whom they were reported to be indebted by the said Commissioners."

This resolution was read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

RELIEF TO SAVANNAH.

Mr. W. SMITH said he wished to lay a resolution on the table. It was well known that the city of Savannah, in Georgia, had suffered in the most alarming manner, by that greatest of all calamities, fire, so that four-fifths of the whole town was reduced to ashes. He was desirous that some relief should be afforded to the unhappy sufferers from the Treasury of the United States. He believed there was no precedent wherein similar relief had been granted: they had, indeed, afforded relief to sufferers from the West Indies. He did not mean that a large sum should be granted; but he thought such a sum might be given, as, in conjunction with the support which they might receive from other quarters, might relieve the distress which must be the consequence of such a calamity. The resolution was in the following words:

"Resolved, That the sum of ——— ought to be granted towards the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Savannah, in Georgia."

It was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

EXCISE ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. SMITH called up a report, made last session, to amend the excise laws on distilled spirits. The present mode of collecting that part of the revenue was very defective. The principle of this report was, to prohibit the distilling of spirits in all places except towns and villages; and that no stills should be licensed of less size than four hundred gallons.

Mr. HARTLEY objected to it, because it would tend to ruin the small stills; he therefore thought, as it must be considered of great consequence, that the House should not hurry the business.

It was then referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. HARPER moved the order of the day, for the House to go into a Committee on the establishment of a National University. The House accordingly formed itself into a Committee—Mr. COIT in the Chair.

When the report was read, Mr. MACON said there was the word "appropriation" in the report. He did not recollect any having been made for that purpose. He wished to know what was meant?

Mr. CRAIK said, authority was given from the PRESIDENT to appropriate about twenty acres of land for the erection of this building; this he supposed to be what was meant.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that some time or other the institution of a Seminary in this District may be of use, but at present, and in the manner contemplated in this report, it would not do. If carried into effect thus, it will some time need an appropriation. We are now, said Mr. N., going into the subject, but we know not to what lengths it may carry us; we do not know where it will end. He did not think the time had arrived to incorporate a company for building a National University. It would be taking money from those districts of country which can do for themselves, and would receive no benefit from this institution. It would be inconvenient and inconsistent for people living at a considerable distance to send their children to this University; besides, he thought, the further children are from home, by being less under the eye of their parents, the more their morals would be injured. If it be a National University, it must be for the use of the nation. It will then be necessary to open funds for the purpose of its support. It is recommended by the PRESIDENT, it is true; but this is no argument why we should precipitate the business: it is the last time he will have an opportunity to address this House, and it being an object he should like to see encouraged when it was practicable, he took that opportunity to express it. We are not now in a situation to forward its establishment. It may be done at some time, but Mr. N. thought it would be many years first. That district of country would be many years before it could encourage the hope of such a plan prospering. He thought gentlemen from other parts of the Union would not say they wanted it for their youth. He thought if the House once entered into the subject the responsibility would fall on it to keep up the institution.

Mr. HARPER said, it did not appear to him that the gentleman last up had attended sufficiently to this report, for he seemed to be much mistaken as to its principle. There was nothing in it that contemplated pledging the United States to find funds for its support; nor was it the object of the report to establish a National University. He agreed with the gentleman, that we were not arrived at a period for such an institution. But gentlemen would see that the object of the Commissioners was not to establish a National University or obtain money from the United States, but their direct object was, to be incorporated, so as to be enabled to receive such legacies and donations as may be presented to the institution, and hold it in trust for that purpose. The PRESIDENT had already given nineteen acres of land, and signified his intention to give fifty shares in the Potomac canal whenever there was proper authority to receive endowments. It appears that there is no authority at present. The memorial goes no further than to authorize them to receive such benefactions as may be made, and hold them in trust. How far, then, this went towards involving this House in its support, he should leave the good sense of gentlemen to judge. Mr. H. thought the amount of this memorial could not have any evil tendency, but it may have a good one; for which reason he hoped it would be agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN did not know anything, according to his present views, which could be injurious in the report. At present it seemed favorable to him. He had two principal ideas in his mind, which made it appear so; if neither of which was cleared up otherwise, he should vote for it. The first thing he should ask was, Is such a thing desirable? And then, Is there a Seminary so near the spot contemplated, as to make it hostile in this House to encourage this University? He believed there was none that this will injure, but that an establishment like this would be very agreeable in that District. If it was desirable, who could undertake it, who encourage it, like this House? They could not do it themselves. If, then, the step is a proper one, it can never be too soon to commence it, although it may be many years before it may be wanted. The objection may be, that it would be wrong to incorporate a Literary Society; but we have frequent instances of incorporation, and nothing can prove it improper, since no pecuniary aid is required, no grant of money is asked. If it was, I should, like the gentleman before me, [Mr. NICHOLAS] disapprove of it, but not now seeing reason to object, I shall vote for the report.

Mr. CRAIK.—After the caution the committee had observed in forming their report, to prevent objections, I am sorry they should be charged with things they do not in the least merit. If the report contemplated the raising a fund for the support of this institution from the United States, there might have been some ground for gentlemen's objections; but, as there is not the most distant view of such a thing, I am surprised to hear it objected to. I did not expect it from that gentleman, [Mr. NICHOLAS.] I did not expect to hear him say, that institutions of this kind were not wanted there; it might have come better from gentlemen residing in more distant parts of the United States.

If this subject was now before the House, sir, I should not be against proving, at this time, that it is the duty of the United States to establish an University, and that the sooner it was done the better. But, as this is not the case, as we are only asked to permit its encouragement, by allowing these people to receive benefactions, how can we refuse? Shall we shut the door against individual benevolence? There are appropriations already made to this institution. There is a fund now of fifty shares in the canal, which is now valuable and increasing in value daily. I think the situation for this purpose very good; and the probable increase of the city of Washington will induce many persons to benevolence for this purpose. I know of no situation more central, and believe there is no place of the kind in its neighborhood; and from an established knowledge it would be a very useful and desirable institution, shall vote for it.

Mr. W. LYMAN.—As far as I can understand, the land which is now to be appropriated for this University, is the property of the United States. Does not this look as though the United States are to patronize and support the establishment? If we take this step, I shall very much wonder if our next is not to be called upon to produce money. I do not expect much from the liberality of individuals; and can it be expected that people from the remote parts of the United States will send their children to this Seminary? Surely not; and consequently their money will be lost. It will be a natural source of discontent to them, to pay their money merely for others to obtain the advantage. It may be very good for people thereabout, but remote parts cannot derive the least advantage from the institution. We are going quite too fast into this business, without attending to probable consequence.

I think it would have been more proper, if these people had only wanted this power, for them to have applied to the State Legislature of Maryland; it would be more to their interest and duty to encourage a Seminary if one is wanted in that place. They have sufficient power vested in them to encourage all such laudable undertakings. For us to encourage this would be to do injury, instead of having a number of schools planted in various parts, they are now all to centre in one; and the people are to neglect all to support this one; as others would become very weak.

I flatter myself to have as liberal sentiments on such institutions as other gentlemen, but I do sincerely think small Academies are as useful as this institution for an University. The large institutions are generally out of the reach of people in general, and of the middling class in particular. These small Academies have produced many eminent literary characters in the country. If it should be necessary at any time to form a Seminary for the use of that District, Congress would not refuse its encouragement: but to draw money for a National University I hope they never will agree. But gentlemen say this is not asked; true it is not at this time, but there is that in the principle that will most certainly lead to it.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, if it should ever be the policy of the United States to establish a National University, he was of opinion this was an improper time for making the decision. He did not believe the committee who made the report meant to do more than had been stated; but the effect, he said, would be what he predicted; this measure would be looked upon as an entering wedge, and they should hereafter be told they must go through with it. If gentlemen were prepared to sanction an institution of this kind, they would of course do it; he was not prepared to vote for the measure, but should give it his negative.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he had not been convinced by the observations of gentlemen who had spoken in favor of this report that all the mischiefs would not follow this measure which he before predicted. He inquired into the purpose of establishing a National University. The PRESIDENT had said (and the Commissioners after him) it was to establish an uniformity of principles and manners throughout the Union. This, he believed, could not be effected by any institution. If, said he, you incorporate men to build an University, are you not pledging yourselves to make up any deficiency? and, as the building must be commensurate with the object, they would have an enormous empty house continually calling upon them for contributions to its support. Whatever moderation had been observed in framing this report, Mr. N. said it was like many others which came before them: it was so covered as not to show half the mischiefs which would attend it. If a plan of education was wanted for that District, let members from that part of the country say so, and he would be ready to afford them every necessary assistance; but he would not think of going into the scheme of a National University.

The district of country from whence he came might stand in great need of Seminaries of Learning, as had been hinted by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CRAIK,] but their ignorance must continue until they were sensible of their want of instruction. He believed there was no Federal quality in knowledge, and no Federal aid was necessary to the spreading of it. Every district of country was competent to provide for the education of its own citizens, and he should not give his countenance to the national plan proposed because the expense would be enormous, and because he did not think it would be attended with any good effect, but with much evil.

If an University is wanted for the use of that District, or any other part, Mr. N. said he would give it all the encouragement possible, but he could not agree to go to such great lengths—lengths which were not yet explored.

Mr. R. SPRIGG considered the report before them as of a very harmless nature. The PRESIDENT, he said, had appropriated land upon which to erect the University in question. They were not called upon to sanction that appropriation. His power to give it was full and ample. The thing was done, and he had promised a future donation. The apprehensions of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] seemed to arise from his conceiving they were about to sanction a National University, such as had been recommended by the PRESIDENT. If this were the case, although the Representative of that District, he should not give his vote in support of the measure. On the contrary, he said, they were called upon merely to authorize proper persons to receive donations for an University. What sort of institution this should be, would be for the future consideration of Congress. Mr. S. said he should always be ready to give his support to every measure which had a tendency to spread knowledge throughout the United States, as he believed the progress of knowledge and liberty would accompany each other. The gentleman from Virginia seemed to think this institution would only benefit a small circle. He did not think the State of Maryland would be much benefited by it, as they had already two good universities; but he thought it doing no more than justice to the owners of property in the Federal City that this institution should be encouraged. What was asked of them would not commit them at all for anything further, and it would be a mean of turning the attention of the people to the support of an institution of this kind. For these reasons, he hoped the House would agree to the report.

DECEMBER, 1796.]

National University.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he had thought, like the gentleman last up, that there was nothing in it but what was perfectly harmless, until recurring to the law for establishing the permanent Seat of Government, that something more might be intended than the eye could at first discover. Mr. L. said he turned the thing a variety of ways in his mind, and could not account for some of its obscurities. If nothing was intended but a mere incorporation, why not apply to the State that could incorporate such a body? Something further seemed to be intended: public patronage was wanted to support this institution. They were called upon, at a moment's notice, to give their encouragement to this National Institution. It is true, they were called upon from very respectable authority. They were not called upon to appropriate the public funds to this purpose; but how far the Commissioners are justifiable in laying out public lands for that purpose, he knew not. He had not the law itself at hand, but he was doubtful about the just disposal of it, if in this manner. This land was for public use. The use of this land was to erect buildings on for the benefit of Congress; and if these Commissioners had power to appropriate it for building a National University on, they had the same power to give it or make use of it for any other purpose. Such institutions are not public, but private concerns.

This, said Mr. L., I view as the effects of the resolution, was it to be adopted; but I would not be thought as in the least reflecting on the motives of the gentleman who brought it forward. I believe it will operate (as a gentleman has justly said) as an "entering-wedge;" and at some future time we shall be told, we must go on—now we have encouraged its institution, we must support it. We shall hear more about it at a future day. Gentlemen tell you, sir, that nothing is intended, but merely to permit its institution. Why cannot they obtain this power which is asked of us of the State where it is wanted? The laws there will permit it, and, most likely, it could be obtained. If this report is agreed to, the time will arrive when this institution will pretend to a just claim on this House for its support; and the reasons they will then urge will have a force which will not be easily repelled.

Mr. MADISON said he was very far from considering, with some gentlemen, that this is a question of right or policy. These ideas are not comprehended in the present question. It is not whether Congress ought to interpose in behalf of this institution or not; it is whether Congress will encourage an establishment which is to be supported entirely independent of them. He did not consider it would ask a single farthing from us, nor that it would pledge Congress to endow the establishment with any support. The State of Virginia thought proper, during the war, to present the PRESIDENT with fifty shares in the Potomac canal, in consideration of his services, which he refused accepting for his own use. He has now offered to give it to this Seminary. Some other individuals have likewise destined part of their land for its support, and other benefactions may be expected. The amount of this motion before the Committee is, whether we will grant power and security to persons to receive such donations in trust for the institution? He conceived it only in this simple point of view, and he thought if it was worthy of patronage, it ought to be from the United States.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LIVINGSTON] seems to say it is not necessary for Congress to interpose, as the laws of Maryland allow that Legislature power to do it, and they are the most proper. Congress has the sole jurisdiction over that District: it is not with the power of that Legislature. Their power in that District could only operate by virtue of a grant from the United States; although it is necessary, until that District becomes the permanent Seat of Government, the laws of Maryland should be in force there. This being the situation, the Commissioners applied to Congress to give them the power to receive benefactions.

Another thing which gentlemen had objected to, is its being called a National University. The report does not call it so; it calls it "An University in the District of Columbia;" which, he thought, was materially different. Congress may form regulations for institutions which may be very good, and yet, not be viewed as national institutions. It was in this qualified light (for he wished not to consider it a burden on the nation) he meant to vote for the report.

Mr. SPRIGG said it had been inquired why the Legislature of Maryland could not have granted the Commissioners what they now pray for? He answered that they could make no law for that District which should extend beyond the time at which the Seat of Government was to be removed there. He mentioned some instances that had taken place while he was a member of that Legislature. This, he said, accounted for the application of the Commissioners to Congress.

On motion, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

CAPTAIN DAVID HARRIS.

Mr. CHRISTIE said that he wished to know from the War Office whether any, and what number of, officers of the late Continental Army were in the same situation with Captain David Harris. He read a resolution for getting a statement of this nature from the Accountant of the War Office.

Mr. FOSTER wished rather that the gentleman would call at the War Office, where he would get the information which he wanted, if it was to be had.

Mr. CHRISTIE said that formerly, when a member of the Committee of Claims, he had attempted to be satisfied on this point, and did not succeed.

A motion was here made to adjourn—yeas 32, nays 33. Not carried.

Mr. CHRISTIE then moved his resolution.

Mr. MACON was against going back into these old accounts.

Mr. KITCHELL thought that it would interfere with the statute of limitation.

Mr. CHRISTIE said that the gentleman from New Jersey perfectly misunderstood the case. It had no concern with the statute of limitation. If it had gone to that extent, Mr. C. would have been as cautious as any man. The matter was this: Captain Harris had eighteen months' pay due to him as an officer in the late Continental Army. The claim was allowed, but because he had been late in calling for his money, the officers of the Treasury would give him only sixteen dollars. Any man in private life acting thus to his creditor would be looked upon as a rascal. Mr. C. believed that every gentleman in the House would agree with him in thinking such payment too small. He doubted much if one single officer was in the same situation with Captain Harris. He wished for information immediately, because the case of Captain Harris was made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The resolution was negatived.

Mr. PARKER laid a resolution, to the following effect, upon the table:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House, what measures have been taken for carrying into effect the Treaty between the United States and the Dey and Regency of Algiers, and also whether any, and what, further Legislative aid may be necessary for that purpose."

TUESDAY, December 27.

DEMPSY BURGESS from North Carolina, appeared and took his seat.

The bill was read a second time for granting additional allowance to the clerks in the offices of the Secretary of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Compensations.

A memorial of Joseph Ball and others was presented by Mr. LIVINGSTON; the petitioners are holders of bills of credit, emitted in pursuance of a resolution of Congress in 1780. They pray that such provision may be made for the payment of the amount of principal and interest on those bills, as the nature of the public engagement and justice may suggest.

A memorial of John Cleves Symmes was presented by Mr. KITCHELL, praying a fulfilment, on the part of the Government, of a contract entered into with him, for certain lands in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio. Referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed the report of the Attorney General on that subject.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

The order of the day was called for on the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Commissioners of the Federal City, and that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech, which referred to the establishment of a National University. The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on that subject, when the resolution, reported by the select committee, having been read, no gentleman rising on the subject, the Chairman inquired if the committee were ready for the question, and on being answered in the affirmative, the question was put and negatived by a great majority.

The Committee rose and the Chairman reported their disagreement with the select committee.

The House then took up the subject.

Mr. MURRAY rose, expressing his great surprise at the unexpected decision on the question in the Committee. He was very much surprised to see the Committee so changed, no opposition, and yet the report so quickly negatived; surely gentlemen must have mistaken the question. It is matter of regret such an important subject should have so little consideration. The language of the report is perfectly moderate and just. The gentleman from Virginia, yesterday, gave us to understand that this institution was to draw its support from the National Treasury; but on examining the report I can find no such idea held out or intended; and also he told us this was a National University. The gentleman's observations are grounded in mistake, or it was effected by an imagination of evils, of which there could not be the most distant apprehension. If we refer to the memorial of the Commissioners we shall see they ask no money from Congress; they only ask you to erect a number of gentlemen into a corporate capacity to enable them to receive donations from those who are well disposed towards instituting an useful Seminary in that District; this is no more than they have a right to expect from Congress, and is the duty of Congress to grant. Yet the determination of the Committee of the Whole House has been carried against this very desirable and reasonable request. I would again repeat that the language of the memorial is only to enable them to support a Seminary of Learning in that place,

National University.

and not a single shilling is asked from the nation. They only want a medium to act upon—an act of incorporation.

My colleague [Mr. CRAIK] has shown that it cannot be done by the Legislature of Maryland; that Legislature has restrained itself from any act respecting the District of Columbia that will extend beyond the year 1800, when it will become the Seat of the Government of the United States. Congress alone have the power to erect a corporate capacity in that place, and if they now withhold, they will smother in the bud the efforts of individuals who would wish to be generous towards the support of learning in this new city. On the contrary, how ungenerous will it appear in this House to prevent this valuable design! How peculiarly humiliating will it appear in the view of foreign nations, and how undignified with the character of liberal and enlightened in this! If Congress had passed an act agreeable to the report of the committee, where would have been the evil? The PRESIDENT has generously signified his intention to make a valuable benefaction, not less than £5000 sterling, and the wise and good in all parts of the United States would probably follow his example, particularly in that neighborhood, if Congress would put them in a way to receive it; a building would then be begun and some advances made towards the execution of the institution, in proportion to the fund. Instead of allowing this to be the case, every possible view has been given unfavorable to the plan, and every possible supposition formed, though without grounds, which could tend to blast it. The ideas of gentlemen have been inferred that a large empty house would arise;—that it would draw from the United States funds for its support. It may be possible, but it is no way probable. Is it not more probable that these gentlemen, knowing they cannot expect national support, will keep themselves within the bounds of their funds, if they mean to carry on the institution? Certainly this seems most consistent with the wisdom and prudence of men in that capacity. Nothing is asked of the public in the report of the select committee:—nothing they have a right to ask; I therefore hope, as the request is perfectly reasonable, gentlemen will not be too hasty to oppose such a measure without due consideration. I therefore wish the further consideration of the business may be delayed; I could scarcely believe such a decision would have taken place in the Committee, and must believe, for the honor of the nation, that when gentlemen take time to reflect, they will not act so illiberal a part as to refuse so reasonable and harmless a request, when these people only ask the power to receive the voluntary support of individual benevolence.

Mr. MADISON said, the word “pecuniary” in the report of the committee did not correspond with his wishes; he wished the expression of the report might extend to all sorts of donations; if in order, he should move to strike it out. [The SPEAKER informed the member it was not in order to move an amendment after the Committee of the Whole had reported their disagreement. If the House choose to concur with the Committee of the Whole, that report cannot be amended;—if they disagree, it may then be proposed, and recommended for the amendment.]

Mr. CRAIK.—I must confess, I feel as much surprised as my colleague on the decision which has just been given in the Committee of the Whole. Some gentlemen who opposed the report yesterday conceived there was some secret poison lurking within it—some dangerous principle not to be discovered on its face, which would some time produce baneful influences—this has been insinuated though not directly said. If so it must come there by accident, or of itself, which those gentlemen must allow if they will give themselves the trouble to examine the true principle of it, and give it a just decision. When we examine the materials of which this report has been formed, viz: the PRESIDENT’s communication on this subject in his Speech, and the memorial of the Commissioners;—we should be led by those gentlemen to believe, that this, which is the ground-work of the report, is connected to convey something which may extend further than it seems to carry its object; this perhaps is the secret poison hinted at. Were I in the situation of the PRESIDENT, I am free to confess, had I studied my own feelings and the great use of the institution, I should have recommended it. It has been justly said, that the PRESIDENT, from the impulsive importance of it, has taken this opportunity—this last opportunity to recommend it. He has recommended it with earnestness; which gives an additional proof of his sincere regard for the welfare of his country. I hope this will not be conceived in favor of the idea suggested. The Commissioners seemed to have anticipated the objections which have been made to a National University, and have purposely avoided inserting it in their memorial. They have cherished similar ideas which I have, of the eligibility of such an institution, but foreseeing that plan would not be approved they have relinquished that, and only requested incorporation to enable them to act in trust for the institution. They do not call upon this House to put their hand into the Public Treasury; they seem to have possessed somewhat of the prophetic, to see the necessity of forming their memorial so little objectionable; and yet there is supposed to be danger in this simple request. If, then, there is nothing in this report to be collected from the PRESIDENT’s Speech, nor from the memorial of the Commissioners to favor this idea, what then is there? Gentlemen who own property in that District have come forward, and, to their own disadvantage, offered ground to the support of it: why then, can it be supposed that some lurking evil awaits within? Although some observations have been made to show that the State Legislature had power to grant this authority, yet it is plain, as has already been proved, they have no such power. It has been said by some, that if they were satisfied the State had not that power, they would vote for the House to agree to the report. I do not see reason to go into the question how far the Legislature has a right to grant it, nor to inquire how far the laws of the several States should operate on us; these are questions which are not at all involved. That district of country will not be at all under the power of the Legislature of Maryland after the year 1800, and were they to grant this charter, it would not be wise, just, nor equitable. They have determined in no instance to grant any charter or incorporate any society in that District, if it will interfere with the time at which it comes into the hands of the United States. It would be wrong in them to extend by any instrument their pretended authority beyond that time. And can the United States refuse its guardianship to an institution which is refused patronage from elsewhere on such an account as that stated? Surely not. This, then, I think must go completely to satisfy those gentlemen who have doubts that this House could not do that which the several States have power and authority to do.

It is clearly proveable from other causes that this State had no authority at all. Few objections have any validity now, that will not remain in force when the General Government removes there. Since, then, they would have had no difficulty to have obtained this of the State Legislature before the cession of this Territory to the United States, it will be an unfortunate change for them to be under the United States, peculiarly so, if refused this small request. It has a truly lamentable prospect.

Gentlemen have supposed a responsibility, a peculiar obligation to support it, would be attached to the United States, were they to give this privilege. As well as might it be said that Congress, by allowing a bridge to be built, or a road to be cut, would incur the expense, or if it could not otherwise be done for want of money in the applicants, would be engaged to do it for them at the national expense. If there are objections of force in one instance they will apply to the other. If this is denied it proves that District to be wretched outcasts, being denied a request the most reasonable, natural, and just that can be contemplated. Many of the objections urged, indeed most of them, against the admission of this report do not go so much to the exclusion of the measure, as to the danger of Legislative interference. Gentlemen say, if we move in it—if we put our hands at all to it, we pledge ourselves to effect it. If this is the situation with the people of Columbia, the year 1800 will be a woful year to them; this is an unhappy presage of the jurisdiction to be exercised on that country. If it is inexpedient for that District to have a Seminary of Learning, let gentlemen who could state it with truth, come forward and say so. If the objections of gentlemen are not grounded on the danger of this House pledging itself to support the institution nor on the inexpediency of such a thing in that District, I am at a loss, for my soul, to conceive on what ground their objections are formed. I was surprised yesterday to hear the opposition come from the quarter it did; and am equally surprised to find such an opposition now. In my view there is a very great want of Seminaries of Learning in that District.

If we take a view on the south side of the Potomac, for a considerable extent of country, there is no institution to answer any desirable purpose. There is the greatest probability of a rapid increase in the population. Is it not reasonable, then, that an institution of this kind should be established in that place? And if reasonable at all, are we to wait till the period arrives when the country is thickly inhabited before we commence a building and project the plan? I have long thought that in this young country such a thing was necessary. It should be now begun, to grow up with its growth and strengthen with its strength. We should now lay the corner-stone—the foundation to build upon. Though such a Seminary cannot be established now, it may fifty years hence; and it can never be too soon to commence a good institution. We are not called upon to travel into the fields of speculation for the purpose of finding funds to support this plan; there are funds which present themselves to view. We only want a grant to secure the benefactions in prospect. The President has employed a handsome benefaction for this purpose; and I much wonder that gentlemen from that part of the Union should oppose measures that would only encourage its reception. When I take a view of the extent of country which lies much in want of a Seminary, I feel surprised that such measures towards its growth should be denied.

If there are any gentlemen here who oppose the advancement and growth of that District which they have taken under their wing, they should come forward and declare it; we then should have ground to account for their conduct. If we are determined to deny these people common justice, we dispirit them. There is no circumstance which can occur that will tend so much to discourage the growth of that State; if we forbear to do them this justice, we exclude them looking up for those common rights which could be enjoyed in any other Territory of the United States. I hope this House will never deny to that people, rising into existence, this small privilege. Is it a strange thing, I would ask gentlemen, for a State to grant charters? I answer, no. And for this State to be denied this privilege only to secure a fund for such an excellent institution, I believe is quite a novel idea. I hope, if there are any doubts on this subject, they will lie over for future consideration; and I hope we shall be careful not to damp the attempts of that people by a conduct which could not be refused by any State in the Union; and that Congress should refuse it without assigning a sufficient reason, is unprecedented. I hope it will lie over for future consideration, and not be refused so quickly.

It was moved that the subject should lie over until the second Monday in January.

Mr. Corr was against a postponement. The subject, he said, had undergone considerable discussion, and he doubted not the House was as ripe for a decision then as they would be hereafter. To postpone was to protract the despatch of business, and consumed double and treble the time that would otherwise be occupied on any subject.

Mr. HARPER hoped the postponement would take place, because it would give gentleman an opportunity of putting the subject into such a form as to be more acceptable to the House, since the principal objection made to the report was founded on an apprehension that the House would be implicated in future expense, by agreeing to it. If some method of introducing the subject could be hit upon, which could obviate that objection, it was desirable it should be done. He therefore wished gentlemen to have time to do this.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he did not rise to advance any thing new on the subject, but to remove something said by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CRAIK.] He would not wish to be understood to say, that we, by refusing this, promise to support the institution, but that it would naturally be expected that we, having given sanction to it, dignity of Government, consistency of conduct, and many other considerations, will oblige us to support it. Any modification now made will avail nothing. By this act you invite donations to the object. If the matter is entered upon at all, it will end as has been supposed—in pecuniary support.

I beg leave to deny any intention of disregarding the wishes or wants of the people of that District. I think that disregard is not felt by any person here; and if such an opinion has gone forth, that gentleman must attribute it to himself. When up yesterday, I said, that if the people wanted any assistance towards erecting a seminary, I would render them all possible aid. But our officers, and they alone, are the projectors of this subject; it is not from the people that we are asked for this aid, it is from men who are sent there to manage business; but they are not the people.

Again: the PRESIDENT has recommended the measure. I would not be supposed to want a due respect either for those Commissioners or for the PRESIDENT; but, merely because recommended by them, we are not warrantable in adopting it. I never mentioned words tending to that idea, nor had any idea of refusing the request of that people, if coming from them; but this is not the case. I still contend that if this building goes on upon its present principle, it will be a National University. If you adopt the plan, if you begin the building, and it is left unfinished, it will remain a monument of reproach. I ask gentlemen, if they subscribed to the use of this institution, what would be their views? What the views of subscribers in general? Would they think of erecting a Seminary for a district of country ten miles square? Certainly not: it will be expected to be given to the use of the United States—to the support of a National University. It is deceiving the public to suppose or assert differently. I trust we shall negative the proposition of the committee; and when that people shall come forward to ask our aid to the establishment of a Seminary, then let us prove that it is not the request of the people we reject, although the views of a few individuals may not obtain encouragement.

Mr. BRENT said, he was at a loss to know how gentlemen could raise the objections which they had made to the report in question; he was sure they could not arise from the report itself: this did not recognise the University as a National University. The matter appeared to him to be simply this: that several individuals in the Federal city, who were greatly interested in its prosperity, were of opinion that an institution of this kind would not only advance the interests of the city, but be a mean of disseminating learning—they had therefore prayed an incorporation for the purpose. Why his colleague should call this a National University, and that, by a mere act of incorporation, they should pledge themselves to support it, was to him astonishing and incomprehensible. If any particular body of men should apply for an act of incorporation, by granting it should they pledge themselves to carry their scheme into effect? The thing was too unreasonable to be supposed.

Mr. B. said, if he was opinion that the incorporating of persons to receive donations for this University would oblige them to foster this establishment, he should be one of the first to object to it. He should object to it on Constitutional principles; because, whatever had been the practice of that House, he was of opinion that imposing a revenue for such a purpose would be unconstitutional, and arrogating a right which they did not possess.

Under the aspect which the subject before them bore, he trusted all objections to it would be withdrawn. A free Government, he said, had its foundations in wisdom; and the Legislature of such a Government ought to encourage every institution which tended to inform and enlighten the people: a contrary procedure was to stifle knowledge, and to introduce barbarism.

The SPEAKER reminded the House that the question of postponement was before them.

Mr. SWANWICK was against a postponement, because he thought the question could as well be decided then as at any future day. As the application now stood, he was ready to give it his negative, because he did not think it was proper to allow any charter to the Commissioners. If a charter was to be granted, it should be to the people themselves, and not to the Commissioners. He should therefore vote against agreeing to the report. He should have wished to have made some other observations on the subject, but in this stage of the matter he was doubtful whether they would be in order, and therefore he should withhold them.

Mr. GILES was in a favor of a postponement, not that he wanted time to consider the subject—he was ready to vote against it—but because the advocates of the measure wished it. He himself was opposed to all kinds of corporations; but he did not think the present subject had been fully discussed, and wished more time to be allowed for gentlemen to bring forward the question in any other way which they might think would be more acceptable to the House.

Mr. VENABLE said he was opposed to a postponement. It had been repeatedly said that there was nothing alarming or under cover in this report. For his part, he believed it to be connected with a National University, and that it was introduced in this shape because it was apprehended it would not pass if brought into the House without disguise.

Mr. V. wished the subject not to be postponed, because the Maryland Legislature was then sitting, and the Commissioners might apply to it, and get their business done; for, whatever might have been said to the contrary, he believed they could as well incorporate them, as foreigners to hold lands; a Navigation Company, Columbia Bank Company, &c; and if they could do this, he believed it would not be said, that when the Federal Government took possession of that District that corporation would not be valid. If a local Seminary was only intended, he thought this the best way of proceeding.

Mr. CRAIK believed that most of the acts which have granted charters to that District by the State of Maryland would expire before the year eighteen hundred; they consider that it is in the power of Congress, and it only, to extend beyond that term. Gentlemen, he said, had pretended much friendship for the people of the City of Washington, and differed much about the way to show it. The Commissioners are the proper organs of the people, through which to speak their will, and address themselves to this House; they act for the proprietors as well as for the public; and he knew no distinction that should prevent this report from approbation.

Mr. MURRAY said the arguments which had been used on the interference of the Legislature of Maryland could not now be decided, for which he thought it would be proper to postpone the matter. He believed they were not now in session, as they usually broke up about Christmas. Were gentlemen now to divide, they could not avail themselves of information from that Legislature, which would tend to throw light on the subject. He thought the nature of the subject such, that it would permit a delay of a few weeks, at which time most probably that Legislature would sit again.

The question for postponement was put and carried—ayes 37, noes 36.

RELIEF TO SAVANNAH.

Mr. W. SMITH moved to call up the resolution he yesterday laid on the table, respecting an allowance to the sufferers by the late fire at Savannah; when, on the sense of the House being taken whether it should then be considered or not, there appeared only sixteen votes in favor of it.

Mr. W. SMITH gave notice he should to-morrow again move to have it taken into consideration.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of John Sears; which was agreed to without amendment, taken up in the House, read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Sears" was read a third time, and passed.

RELIEF TO SAVANNAH.

Mr. W. SMITH wished the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution, which he had the other day laid upon the table, proposing to afford some relief to the sufferers by the late fire at Savannah. For his part, he said, he could see no reasonable objection which could be made to so benevolent a proposition. A gentleman in the House had got a plan of the ruins of the city; it was, indeed, a most distressful scene. There had never occurred so calamitous an event of the kind in the United States, or which had so strong a claim upon the General Government for relief. He said they had granted assistance to the sufferers by fire at St. Domingo; and surely if it were justifiable to grant relief to foreigners in distress, it was at least equally so when the objects were our own citizens. If gentlemen had objections to the measure, he wished they would state them. The sum with which he should think of filling up the blank would not be such as to materially affect our finances.

Mr. MILLEDGE said, if the unfortunate had any claim upon the Government for relief, none could have greater than the citizens of Savannah. Few houses, he said, were remaining of that city, and those few were the least valuable. Not a public building, not a place of public worship, or of public justice—all was a wide waste of ruin and desolation, such as scarcely could be conceived, and as it were impossible to describe. He hoped some relief would be afforded to distress so unexampled.

Mr. COOPER said, it was a very unpleasant thing to come forward to oppose a measure of this sort; but, when they looked into different parts of the Union, and saw the losses which had been sustained at New York, Charleston, &c., it would appear only reasonable that, if relief was afforded in one case, it ought to be extended to another; and, if this resolution were agreed to, he should certainly move to have some relief afforded to New York. He hoped, however, the business would not be proceeded with. If the principle were a good one, it would bear going through with; but it would be seen this would, on the contrary, prove a dangerous one. What they did to-day, he said, should bear repeating to-morrow. If they were to make good losses by fire, there would be no occasion for insurance companies, nor any inducement to build with brick in preference to wood. He felt as much as others for the distresses of the people of Savannah, but was of opinion it was not a proper business for the interference of that House.

Mr. W. SMITH agreed with the gentleman last up that this would be considered as a precedent; he agreed that they ought not to do that to-day which ought not to be done to-morrow. It might be brought forward as a principle upon which we should be bound to relieve New York or Charleston; but the question is, whether this is not a distinct case? This is a case awfully distinguishable from all others; and, if a caselike the present will not be often found, this House are certainly not bound to grant relief in others, though in this. He trusted such a case would not be again found to solicit relief. Charleston, he said, had experienced a great calamity by fire, but had not asked relief of that House; and it was probable if it had it would not have been granted, because its distresses are not so great. In a distressing situation like that now before us aid can be afforded by the many towards alleviating the distresses of the few. Hence arises the advantages from public contributions; and would that House, he asked, refuse their assistance? It would not be felt by the public purse. It has been said, to adopt this resolution would have a dangerous tendency, inasmuch as it would encourage a neglect of insurance. But the evil has come; the unfortunate circumstance has occurred; four-fifths of that unfortunate city has been destroyed, and their distress is great. Such a circumstance may not again happen for a century. The amazing value of £500,000 sterling damages is done; and shall we refuse to give a trifle to assist, with others, towards removing the present distressed situation of some of the unfortunate inhabitants? I trust not. It is not asked of this House to indemnify the loss of these sufferers. No, sir; it is only asked that the General Government should give the trifling sum of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to afford these people some relief.

We have heard of New York and Charleston; but in which of those cases is this calamity to be compared to Savannah? The distress of Savannah is more than twenty to one. It is like a grain of sand struck off from the mountain. I wish gentlemen to give themselves the trouble to draw the comparison.

The citizens of New York are rich. That is a flourishing town; it is rich enough to afford itself relief when applied to. Though a sad calamity, it will scarcely be felt—the flourishing state of its commerce will soon repair the damage. But Savannah wants means to alleviate its own distress. Not only the property is destroyed, but the means to obtain more. What are they to do? Where obtain its former opulence or enjoyment? They can look no where but to their neighbors and to the Government for assistance.

We are told of Charleston. But the calamity there is not more than in the proportion of ten to one with that of Savannah. In Charleston there was immediately $30,000 subscribed to alleviate the distresses of those people whose property was destroyed. But this cannot be the case in Savannah. Where is $30,000 to come from there? Who are to subscribe it? All the means are destroyed, and they have nothing left but suffering. The calamity there is infinitely greater, and the means infinitely smaller to repair it.

Then, sir, if this be the case, where is the harm to ask a benefaction from the public Treasury, when it would not be felt? Suppose we were to grant $30,000, what is it to the people of this country? Nothing at all; but it is sufficient to draw down on this House the blessings of that people.

This, therefore, cannot come under the same principle. It is an unprecedented calamity; and, if a similar circumstance should ever occur, which is improbable, I think they should obtain relief.

The question was then put for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, and lost—yeas 38, nays 39.

It was then moved that the Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. W. LYMAN hoped the business would not be disposed of without going into a Committee of the Whole. He thought more respect was due to the feelings of the sufferers than to dispose of the subject without discussion. He hoped the committee would not, therefore, be discharged.

Mr. HARTLEY trusted the committee would not be discharged. He believed the destruction of Lisbon by an earthquake did not occasion greater mischiefs than the late fire had done to Savannah. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, which had no greater power than the General Government to afford relief to these sufferers, had given $15,000. Indeed, he thought it more the province of the General Government than of State Governments to afford relief in such cases.

Shall we, said he, treat the citizens of Savannah with more disrespect than the people of St. Domingo? This House then gave $10,000 or more for the relief of those people, and shall we not now have liberty to discuss the subject, whether to give or not to our own citizens? Although, he said, he would not wish to draw a precedent from English transactions, yet he would observe that their generous benevolence to the unfortunate sufferers by the earthquake at Lisbon, though only commercially acquainted, was worth imitation, to whom they gave £100,000. Mr. H. was sorry gentlemen should endeavor to prevent this by bringing in the calamities in New York and Charleston. Those were only personal losses; this was a general conflagration, a catastrophe unprecedented; and he hoped, for the sake of humanity and national honor, this House would never withhold relief.

Mr. KITCHELL thought there would be propriety in determining at present whether it should be granted or not. There was application going about to the different State Legislatures for relief, and, if it was suffered to lie on the table in this House, he thought it would much injure the applicants, by leaving the different Legislatures in uncertainty what to do, and perhaps preventing their giving a donation towards this purpose. He said, he felt as much as any man for the deplorable state of this people, and, if it was consistent with the Constitution, would wish them to have relief. But, said he, let us now decide. If it is unconstitutional, I would not wish to grant it; and, if we are not now to grant relief, let the committee be discharged, to open the way for other benefactions.

Mr. SPRIGG hoped the committee would not be discharged, but that they would go into the business at an early day. He said, he had not made up his mind how far they had power to afford relief in a case like the present. There was an instance in the relief afforded to the daughters of the Count de Grasse, as well as that given to the sufferers at St. Domingo. He wished for further time to make inquiry on the subject. If there were not insuperable objections to the measure, he hoped relief would be afforded.

Mr. HARPER acknowledged that it was sound policy in Government to keep a strict eye over its Treasury; but this watchfulness ought not to go to the rejection of all claims, however just and proper. He thought the tenaciousness of approaching the Treasury was carried too far in the present instance. He would ask, what was the use of society if it were not to lessen the evils of such calamities as the present, by spreading them over the whole community, instead of suffering them to fall upon the heads of a few individuals? He thought it the duty of Government to alleviate such peculiar distress as the present. It was said this would prove a dangerous precedent, and prevent necessary provisions against fire. If they were about to make good the whole of the £500,000 destroyed, there might be some ground for the alarm; but when fifteen or twenty thousand dollars only were contemplated to be given, no great danger could surely be apprehended. The fires at New York, Baltimore, and Charleston, had been mentioned; but what were the means of Savannah when compared with New York? Not as one to twenty. New York was rich enough to bear her loss, but this could not be said of Savannah, all the inhabitants of which were reduced to poverty and distress. They could not, therefore, get relief from their fellow-citizens; and to whom could they look for protection and relief with so much propriety as to the General Government? When compared to Charleston, the loss of Savannah was of ten times the magnitude as that experienced by it. The loss of Charleston was alleviated by a subscription of $30,000 from its own citizens, besides the handsome contributions which were made in other parts of the Union; but there was no property left in Georgia to afford relief to the sufferers. Suppose, said Mr. H., we were to give thirty thousand dollars towards this loss, what would it be when divided among the whole Union? And yet it would be enough to draw down countless blessings upon us from these objects of distress. He hoped, therefore, the committee would not be discharged. It was a case of peculiar and almost unprecedented affliction, such as he hoped would not again occur; and a decision in their favor would be applauded by every man, woman, and child in the Union.

He believed it a case not merely supported by justice and right, but nearly attached to the finest and most noble feelings of the heart; he believed it would meet the feelings of every man of wisdom to afford relief. He hoped, therefore, that the merit and importance of the resolution would induce the House to let it lie over for future consideration.

Mr. SMITH said, if gentlemen's feelings were not to be applied to, policy ought to influence the House to grant relief to that town. Savannah, it was well known, was a considerable commercial city, and by that fire a very material part of our revenue was sunk, and if it could not obtain necessary assistance, it would be felt more than the grant of this sum to its support. It would be the general interest of the Union to restore that trade as soon as possible. He hoped, therefore, as the motion for commitment was only lost by one vote, the House would reconsider it.

Mr. SITGREAVES wished to know whether it was in order to move to reconsider the vote which had just been taken?

The SPEAKER said the present question must first be disposed of.

The motion was then put for discharging the Committee of the Whole, and lost, there being only twenty in favor of it.

Mr. SITGREAVES observed, that he voted with the majority in the decision on the first question, which had been taken; of which he wished to move a reconsideration. Very few questions had occurred since he had been a member of that House on which he could not determine within himself how to act. On the present occasion, he had however suffered a conflict between opposite feelings. He had doubts whether they had the right of appropriating money except for the public service of the country; at the same time, he was convinced, that if ever there was a claim on the humanity of the public, Savannah at present exhibited that claim; and he must own that his feelings had, at length, vanquished his doubts; and, though he originally voted against taking up the measure, he should now vote for it. He was not sure whether he should not commit an error in doing this; but if it was an error, he hoped it was an amiable one, and one which would be forgiven.

The question was then taken for going into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, and carried by a considerable majority, there being 45 votes for it.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, when

Mr. W. SMITH said, he did not propose to fill up the blank at that time. If the resolution was agreed to, the sum could be put in when the bill came into the House. He himself should not think of proposing to fill the blank with more than 15,000 dollars. This, it was true, was but a small sum, but it would afford relief to the poorer class of sufferers, and others could not expect to receive the amount of their losses. He should move that the Committee might rise and report the resolution.

Mr. HARTLEY called for the reading of the act

Relief to Savannah.

allowing relief to the sufferers by fire at St. Domingo. [It was read. It allowed 15,000 dollars for their relief, which sum was to be charged to the French Republic, and if not allowed in six months, the relief was to be stopped after that time.]

Mr. MACON wished the act allowing a sum of money to the daughters of Count de Grasse to be read also. He did not think either of them in point. The sufferings of the people of Savannah were doubtless very great; no one could help feeling for them. But he wished gentlemen to put their finger upon that part of the Constitution which gave that House power to afford them relief. Many other towns had suffered very considerably by fire. He believed he knew one that had suffered more than Savannah in proportion to its size: he alluded to Lexington in Virginia, as every house in the place was burnt. If the United States were to become underwriters to the whole Union, where must the line be drawn when their assistance might be claimed? Was it when three-fourths or four-fifths of a town was destroyed, or what other proportion? Insurance offices were the proper securities against fire. If the Government were to come forward in one instance, it must come forward in all, since every sufferer's claim stood upon the same footing. The sum which had been given to the sufferers at St. Domingo was to be charged to the French Republic, and that given to Count de Grasse's daughters was in consideration of their father's services. But New York had as great right to come forward and expect relief as Savannah. He felt for the sufferers in all these cases, but he felt as tenderly for the Constitution; he had examined it, and it did not authorize any such grant. He should, therefore, be very unwilling to act contrary to it.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, he felt a great deal of force on what gentlemen had said. There were two circumstances which were perfectly conclusive in his mind. He saw it our duty to grant relief from humanity and from policy. Savannah was a city of a minor, helpless State; it was a very young State, yet it was a part of the Union, and as such, was as much entitled to protection as any State under such a dire misfortune; and it became Congress to alleviate their great distress. They have lost much; they have, many of them, lost their all. To say we will not assist to relieve, when almost every State in the Union is putting their shoulders to support these people's burden, is wrong. The State of Pennsylvania has done itself immortal honor in the relief it has afforded, and shall we not help to support this part of the family in their distress? This State is a branch of the great family of the Union; it would be, in my idea, extremely inconsistent to neglect them. He hoped the motion would be adopted, and he hoped it would never be said that the General Government refused to provide help in such a poignant distress occurring in one of its principal towns.

Mr. HARTLEY said, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MACON] had voted against both of the bills which had been referred to. He knew no difference between the Constitution of the United States and that of Pennsylvania, yet a vote in their House had been carried unanimously. He thought the law for the relief of the sufferers of St. Domingo perfectly in point; for, notwithstanding what was said about negotiation, the distress of those people had consumed all the money before the six months were expired. If ever there was a case in which they could grant relief, this was one. The losses at New York and Charleston would bear no comparison with that of Savannah; they were rich and flourishing places, whilst Savannah was a small city of a new State, and the sufferers generally poor. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be agreed to.

Mr. MOORE said, the laws which had been adduced as precedents were not in point; for the one sum we were to have credit with the French Republic, and the other was in consideration of past services. The distress of the people of Savannah was not an object of legislation; every individual citizen could, if he pleased, show his individual humanity by subscribing to their relief; but it was not Constitutional for them to afford relief from the Treasury. If, however, the principle was adopted, it should be general. Every sufferer had an equal claim. Lexington, in Virginia, contained only one hundred houses, and all except two had been destroyed by fire. He should therefore move to add Lexington to Savannah in the resolution before them; though he would observe, as he did not approve of the principle, he should vote against them both.

Mr. W. SMITH wished gentlemen not to endeavor to defeat the proposition before them by an amendment. He did not think there could be a comparison made between the distress occasioned by a fire in a small town and one in a populous city. The destruction of Savannah was a great loss in a national view, as it would cause a considerable defalcation in the revenue, and probably any money they might advance for the relief of the citizens would be amply compensated, by enabling the city the sooner to resume its former importance in the commercial scale.

Mr. VENABLE did not see the difference between the two cases which was so distinguishable to the gentleman last up. Because Savannah was a commercial city, its distress, according to that gentleman, was indescribable, but when a like scene was exhibited in a small town, it was no longer an object which touched his feelings. His humanity went no where but where commerce was to be found. He asked whether the United States might not as well lose revenue in the first instance, as put money into the people's pockets to pay it with? Humanity was the same every where. A person who lost his all in a village, felt the misfortune as heavily as he who had a like loss in a city, and perhaps more so, since the citizen would have a better opportunity by means of commerce of retrieving his loss. He was against the general principle, as he believed, if acted upon, it would bring such claims upon the Treasury as it would not be able to answer.

Relief to Savannah.

Mr. MURRAY thought the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. VENABLE] carried his idea of relief too far. He had no idea that that House, or any Legislature, could undertake to make good individual misfortunes. He was of opinion that the lines which separated individual from national cases, were very observable; the one was happening every day, the other seldom occurred. When a large town is burnt down, and that town is an important Southern frontier town, it is surely a national calamity, and has a claim upon the humanity of the country. It was true, the claim was not of such a nature as to be brought into a Court of Justice, but it was a calamity in which the whole nation sympathized. It was not only a claim upon the humanity of the nation, but also upon its policy, as, by restoring it to its former situation, it would be able to bear its wonted part in contributing to the revenue of the country, and would continue to carry population, arts, and wealth to that distant part of the Union. In case of war, Savannah was a most important place. It was necessary the Union should have a town in that situation, and he could not consider any money which might now be advanced as given away, but as lent to that town, which might enable it, in a few years, to resume its former situation, whilst the withholding of it might prevent its ever rising from its present ruins.

Mr. KIRCHELL was opposed to the amendment and to the resolution itself. He had doubts if even they were to give the citizens 15,000 dollars, as was proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, whether they should not, instead of service, be doing them an injury; because, if the General Government were only to give this sum, the State Legislatures would proportion their donations accordingly, and probably give much less than they would otherwise have done, if they had not had this example before them. He had doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure; he thought the Constitution did not authorize them to make such a use of public money; however he thought it might be a very flexible instrument; it would bend to every situation, and every situation to that. He thought, in this instance, if we grant money, while we attempt to serve, we shall eventually injure. As to what the gentleman from Virginia says of Lexington, Mr. K. thought it had been fully relieved; however he should vote against both propositions.

Mr. PAGE said, that he was sorry that his colleague had made this amendment, as he had done it with a view to defeat the original resolution. If humanity alone were to direct his vote upon this question, and if the amendment had been proposed more early and singly, he might have voted for it. But that not being the case, it, as well as motives of general policy, influenced him in favor of the original motion. He had reasons which could not apply to the amendment. He should vote against it. He was bound by order to confine himself to the single question before the committee. This is, Shall the amendment be received or not? He declared it as his opinion that the case of Lexington ought not to be connected with that of Savannah, which had been, as stated by the member from South Carolina, materially different. He was restrained by order from entering into the merits of the original resolution, but he thought that he had a right to hint at the motive of policy which would apply to the resolution, and not to the amendment. This was, that Savannah being an important place, it would be wise and politic to prevent its revival from being owing to any other aid than that of the General Government of the United States. It ought not to be under obligations to individuals, or single States, and much less to a foreign Power.

Mr. HARTLEY hoped the amendment would not prevail. If the loss of the people at Lexington had been greater than they could support, they would doubtless have applied to the Legislature of Virginia, but he had not heard of any such application having been made. He agreed with the gentleman last up, that the General Government ought to relieve distresses of this kind.

Mr. MURRAY inquired when the fire happened at Lexington?

Mr. MOORE answered, about nine months ago. He thought it was the duty of the United States first to pay the claims which were made upon them by distressed soldiers and others for past services, who were denied justice because they had passed an act of limitation. If they were to act from generosity, he said that generosity ought to be extended universally. It was a new doctrine that because a sufferer by fire did not live in a commercial city he was not equally entitled to relief with the inhabitants of a city, and that though such persons were called upon to contribute to the losses of others, they could have no redress for their own. This seemed as if favorite spots were to be selected upon which special favor was to be shown. He was opposed to all such humanity.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was against the amendment, but he hoped the resolution would be agreed to. He was sorry any gentleman should propose an amendment like this, purposely to defeat a motion which would tend to relieve such sufferers as those of Georgia must be. He was not certain whether he could vote upon Constitutional grounds or not. It was a sharp conflict between humanity to that suffering country and the Constitution. If any case could be admissible, he thought this could; it ought to be remembered, that that part of the Union has suffered much. Georgia was a slaughter-pen during the war, besides being continually harassed by the hostile Indians. He thought 15,000 dollars would not be ill-spent, as from motives of policy it would be of more advantage to the United States from the quick return the revenue would gain. Indeed, if Constitutional, he hoped the sum would be made more than proposed. These are your fellow-citizens who are suffering, and if not speedily relieved, the whole interest will be involved. If in order, he would vote that the Committee rise, to enable him and, perhaps, many others, to consult whether relief could be constitutionally granted? He said he felt a great propensity to do it.

Relief to Savannah.

[H. OF R.]

The motion was put and negatived.

Mr. HARPER hoped the amendment would be rejected, for the same reason that he hoped all amendments which were brought forward with the same view with which it was produced, viz: to defeat the original motion, might be rejected. He thought every proposition should stand or fall upon its own ground. He wished that of his colleague to do so. Mr. H. insisted upon the dissimilarity of the two cases, and that the distinction of great and small calamity was sufficient to distinguish the two cases. With respect to the constitutionality of affording the relief in question, that had already been determined by the several instances which had been quoted, which were also founded upon humanity. The present case might justly be included under the head of promoting the general welfare of the country. Gentlemen who doubted the constitutionality of the present proceeding, had done the same in the instances alluded to. But, since their doubts had been so frequently overruled, he hoped they should hear no more of them. With respect to the policy of the measure, Savannah, he said, was the only considerable port, except Charleston, which the United States had in that quarter. It was situated at the mouth of a river which watered a space of country containing a thousand square miles. The average revenue of this city was $76,000. Was not this an object of importance? Was it not an object to foster, to relieve the distresses of such a place? Many great statesmen had employed themselves in founding cities, and should they not hold out a helping hand to one in distress? Peter the Great founded a city upon a morass, and Louis XIV. attempted to build one in the English channel. He trusted the American Government would have more wisdom than to see one of her's sink for want of a little timely assistance.

The question was put on the amendment and negatived—there being only 26 in favor of it.

Mr. BALDWIN said, he had doubted whether to make any observations on this motion; not that he was insensible to the calamitous situation which had been the cause of it, but from an apprehension that it might be thought he was too strongly affected by it. Though it might be disagreeable to one to give his judgment and urge his opinions, when his own relation to the question was different from that of others, yet some of the reflections might not be useless to those who were to determine it. He was sure it was not a want of disposition to relieve the unhappy sufferers that had or would draw forth an observation on this occasion, but merely doubts as to the powers of the Federal Government in money matters. The use of a written Constitution, and of that provision in it which declared that no money should be drawn from the Treasury but under appropriations made by law, was very manifest from the caution which it gave in the expenditure of public money and in laying burdens on the people; yet he believed it impossible to obtain absolute directions from it in every case. The objection is, that Congress is empowered to raise money only to pay the debts and to provide for the common defence, and the other purposes, exactly as specified in the 8th section. The objection has often been made, but many laws have passed not exactly specified in that section. He mentioned the private acts before alluded to, the law for establishing light-houses, to aid navigation in the improvement of harbors, beacons, buoys, and public piers, establishing trading-houses with the Indians, and some others, to show that though the Constitution was very useful in giving general directions, yet it was not capable of being administered under so rigorous and mechanical a construction as had been sometimes contended for. He begged leave to ask and to urge the question, whether there was no possible accumulation of calamity and distress that might be brought upon some part of the country which would justify the Federal Government in granting some relief? No doubt the usual pressure of private misfortune is relieved by the poor-laws and other acts of the State Governments; but, suppose a State belonging to this Union, the greater part, or, perhaps, the whole, was situated on an island, and that at once, by some of the great causes which we know operate in Nature, by tremendous convulsions and earthquakes, it was to be thrown into such a situation as some parts of the world have been, not only the whole property of the wretched survivors destroyed, but their place no longer habitable, would the Federal Government think they had no powers even to grant them some of their new land as a place of refuge? He was sensible that he had put a case so strong that the bare mention almost seemed improper, and that the mind of no gentleman could follow him to that extent. He only wished to establish the principle that there were possible instances in which it would be the duty of the Federal Government to interpose relief. Whether the present calamity was so great and the distress so pressing, that proper relief was scarcely to be expected from the State where it happened, was a question which he must leave to their determination. He was sure they could not want for inducements from the nature of the scene, or from their own dispositions. He could not wish to heighten the coloring in which it stood before them.

Mr. RUTHERFORD again rose in support of the motion. Is it not clear, he said, that it is the duty of the people at large to come forward at this time and hold up the helping hand to those poor distressed people? He presumed the rising dignity of this great Confederation demanded mutual assistance in distress. If the people are left to recover of themselves from this terrible dilemma, the nation will suffer. It is the duty and the interest of this rising nation to help the people of Georgia; it is a part of this great family, and demands assistance from every member. This idea should be conclusive. But for gentlemen to say the law is to have its full operation at this time, is saying nothing at all; it is pouring cold water upon their distresses; it is as though you were to say to a man that is drowning, stay awhile and we will come and assist you. This would be poor comfort. Policy, humanity, and justice, should prompt the House to the noble action. If one part of a system is injured the whole suffers by it. All the generous feelings of the human heart call aloud for help, and I hope we shall grant it.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he meant to have given a silent vote upon this subject, and have left other gentlemen to follow their own inclinations in the business; but an attempt had been made to ridicule the opinion which he and others held of the sacredness of the Constitution. In reference to what had fallen from the gentleman from Georgia, he said he had never heard it said that no individual instance could occur which might be an exception to a Constitutional rule. He had never heard that our laws should be so general as to admit of no latitude, or that money should never be expended but for payment of debts or for defence.

Mr. N. said, he was not satisfied with the distinction made on this occasion, viz: that if a few inhabitants of a small town experienced loss by fire they were not entitled to consideration; but, if the same calamity happened in a large city, it had a claim upon them for relief. He wished to know whether they were about to do what ought not to be left undone? There was no case in which they were at liberty to act or not. If they were bound to afford relief then, were they not equally bound at any future period to afford relief in similar cases? If the thing was right and proper, relief ought to be commensurate with the distress, otherwise they did not do their duty. If it was otherwise, the thing was arbitrary and a whim. If he voted for relieving this case he should feel bound to relieve every future distress by fire. When an amendment was lately under consideration, it was said to be improper, because the evil was of less magnitude than the present. It was not so; it was an explanation of the subject. The gentleman from South Carolina said he had not heard of that fire. That gentleman lived near Savannah, and other considerations besides those of humanity might influence his conduct on the present occasion. Gentlemen had said they stood in the same situation as individual States. That opinion, he said, had gone too far. The General Government had no power but what was given to it, but the State Governments had all power for the good of their several States. If the general welfare was to be extended (as it had been insinuated it ought) to objects of charity, it was undefined indeed. Charity was not a proper subject for them to legislate upon; and, if this resolution were to pass, all the power of which they were possessed would not be adequate to raise funds to answer the demands which would be brought against the Treasury.

Mr. GILES said, if the present resolution passed it would make them answerable for all future losses by fire. The small sum of $15,000 was not of any consequence when compared with the establishment of a principle of that House acting upon generosity. He believed that neither the money nor humanity, but the establishment of the principle, was the thing aimed at. The unanimity with which a resolution had passed the Pennsylvania Legislature, was a proof that they believed they had the power to pass such a law. It was said the General Government possessed the authority. The gentleman from Georgia had said that "affairs of men" made it necessary to depart from the strict Constitutional power. For his part, he did not think they ought to attend to what "the affairs of men" or what generosity and humanity required, but what the Constitution and their duty required.

The authority of that House, he said, was specified, beyond which they ought not to go. This was a principle not within the Constitution, but opposed to it.

There had, he said, been several cases introduced. That of the sufferers of St. Domingo was not a case in point. They looked for a reimbursement of the money. He believed it had been repaid. And when the daughters of the Count de Grasse had $4,000 given them, it was thought to be necessary to introduce their father's services as a consideration. His feelings, he said, were not less alive to the calls of humanity than those of other gentlemen; but, by granting the money required, they should go beyond their powers, and do more real injury than good.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that gentlemen had spoken of a sum in contemplation; but the question was not on the sum to be granted; that would be for future consideration, and if gentlemen wished to make it commensurate with the object, they could do so. The present question was, whether any relief should be granted? He wished gentlemen would say whether no case of calamity could exist in which the United States ought to grant relief? He believed every one admitted such a case might occur. The question was, whether this was the case? He trusted it was, since it was an unexampled calamity.

The precedents which had been adduced appeared to be no more strongly warranted than this. First, with respect to the relief granted the sufferers at St. Domingo. In order to make the thing more palatable, it was said that sum should be charged to the French Republic. It was provisional, and the fact was they had not admitted it, and the United States paid it. In reference to the relief granted to the daughters of Count de Grasse: it was said to be for services. Did the daughters perform any services? No, but the father did. But did the Constitution of the United States acknowledge any hereditary claim of this sort? He believed not. This was a mere pretence. It was an act of generosity. Another case occurred to him, which had not been mentioned, viz: the recompense allowed to persons who suffered from the Western insurrection. Was this authorized by the Constitution any more than the present? He believed not.

Gentlemen had said, that the Legislature of Pennsylvania had a right to grant relief. Mr. S. asked, what right they had to grant relief to the people of Georgia more than the Representatives of the United States? These are their own citizens, the people whom they represent, and as such ought to feel for and alleviate their distresses.

A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] had said we should not grant the relief to those people because we have not paid our debts. Is this a reason? Will a man say he cannot give to the unfortunate because he is in debt? Were that the case perhaps people of the greatest opulence would be as entitled to excuse as any other. Men in great business are seldom out of debt; but they may with safety be generous and charitable. The claims of those soldiers and other petitioners referred to by that gentleman, ought not to be considered as a debt. No claim, he said, which was justly due, was refused payment. A certain time was set at which all claims were to be brought in, and would have been discharged. Such as were not, except in very particular cases, were rejected. This was a necessary measure, and generally approved of. Then surely those claims which were barred by this act of limitation could not be considered a debt.

This argument, Mr. S. said, would not do: because a man owed a little money, or another chose to say he did, he was not to be charitable. He thought the House fully authorized to grant relief in this case.

In examining different cases, Mr. S. said, he found that of the widow of Major Forsyth, and also that of the orphan children of Major Trueman. Gentlemen would perhaps say that these were cases where the husband and ancestor had rendered services to the United States; and he had no doubt that the ancestors of those sufferers at Savannah, and perhaps the sufferers themselves, had rendered services to the United States. If gentlemen pleased, therefore, the words, "in consideration of services performed," &c. might be inserted.

It has been said, that if the proposed donation was made by Congress, it would lessen the claim of the sufferers upon individual States. He thought differently. He thought it would show that Congress believed their case a hard one, and deserving of attention. But another thing: it was not probable that any of the Legislatures would be in session for some time, except one or two. How, then, were the sufferers to be relieved? The few thousand dollars they had yet got would be a mere bagatelle towards their immense loss. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be agreed to.

Mr. CORR said he should vote against this resolution, though he felt as much for the distresses of the people of Savannah as any gentleman in that House. Nor would his objections be on Constitutional grounds. He thought where there were calls of generosity and humanity on the National Treasury sufficiently strong, he should vote for paying attention to them. The present, he said, was a call of humanity from the people of Savannah; the call was loud, and ought to be satisfied by somebody. The question was, whether it was made with propriety to them? He thought not; and that to agree to the resolution would be laying a dangerous precedent. He conceived the instances which had been adduced as precedents for the present case were not in point. The application was from foreigners to the feelings of this Government, which he thought had been attended to with propriety. But, he said, there was an obvious distinction between the two cases. There was no probability that a foreigner would be listened to by a State Legislature. This was a reason which did not apply to this case. Major Forsyth and Major Trueman had died in the service of the United States; their families, therefore, seemed to have a just claim for protection. The Western insurrection was a very different thing: the grant was in consequence of exertions in favor of Government.

Mr. C. said it appeared to him, from a variety of reasons, that this subject would be best left in the hands of the individual States. The greatest difficulty attending this Government was, the providing of money to support its necessary expenses. Considering this, therefore, as a precedent likely to draw great sums from the Treasury, he wished to avoid giving it place.

Mr. W. SMITH said that this sum could not be a serious inconvenience to the Treasury, as gentlemen knew there must be additional revenue provided. Indeed, it might be an advantage to the Treasury, as it might put the people of Savannah in a state of paying revenue, which otherwise would not be the case.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, the more he heard, the more he found himself in favor of the resolution. By the discussion it had undergone, he was inclined to think it was, perhaps, reconcilable with the Constitution; perhaps it was, he said, for he was not certain. The annual revenue, he said, of that place, was seventy thousand dollars to the United States, besides the great consideration of it as a frontier town. He had compared the advantages and disadvantages with respect to its relief in his own mind, and thought it would be highly consistent with policy to grant relief. It was a place which had been in great distress, and had great struggles with enemies in times past. Can it be possible to suppose that we have not power to assist in erecting that place again, and putting it upon a footing to do good to the United States by a return of her revenue? Certainly not. Would the Committee be willing that Savannah should be erased from the revenue? Are they willing to let it rest, and lose it? This is impossible. Then, surely, it becomes policy to give aid towards its re-erection. Unless the people do receive some aid, it will be a long time before seventy thousand dollars will be again produced from the revenue of that place.

For what purpose was it, Mr. C. asked, that money was spent to erect trading-houses in the back countries? He answered, for the general welfare; for the support of trade, and the increase of the revenue. So will a small sum given towards the relief of this suffering town. If there could be reason to grant money to the widows of Major Forsyth and Major Trueman, there surely must be as much to do this. That he supposed was done for the public good, and this he thought would equally apply. He was forcibly impressed with a sense of its being proper and right to grant this relief; he thought his constituents would be willing to do it, and with pleasure. Except something more consistent with reason and the general good was advanced, more than he had heard, he should vote for the resolution.

On a division on the question for concurring with the report of the select committee, twenty-six members only rose in the affirmative; it was therefore not carried.

The Committee then rose and reported their disagreement, when the House took it up.

The question was then taken, and the yeas and nays demanded, "that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the motion," and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 55, nays 24, as follows:

THURSDAY, December 29.

GEORGE HANCOCK, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying an account of the receipts and expenditures for the year 1795; which was read.

Also, another Letter, transmitting a report and sundry statements, exhibiting a view of the Debts of the United States on the first day of January, 1790, 1791, and 1796, pursuant to a resolution of the House of last session; which, with the above Letter, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved for the order of the day, that the House resolve itself into a Committee on the reports of committees to whom were referred the petitions of sundry refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia.

The first resolution read from the last report of the select committee on this subject, was in these words.

"Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners, Joseph Green and others, from Canada, praying a bounty in lands and other pay, for services rendered in the late war with Great Britain, ought not to be granted."

This resolution was agreed to. The second was thus:

"Resolved, That a tract of land, not exceeding — acres, be laid off Northwest of the Ohio river, beginning at the mouth of the Great Miami, and extending down the Ohio, not exceeding three times the breadth in length, be immediately appropriated to compensate the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, pursuant to the resolves of Congress of the 23d April, 1783, and the 13th April, 1785."

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the situation of the land would not be mentioned in the resolution; there were many circumstances that would render it unnecessary and improper.

Mr. HARTLEY wished to know where the land was to be, because the value of the land in different places was various; he thought they ought to have land: he would not be thought to object to the resolution.

Mr. VENABLE did not think it necessary to mention at this time what land should be appropriated for this purpose. A bill would be introduced in a few days, it could then be determined. If there were objections to appropriate the land mentioned, he hoped gentlemen would then propose a spot that would suit every convenience better. These people, he said, ought to be satisfied: it was time they were.

Mr. DAYTON said, that the chairman of the committee said there was no land near Lake Erie of that description belonging to the United States; he wished to know what foundation the assertion had?

Mr. GREENUP said, the committee had made what inquiry they could on the subject, of persons well-informed, who told them there was no land belonging to the United States of that description.

Mr. SITGREAVES would vote for striking out the clause as it stood, not from any knowledge he had on the justice of the claims, but, if just, satisfaction should be given. The committee had not reported as to the value of land necessary to be given; the value of land was proportioned to its different qualities and location; he thought it would be as well for these people, to give them military land warrants, and let them locate by lot: this had heretofore been the method, and he thought it would be as advantageous to them as any, and avoid many difficulties with respect to the grant.

Mr. MACON hoped the question would be divided; he liked the proposition of the gentleman last up, to strike out, and insert the words proposed; he therefore would wish the Committee to rise, and report progress; or, if the House do not adopt the substitute, he hoped it would be re-committed.

M. DAYTON moved to strike out the words relative to location, and substitute the following resolution :

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for granting donations of land to Canadian and Nova Scotia refugees, in conformity to the resolves of Congress of the 23d of April, 1783, and the 13th of April, 1785."

This resolution was adopted.

The third was—

"Resolved, That five hundred acres of land be granted to each refugee from Canada and Nova Scotia."

This resolution was attended with three explanatory restrictions. It passed, and the Chairman read the first of these rules, which was, "that the applicant shall make proof, before some Court of record, of his actual residence in one of the provinces aforesaid, previous to the ——— day of ———."

Mr. GREENUP supposed this was meant merely as the outlines of a plan to be completed when the bill was brought in; at this time it was necessary that instruction should be given to the committee that they may bring in a bill consistent with the will of the House.

Mr. DAYTON objected to this, and the two following clauses. He objected also to the resolution for an indiscriminate grant of five hundred acres of land to each refugee. Some of these people would be found to deserve more and some less, in proportion to their exertion and sufferings. Some might have lost large property, or have had large families. If Mr. DAYTON had observed what the Committee were doing, he would have objected to the passing of that clause. He likewise opposed the present one. This clause and the remaining two were negatived.

The Committee of the Whole then rose. The Chairman reported progress. The House took up the report. The first resolution and the second, as altered in the Committee, were agreed to.

The question on the third resolution was then put.

Mr. MACON thought that it would be exceedingly improper to grant an equal quantity to each; it ought to be entirely circumstantial.

Mr. GREENUP was of the same opinion; he said some of these people had suffered more than others. The circumstances of some were such that they were in irons, in close confinement twelve or fourteen months, many of them had the warrant signed for their execution, and a variety of cruelties were exercised; these distresses required consideration.

Mr. BALDWIN hoped it would be struck out; the House should not go into particulars of the quantity to be given, or the circumstances of the persons; he had seen great difficulty attending these specifications. He did not like this loose way of doing business; they need not open land offices for that purpose; some way would be found out to give the people satisfaction.

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the committee would not be restricted.

The question on the third resolution was then put, and lost.

A committee was then appointed of Messrs. GILMAN, WILLIAMS, and GREENUP, with instructions to bring in a bill pursuant to the resolutions as amended.

KIDNAPPING NEGROES.

Mr. SWANWICK called the order of the day on a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made the last session, on a memorial from the State of Delaware, respecting the kidnapping of negroes and mulattoes. The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject.

Mr. SWANWICK said, that there was a mischievous practice in use of carrying these people away from the place of their residence, by masters of vessels, and selling them in other parts. The plan of the committee was to get instructions from the House to bring in a bill making it necessary for every master of a vessel to have a certificate of the number and situation of any negroes or mulattoes he may have on board. He hoped the measure would not at all be opposed, as it only prevented thefts in this case.

Mr. COIT wished to know whether it was necessary for the United States to intermeddle with this? He wished the report had been more satisfactory, and stated the principles upon which it was formed with more precision. The evil, he doubted not, existed, but the law might create a greater evil than that it was intended to cure. It appeared to him that the laws in the several States were fully adequate to the subject without further provision; he was not ready to give a vote on it either way at present.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the report was grounded on an application from the Legislature of Delaware. [Mr. S. here read the memorial from that State to Congress.] The practice, he said, was very injurious and dangerous to that State, and he hoped a remedy would be attempted, as it was in the power of Congress to provide one by this method; some of the States had made an attempt to remedy this evil, but their laws were broken with impunity. If the resolution of the Committee passed, he should move that the Committee bring in a bill in pursuance thereto.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, he did not object to the principle of the motion. The Committee have showed what the States could not do, but have not told us what the United States could do, to remedy the evil; there could be no question of the evil of the action, but the question was, What was to remedy this evil?

The resolution was to give aid to the different States; it appeared to be too broad: the report says that negroes and mulattoes are carried off, contrary to law. If contrary to the laws of the States, they certainly ought to carry their laws into effect: it cannot be done till they show us how Congress are to aid them. The Committee certainly had not gone far enough in their report. There was a difference betwixt reporting on an established principle, and one which was yet to settle. He thought the report ought to go back to the Committee to be amended. He could not see how the laws of the General Government could operate over those of the several States. The case of stolen goods would apply the same as negroes; they were looked upon, in the States where slavery was permitted, as individual property; therefore he thought stealing in one case would apply to the other. He hoped it would go back for the Committee to point out a remedy.

Mr. MACON moved that the Committee rise, to make room for the gentleman's motion.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the laws of the different States forbade the stealing of negroes; but they had no remedy that would take effect out of their own State: and although each had effect in their own State, yet they had no power on the water. The intention of the present measure was to oblige masters of vessels, when they cleared out of any ports in the Delaware, when they took any negro or mulatto on board, to have a certificate of their being free. The situation of the State of Delaware, communicating with both the Delaware and Chesapeake, was, in this respect, particularly exposed to insult and injury; but this remedy, he thought, would be effectual. The gentleman last up wished the Committee to rise, in order to recommit it: he should vote for it if the gentleman was willing to add, "to bring in a bill." The gentleman was in the Committee, if he had stated his objections there, it might have saved time.

Mr. COIT imagined that the report was a very lame one. The object of the bill should have been stated more fully.

Mr. MURRAY wished to know what was fully meant by the idea of preventing kidnapping. He confessed he did not rightly understand the meaning of the word. Was the intention of the Committee to have reference to the taking of free negroes and selling them as slaves, or the taking slaves to make them free?

Mr. SWANWICK said it was intended to prevent both evils. It was intended to prevent their being stolen from their masters; and, also, to prevent the power of the master taking them to the other States to sell them. This measure, he thought, would prevent both. The State of Maryland had taken measures to prevent it themselves; they had made it a heavy penalty to take a negro out of the State; but that is not effectual to prevent the evil now complained of. This was meant to prevent the practice of examining ships before they sailed and when they arrived.

Mr. W. SMITH wished the Committee to rise; not with a view of recommitting the report, but to get rid of the business altogether. The subject, he said, involved many serious questions; it required very serious consideration, and he wished it had never come up. It was a question with him how far Congress had a right to meddle with it at all. He felt alarmed on the subject as brought from that State. He considered it as a kind of entering-wedge, as a gentleman had lately said, on another occasion. It was altogether a municipal regulation, and not at all connected with trade or commerce, and therefore ought to be left to the State Legislatures to settle. He did not think the Constitution allowed that House to act in it.

Gentlemen had said, that the laws of the States took no effect on the waters. This, he thought, was founded on a mistake. The laws of the States could prevent robbery on water as well as on land, if within the jurisdiction of the United States. He hoped the Committee would rise, and dismiss the subject.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH thought the gentleman knew not the proper meaning of the report. It was not to make a law against stealing merely, but against its being done successfully; many instances, he said, had occurred, where they had been hid many days on board the ships and taken away in the night to the West Indies, and other parts of the world to sell them. It was impossible that the existing laws of the States should prevent this fraudulent practice: the intent of this law was to prevent this practice; by being examined, and forced to take certificates along with them, it could not be easily done. The particulars of the remedy would be more readily seen when the bill was brought in; it would explain itself; it then might be modified, altered, or rejected altogether. He thought it could give no offence or cause of alarm to any gentleman; and he was sure it was no way contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. MACON wished the Committee to rise, and not have leave to sit again. He began to see more of the impropriety of the measure than before, and for the same reasons as the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SITGREAVES hoped the subject would not be got rid of in this way; he hoped gentlemen would be inclined to treat this question of humanity with as much candor as they usually show to other subjects. He owned he had been very much surprised at the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MURRAY] in attacking the subject in that side-way. The gentleman asked, what was the intention when speaking of kidnapping? he seemed not to know the meaning of the phrase. Surely this is not the gentleman's wonted candor; he has not commonly satirized in this manner: but no one could be at a loss to understand the gentleman's insinuation at this time.

This, Mr. S. said, was introduced to prevent free men from being kidnapped: it is honorable in the Legislature to take it up. If it was otherwise, that slaves were kidnapped and made free men of, he was willing to join with the gentleman to correct it. Let us not, said he, because two evils exist, correct neither: this is not a mode of agreement; it ought not to prevail in this or any other public body.

The gentleman from South Carolina wished the Committee to rise, in order to get rid of the matter, because it was crude and undigested. If this is the case, let it be put into a proper form, by instructing the Committee to bring in a bill; this would obviate all such objections, or give a fair scope to argument. The report was objected to, because the principle upon which it was founded did not appear: then let gentlemen agree for it to go back to the Committee, it would then come forward in an explicit form. The gentleman would then be convinced that it had no interference with State regulations, but, in conformity to them all, would render them Legislative aid, to which their power did not extend.

Mr. SWANWICK said, this House had ascertained a certain proof, by which our seamen are known, by giving them a certificate of their citizenship, specifying their person and freedom, which had operated against impressment: and was it not equally necessary, and would it not be equally competent, to protect a man from injuries to which his color has exposed him? Our unfortunate negroes and mulattoes are exposed by their color to much insult. In some places, he said, they were so exposed, that color alone was evidence of slavery. He would not enter into the question, whether all ought to be free, because it was not immediately before the House; but if these people were black or white, if free, they ought to be protected in the enjoyment of their freedom, not only by State Legislatures but by the General Government. When gentlemen came into such a subject as this, they should wait till it came before them in a proper form; not reject it before known. Gentlemen seemed to be going on in the dark. If it was not consistent with the Constitution, it would then be proved, as no doubt gentlemen would search for themselves. If this method be adopted, it is possible to bring the masters of your coasting vessels, and others, to apply for a certificate, and thus prevent that fraudulent practice.

If such an evil does exist, this is the most efficient remedy; it will answer the purpose of the gentleman from Maryland, by preventing slaves being made free men also. There are laws in some of the States, Pennsylvania for one, that will not suffer slaves to be taken out of one State into another. So far as this can operate, so far it will be successful; but when out of our power—when there is possibility of evading wholesome laws, is it not right to secure a power to aid the institution, by adding to them the force of your jurisdiction to prevent imposition? And if it can be done, does not humanity and justice require your utmost effort? Mr. S. hoped it would be treated with respect, and obtain all the aid that it required from the General Government.

Mr. MURRAY did not expect to have raised the sensibility of the gentleman last up. It really arose from his ignorance, he said. He wished to know the origin of the matter; he did not know whether it had originated in a memorial, or whether it came from the humanity of some patriotic member, unsolicited. Great and manifold evils did exist in this point: he meant to make a motion on the subject, as Maryland felt heavily from the practice. He confessed he was not sufficiently acquainted with the English language to know the proper meaning of the word kidnapping; he therefore wished to know if it extended to the object he had in view. He declared he did not wish to encourage the harboring of negroes; far from it; he wished to prevent it. He did not think the law extended far enough on that point: at present, negroes, through the influence of their own minds, or the insinuations of others, or both, frequently leave their masters, and are harbored by other persons. The law takes no notice of this, except it can be proved that the negro is some person's property, and has absconded: this is very difficult to prove; therefore great evils attend its lenity. 'Tis true, if it can be proved that the negro has absconded and was harbored, there was a very heavy penalty inflicted; but, he said, this was difficult to prove. This, he owned, was his insinuation, as the gentleman termed it; and upon this subject he meant to claim the attention of the House. This evil, he said, might arise from the false philosophy and misplaced philanthropy of the advocates of emancipation. He was ever willing to give the question a fair trial, and thought himself bound to thank the gentleman for his extreme benevolence in advocating it.

Mr. SITGREAVES rose merely to acknowledge his pleasure to hear the gentleman was willing for the subject to undergo a full and fair investigation; how that investigation was to go on, he did not say. Mr. S. hoped the subject would not be got rid of, as a gentleman had wished. If further information was wished on the subject, he had no objection to the Committee's rising and recommitting it. If, by any thing he had said, it should be thought that he approved of all the operations of emancipation, he would answer, this was not the case. He believed that too great zeal in a cause may carry it too far, and produce bad effects. But this was no part of the present question; it was not to make those persons free that were slaves, but to preserve those free who are so now.

Mr. SWANWICK, to satisfy the gentleman from Maryland, told him, that the subject came before the House from the State of Delaware.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he did not know how far the Committee should go, he should not vote for the matter to go into the Committee. He said, it was that kind of business which, by the Constitution, was to be left to the different States, he could not agree to the subject going any further. The observations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania had convinced him that that House ought not to interfere with the individual States on the subject, the interests and policy of the different States were so various, that it would be a dangerous thing to meddle with. He thought it an improper question for discussion; he conceived it would be sound policy not to touch it in that House. The gentleman had gone too far to make use of the word emancipation. He feared lest the use of it should spread an alarm through some of the States. It might imperceptibly lead from step to step till it ends in mischief.

The gentleman spoke of the waters. The States have jurisdiction over all the navigable waters within their bounds; and where two States are separated by a river or bay, it would then be easy for a negotiation between those two States to provide security to their citizens from injury on such waters. Let not the General Government intermeddle with the States' policy; it might cause very considerable contests and injury. He hoped it would drop altogether.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped the business would not be dismissed. We, said Mr. N., who reside in the Southern States, are unfortunately possessed of such a kind of property as has a considerable odium attached to it; but, if we unfortunately hold slaves, we ought not to contribute to the making slaves of free men, but I would wish to establish them in their freedom. If we can give relief as the thing exists, let it be; by all means do it, whether it incur the pleasure or displeasure of some of the slaveholders. He hoped the subject would have full investigation.

The question was then put for the Committee to rise. Fifty-four members rising in the affirmative, it was carried.

Mr. SITGREAVES then moved for the Committee of the Whole to be discharged from the further consideration of the report; this, he said, was in order to make way for another motion to refer it back to the Committee, to report by bill or otherwise.

The question was put, and the Committee discharged.

Mr. SWANWICK moved that the business be re-committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SITGREAVES hoped no opposition would be made to this motion; for if the committee brought in a bill, it could then be objected to, the same as though the subject had never been introduced.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped the last part of the motion, "by bill or otherwise," would be omitted. Suppose, he said, the committee should find it inexpedient to bring in a bill; were they obliged to do it? This would be tying them to a certain mode which, perhaps, they may not approve, and they have not the power left them to negative. He thought the House ought to follow the usual course and instruct the committee what to do.

Mr. NICHOLAS supposed the committee would not be offended, for he did not consider their power so circumscribed as the gentleman last up; whether they may find it expedient, was to be tried.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the minds of the committee were already made up; they had reported; and to tie them up not to do more than they had already done, to send them back without some new instructions, would be doing nothing at all.

Mr. COIT wished the subject to be postponed for further consideration before it was sent to the committee. He had doubts as to the propriety of sending it at all. He thought it had not had that discussion a subject so important required.

Mr. SWANWICK said, gentlemen in general allow it ought to go to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. COIT] is a member of that committee; the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is also a member; it is somewhat surprising they want information. They surely cannot object to its being referred, as then they may have an opportunity to accommodate measures more to their own desires.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he believed this was the first time it was considered in the House. It had been tried in a committee but never taken up by the House, and now gentlemen wish to send it back to the committee, with instructions to bring in a bill. The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures was considerably deranged since last session, when this business came before them; many new members were added, and it required more information before it could come to the conclusion prescribed.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, if any one good purpose could be derived to the House or to the gentlemen, he would not oppose it; but he was at a loss to know what good object could be attained by a delay. With respect to what had been said by the gentleman, [Mr. SMITH,] that the committee were forced to bring in a bill, he was surprised that such an idea should be formed. If that committee report a bill, this House is not even pledged to pass it. When the subject is sent to the committee with that instruction, can it be conceived that committee is forced to report a bill? There is no such thing intended nor included in the words, as either this House should be pledged to pass a bill, or that the committee should report one. The object is, that the House, through the medium of the committee, should have a plan prepared for their consideration, and the word "otherwise" leaves the committee to exercise its own discretion as to the report.

The gentleman from Connecticut, with a prudence and consistency highly becoming, wishes time to think on the subject. But how is that gentleman to have foundation for his reflections until a bill is drawn? Mr. S. did not know what were the resources of that gentleman's mind, but for himself, he must own that in all the attitudes in which this subject had presented itself, he could not distinctly see the plan. One gentleman had said there was no remedy the United States could apply but what was incompatible with the laws of the individual States. Mr. S. presumed that until he saw the mode to be adopted, he could not say whether it was easy or difficult. On the whole, he thought to postpone the subject could answer no good end, while it might delay the object, and do injury.

Mr. COIT said, very probably the resources of his mind may not be equal to that gentleman's, he therefore wished the subject to be delayed that he might have time to get into the knowledge of the business.

Mr. SMITH thought it had best be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, if it must be committed, as it was a matter entirely of a Legislative nature. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SITGREAVES] said, that the only way to get right was to refer it to a committee to bring in a bill. He would ask, what were they to give the House? We must depart, said Mr. S., from our usual custom; we must pledge ourselves, and bind the committee to report, by bill or otherwise. He thought the House ought at least to have one day's notice to consider the subject. He said he was not now satisfied whether it was consistent with the Constitution.

Mr. Corr's motion for postponement was then put and carried—yeas 46, nays 30.

HUGH LAWSON WHITE.

Mr. BLOUNT then called for the order of the day on the report of the Secretary of War on the petition of Hugh Lawson White, a soldier under General Sevier, against the Indians. The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

The following report from the Committee of Claims was then read:

That the claim set forth in the said petition, is intended to establish a principle that will apply to the whole of the militia which were called out under Brigadier General Sevier, in 1793, to act offensively against certain Indians Southwest of the Ohio.

That the expedition against these Indians, as appears from the muster-rolls, comprehended a period of above five months, or from the 22d July to 31st December, 1793.

That it was undertaken without authority derived from the President, under the laws of the United States, and for the avowed purpose of carrying the war into the Cherokee country.

That the tenor of the instructions from the Department of War to the Governor of the Southwestern Territory forbade offensive operations.

Having given these facts, it may be proper to add, that it appears, by a recurrence to official papers, that the Indians had greatly perplexed and harassed by thefts and murders, the frontier inhabitants of Tennessee; and previous to the service, for which compensation is demanded, had shown themselves in considerable force, and killed at two stations (one of them within seven miles of Knoxville) fifteen persons, including women and children, as stated in the annexed letter:*

* Copy of a letter from Daniel Smith to the Secretary at War, dated,

KNOXVILLE, October 1, 1795.

SIR: By adverting to the correspondence of Governor Blount in the year 1793 (previous to his going to Philadelphia) with Mr. Secretary Knox, it will appear that very frequent acts of hostility were perpetrated on the citizens of this Territory, by the Cherokee and Creek Indians. Their repeated murders, which his vigilance could not prevent, I cannot say were in all cases borne with as much patience as they ought to have been, considering the hopes that were held out to them that the General Government would, in due time, interpose with difficulty.

Shortly after the Governor's departure for Philadelphia, the enormities committed by these Indians, far from abating, grew more flagrant. A Captain John Beard (availing himself of the general temper of the frontier citizens, heated by repeated murders being committed on them) being ordered on duty by Governor Blount, about two days before his departure to punish the murderers of one Gilham and San, but restricted in his order from crossing the Tennessee, violated these orders, crossed the Tennessee, and killed several Indians at the Hanging Maws. Beard said, on his return, he had pursued the trace of the murderers. I own I did not believe him. But the fact stands now so well attested by the testimony of several men of credibility, even of some connected with Indians, who, if they had any bias, it might be presumed would lean in favor of the Indians, that I cannot refrain from believing he did follow the trace of the murderers across the Tennessee.

A while after this, a party of about two hundred Indians made an attack on Henry's station; they not only killed one of our privates, but talked of taking the garrison.

On that quarter being so vigorously invaded, I ordered General Sevier to march to the defence of the frontiers, with one-third of the militia who had been ordered, previous to the Governor's departure, to hold themselves in readiness for such a service. But the General, under this order, had not collected more than about three hundred infantry and two troops of horse, when a large body of Creeks and Cherokees attacked and carried Cavett's station, seven miles below this place, and killed every man, woman, and child, belonging to it, being thirteen in number.

that it must rest with Congress to judge how far these aggressions of Indians, and such other circumstances as can be adduced to the parties, constitute a case of imminent danger, or the expedition a just and necessary measure.

Mr. A. JACKSON said, by a recurrence to the papers just read, he doubted not it would appear evident, that the measures pursued on the occasion alluded to were both just and necessary. When it was seen that war was waged upon the State, that the knife and the tomahawk were held over the heads of women and children, that peaceable citizens were murdered, it was time to make resistance. Some of the assertions of the Secretary at War, he said, were not founded in fact; particularly with respect to the expedition being undertaken for the avowed purpose of carrying the war into the Cherokee country; indeed they were contradicted by a reference to Gen. Smith's letter to the Secretary of War. He trusted it would not be presuming too much, when he said, from being an inhabitant of the country, he had some knowledge of this business. From June to the end of October, he said, the militia acted entirely on the defensive, when twelve hundred Indians came upon them and carried their station, and threatened to carry the Seat of Government. In such a state, said Mr. J., would the Secretary (upon whom the Executive power rested, in the absence of the Governor) have been justified, had he not adopted the measures he did of pursuing the enemy? He believed he would not; that the expedition was just and necessary, and that, therefore, the claim of Mr. White ought to be granted.

He therefore proposed a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That General Sevier's expedition into the Cherokee Nation, in the year 1793, was a just and necessary measure, and that provision ought to be made by law for paying the expenses thereof."

From the information I then received, I was convinced there would not be less than twelve hundred Indians in arms against us, and later information proves that number stated too low.

My situation was distressing. I could look on this act of the Creeks and Cherokees in no other light, than as positive a declaration of war as ever was or can be denounced by one nation against another, because it was the act of so great a proportion of these tribes; not the act of what the chiefs are apt to call a few bad young men, but headed also by the most distinguished of their warriors. Should I forbear to yield protection to the inhabitants, such conduct would be charged both with want of duty and humanity, and criminal in a great degree. Notwithstanding Beard's act cannot be justified, it may be palliated in a great degree from his having actually followed the trace of Gilham's murderers, as now appears; and had it not this palliation, could I look on and see the whole of the inhabitants sacrificed! innocent men, women, and children? Ought I not to have made use of the power understood to be lodged with me by the Constitution, in the latter part of the 10th section, 1st article, where each individual State is restricted from engaging in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay?

I hesitated not, but ordered General Sevier, with what troops could be hastily assembled, to repel and pursue these invaders; and, in so doing, I then believed I consulted the true interest of the United States. The consequences have confirmed the fact that my opinion was well founded.

The service which those troops performed was of that importance, that it laid the ground work of our present tranquility, which otherwise could not have been effected. Yet I learn the General and his men have not been paid. This, to my mind, carries a tacit censure of my conduct.

If no act of Congress exists, embracing the case, permit me to suggest the propriety of laying the matter before that body, to obtain their sense thereof. I am, sir, &c.

DANIEL SMITH.

System of Bankruptcy—Fugitives from Justice.

[DECEMBER, 1796.]

Mr. HARPER said, this appeared to be a subject of considerable importance; he hoped the resolution would, for the present, lie on the table. He therefore moved that the Committee rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. COIT said, the report wanted some more preparation before it should have come before the House; he would therefore move that it be referred to the Committee of Claims; he knew of no reason against this reference, as many reports from Heads of Departments had been so referred.

Mr. BLOUNT hoped the motion would not prevail. The expedient of referring it to the Secretary at War was resorted to, when it first came before the House. He hoped now it would not be deferred, but decided on. He thought the Committee of Claims, from having once had it before the House, knew as much of the case as they could know, and perhaps all was included in this report.

Mr. D. FOSTER made the same observations in effect as Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. COIT said, gentlemen had not given a shadow of a reason why it should not be referred to that committee.

Mr. JACKSON owned he was not very well acquainted with the rules of the House, but from the best idea he could form, it was a very circuitous way of doing business. Why now refer it to the Committee of Claims, when all the facts are stated in this report, he knew not. If this was the usual mode of doing business, he hoped it would not be referred.

Mr. W. LYMAN thought, the time it was under consideration before, when referred to the Secretary at War, was the time to have thought of referring it to that Committee; but now it was too late; now the House had a report before it. It appeared to him a mere formality. It looks like throwing the business out. He had not made up his mind which way he should vote, but he thought one report was sufficient; he, therefore, hoped it would come under consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT said, when he first presented the petition, he moved it to be referred to the Committee of Claims; it was then rejected, and sent to the Secretary at War.

The Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HARPER said that, in the report of the unfinished business of last session, there was a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. The subject, he said, had been often thought on, but never had been taken into serious consideration; the state of the country called for it, and it became more and more necessary. In order to take some steps to bring the business forward, he would move that it be now committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MACON thought it very improbable that a business which could not be done in a session of seven or eight months, should stand any chance in so short a period as that remaining of this session; he should, therefore, oppose committing it this session.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, it was true the present session was short, but he thought the House should not be prevented from entering into such an important and necessary business as this: if there was business of much importance that was not yet before the House, it was in the hands of committees, he thought there was now an opening for it. The bankruptcy system deserves immediate discussion. It was looked upon as important at the framing of the Constitution. He had heard the gentleman from South Carolina say, that it was taken up at the first Congress. He wished it to come before the House that he might judge of its merits. There appears to be an injunction for us to take it up. The States would then know how to frame their systems consistent with the general laws; he knew the State of Pennsylvania had a desire to adopt some uniform system on this subject, but seeing, on the Journals of this House, that it was in contemplation of the General Government, they impatiently waited the discussion of it, to frame theirs accordingly. It had been mentioned to that Assembly by the Governor in his last Speech, as an object much wanted. They only declined the business to wait for this House to do it. He hoped the House would at once say whether they meant to do anything or not, and thus relieve the States of that solicitude they had on the subject. With respect to its delay last session, he would observe, that business of perhaps greater importance almost constantly occupied the House to a late period.

Mr. W. SMITH could see no reason why this business should now come before the House; he thought there may not be time to settle it; he saw a great propriety of getting done with the business with all possible expedition, but other important business now presented itself. So long ago as the year 1789, he said, a committee was instructed to bring in a bill, which they reported in 1790. The very printing of reports of committees on this subject, from year to year, had cost a great deal of money, and now gentlemen wish it to cost another hundred dollars without any advantage. He was persuaded gentleman would find immense difficulty attending the subject to make it suit all capacities, perhaps much more than they might expect. If gentlemen can have any reasonable prospect of going through with the business, he wished it to be taken up, but he feared other concerns would intrude and render its postponement necessary.

The question was put, and lost—ayes 30, noes 40.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. MURRAY said, as the subject of kidnapping negroes had been brought up, he had a motion to make on the subject, with respect to fugitives from justice. He had mentioned the subject before. He thought if a sum of five hundred dollars was to be recoverable from persons employing such as had absconded from their masters, it would have a very good tendency.

[H. OF R.]

The evil complained of is, that the person employing a negro in this situation cannot be sufficiently proved to have done it designedly or not; the present law obliges the master to prove that the one who employs him had known that he was another person's property, and had runaway, before any damages can be recovered; this is extremely difficult to do. He should, therefore, propose the following resolution, in hopes by it a remedy would be provided, viz:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what, alterations are necessary in the act, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from their masters."

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter, with sundry documents, from the Commissioners at the Federal city, exhibiting a view of the receipts and expenditures of all the moneys intrusted to them; and, also, of the progress and state of the business, and of the funds under their administration, from May 17 to November 18, 1796; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. D. FOSTER, the Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of the proceedings of the accounting officers of the Treasury, upon certain claims which have not been admitted to be valid, laid before the House December 24, 1795, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order for to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 30.

THE CHICKASAW CLAIMS.

ALEXANDER D. ORR, from Kentucky, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. ANDREW JACKSON presented a petition of George Colbert, one of the chiefs and warriors of the Chickasaw nation of Indians, complaining of a non-performance of stipulations entered into in certain talks held with Governor Blount and other agents of the United States, in which they agreed in defensive support of each other's rights; that their nation was invaded by the red people, (the Creeks,) when they applied, according to Treaty, for aid; that their brother, James Robertson, said he had no orders to send them any assistance; and that he must first have orders from their father the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES. However, a detachment of volunteers under the command of Colonel Mansker, came to their aid. He asked compensation for supplies furnished to that detachment during sixty days. He said he had applied to his beloved friend the Secretary at War, who told him that Congress had set apart no money out of which it could be paid; he, therefore, applied to Congress for relief.

This petition was referred to the Committee of Claims.

HUGH LAWSON WHITE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the petition of Hugh Lawson White.

4th Con.—57

The resolution of Mr. ANDREW JACKSON having been read,

Mr. COIT called for the reading of the petition upon which the report was founded. It was read.

Mr. A. JACKSON said, the rations found for the troops on this expedition had already been paid for by the Secretary of War, and he could see no reasonable objection to the payment of the whole expense attending the expedition. As the troops were called out by a superior officer, they had no right to doubt his authority. Were a contrary doctrine admitted, it would strike at the very root of subordination. It would be saying to soldiers, "Before you obey the command of your superior officer, you have a right to inquire into the legality of the service upon which you are about to be employed, and, until you are satisfied, you may refuse to take the field." This, he believed, was a principle which could not be acted upon. General Sevier, Mr. J. said, was bound to obey the orders he received to undertake the expedition. The officers under him were also obliged to obey him. They went with full confidence that the United States would pay them, believing that they had appointed such officers as would not call them into the field without proper authority. If even the expedition had been unconstitutional (which he was far from believing) it ought not to affect the soldier, since he had no choice in the business, being obliged to obey his superior. Indeed, as the provisions had been paid for, and as the ration and pay-rolls were always considered a check upon each other, he hoped no objection would be made to the resolution which he had moved.

Mr. COIT said, he had called for the reading of the petition, because he could not see the connexion between it and the resolution under consideration. The petition prayed for recompense for the services of the petitioner, and the men under his command, and the proper resolution would be that the prayer of it ought or might not be granted; but, instead of this, the resolution before them went to the whole troops employed in General Sevier's expedition.

Mr. A. JACKSON said, by referring to the report it would be seen that the Secretary of War had stated, that to allow the prayer of this petition, would be to establish a principle that would apply to the whole of the militia in that expedition. If this petitioner's claim was a just one, therefore, the present decision ought to go to the whole, as it was unnecessary for every soldier employed in that expedition, to apply personally to that House for compensation.

Mr. RUTHERFORD observed, that the gentleman from Tennessee had set the matter in so fair a light that it was not necessary to say much more on the subject; but, as he had been acquainted with the frontier from his infancy, he would just give it as his opinion, that the expedition was a necessary one, and that the expense ought immediately to be paid. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be agreed to unanimously.

Mr. HARPER was not prepared to say, without more information than he had on the subject, that the measure was just and necessary, or the contrary. He felt disposed to think favorably of the expedition; but he thought the House should have further information before it came to any resolution on the subject. They had, it was true, a letter from General Smith, the then Secretary, but he thought this was not sufficient. He thought it would be better to refer the report and other papers to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into the necessity and propriety of the expedition, and report thereon. He hoped, therefore, the present resolution would be disagreed to, and the Committee would rise. He would then bring forward a resolution to that effect. The Secretary of War, he said, had not gone fully into the subject; he had given them copies of two letters, but not his opinion. He did not think that an expedition of so important a nature, and which must involve in it a very heavy expense, should be decided upon without further information.

Mr. CRAIK agreed in sentiment with the gentleman from South Carolina. [Mr. HARPER.] He said there was great difficulty in forming an opinion from the report itself; though the Secretary of War seemed to think the calling out the Militia necessary, there were other expressions in the report which appeared to convey a contrary sentiment. He referred to the letter of General Smith, but mentioned that there were other papers. He could not say the expedition was not necessary; but he thought further information was desirable, and the report should be committed to a select committee, for the purpose of gaining that information.

Mr. W. SMITH agreed with the two gentlemen last up, that further information was necessary. The question, he said, involved a number of important points. In the first place, a question was involved, whether, if the expedition was necessary, as it was not authorized by law, the expense ought to be defrayed by the United States? By the report of the Secretary of War, it appeared that Congress were well apprised of all the circumstances which rendered the expedition necessary, yet they did not think proper to authorize it. In the letter of the Secretary of War to Governor Blount, on the subject, was this passage:

"If those difficulties existed while the Congress were in session, and which, it was conceived, they alone were competent to remove, they recur, in the present case, with still greater force; for all the information received at the time Congress were in session, was laid before both Houses, but no order was taken thereon, nor any authority given to the President of the United States; of consequence his authority remains in the same situation it did on the commencement of the last session. It is, indeed, a serious question to plunge the nation into a war with the Southern tribes of Indians, supported as it is said they would be."

Mr. S. also read from the report "that the expedition was undertaken without authority," &c. The Secretary afterwards, indeed, stated, in his report, the disagreeable situation of the country at the time, by way of palliative; but, as Congress were possessed of these facts, and did not authorize offensive operations, it became a nice point to determine whether the expedition in question was justifiable. He would not say that such a situation of things might not occur, as would justify a measure of the kind, but it was of consequence to determine whether this was such a case, which could not be done hastily. Neither had the House any information of the magnitude of the expense, whether it would be two or three hundred thousand or half a million of dollars. He should, therefore, hope the Committee of the Whole would be discharged, and that the subject would be committed to a select committee.

Mr. MADISON saw no necessity for referring this subject to a select committee. If it was suggested that the official information which was before them was inaccurate, and that a more full explanation of the situation of things was necessary, there would be some ground of reference; but he did not find that this was the case. The Secretary of War stated facts, and referred to documents to prove "that the Indians had greatly perplexed and harassed, by thefts and murders, the frontier inhabitants of Tennessee, had shown themselves in considerable force, and killed at two stations fifteen persons." If this was a state of facts, and it could not be doubted, the words of the Constitution on this subject were clear: "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty on tonnage, keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." There could be no doubt, therefore, Mr. M. said, but this expedition came within the meaning of the Constitution. In many cases, he said, it was difficult to determine betwixt offensive and defensive operations, as it was sometimes necessary, when acting on the defensive, to use an offensive measure. He had no doubt on the subject, and thought the expense of the expedition should, by all means, be paid.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, that he was not prepared to adopt the resolution which was moved by the member from Tennessee, nor even to decide finally upon it, unless he could be persuaded that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] was correct in saying that the report before them contained all the information which it was possible for them to obtain. He was convinced that there were other official papers and documents which would throw additional light upon the subject, and, therefore, ought to be in possession of the Committee of the Whole before they took any decisive step. He alluded to the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, in December, 1792, which gave rise to lengthy discussion, with closed galleries, upon the measures that ought to be adopted in consequence of the hostile acts and threats of those very South-western Indians, who were the objects of the expedition for which they were called upon to pay. The House of Representatives then decided that they would neither declare war against those nations of Indians, nor authorize the PRESIDENT to carry an offensive expedition into their country, if, in the recess of Congress, he should deem it proper, in consequence of their continuance in hostility. As the acts of Congress upon this very application would operate in future as a precedent and a kind of commentary on that part of the Constitution which limited the instances in which a State might levy troops and act offensively, without the previous assent of the General Government, they could not, Mr. D. said, be too particular in their investigation, nor too strict in their reference to dates and facts. He hoped that the Committee of the Whole would be discharged, and the report of the Secretary of War referred to a select committee, whose duty it would be to report those facts, with their dates, which gave rise to the claim in question, and which justified, under the provision in the Constitution, the raising of troops and carrying on an offensive war, without the previous consent of Congress or approbation of the President.

Mr. NICHOLAS believed, on a reference to dates, it would be seen that these attacks of the Indians were subsequent to those which were in the knowledge of Congress at the time mentioned, as they took place while Governor Blount was at Philadelphia; and he thought no further information was necessary on the subject than the letter from General Smith to the Secretary of War, printed with the report, to prove that the expedition was both just and necessary. General Sevier's going into the Cherokee country was no proof that his operations were offensive. If other information could be obtained by referring the business to a select committee, he should have no objection; but he believed this would not be the case. He wished the letter of General Smith to be read. It was read accordingly.

Mr. BALDWIN was not able to recollect how great a portion of the members present were in the House when this business was brought before Congress in the year 1792. His own recollection was fresh upon the subject. It was a period when they were much alarmed for our Indian frontier, North and South. The North was fortified, and it was recommended to have a legion on the South. The gentleman from South Carolina, he recollected, was opposed to the measure, and thought the Executive had determined too soon upon hostility. Mr. B. said he had at that time frequent conversations with the then Secretary of War, who informed him that he had written to the Governor of Tennessee that, in case the pressure of the Indians was so great as to require it, he must call out the militia. The Governor was well known, and sufficient confidence was placed in him that this power would not be abused. He believed the troops on the Northern frontier had not proved sufficient, and that they had already paid the expense of troops which were called in to their assistance. At this period, Mr. B. said, the danger which threatened the country was great, and it was happy for us it had been so well got over. He believed it was well that the legion for the Southern frontier was not equipped, though he at that time thought it necessary. The expense of the expedition in question, he said, would be nothing compared with that which would have taken place had the legion contemplated been equipped. Mr. B. said, he had no doubt with respect to the propriety of paying the expense of this expedition. He did not think the number of men was great, or that the charge would be very heavy.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, he was inclined to believe the attacks of the Indians, which provoked the expedition of General Sevier, were subsequent to those in the knowledge of Congress at the time the subject was under discussion.

He was one of those, he said, who thought that the hostile dispositions shown by those Indians at that time called for force, and he had introduced a resolution, by means of his colleague, to that effect. It was not, therefore, that he did not think the expedition authorized, but because he had a desire to have the facts relative to the subject clearly stated, that he wished the business to be committed to a select committee.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, they were not particular about the manner of doing the business, provided it was done. He was confident the expense of the expedition ought to be paid. When the Indians were upon them, what could the Governor do? Was he to send forward to the Seat of Government to be instructed what to do? No; resistance was necessary, and it was not becoming in them now to say, "You did not act perfectly regular—the thing was not exactly as it should have been." It was a critical period, he said, and if the expenses were not paid, it might have a bad effect in future.

Mr. KITCHELL was in favor of the Committee rising. He remembered the transactions which took place on this business, as mentioned by his colleague, [Mr. DAYTON.] He said, he was one of those who voted against the proposition of using hostile means, because he thought it possible to ward off the evil. It had been warded off; but he believed there was sufficient ground for calling out General Sevier, and he doubted not, if the business was referred to a select committee, the result would be satisfactory to those gentlemen who brought forward the business.

The Committee rose, and leave not being granted to sit again, on motion, the report and papers accompanying it were referred to a select committee of Messrs. A. JACKSON, J. SMITH, BLOUNT, DENT, and HARPER.

SALARY OF REVENUE OFFICERS.

Mr. COIT said, that there had been several petitions from revenue officers for an increase of salary, part of which had been committed to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, and others to the Committee on Compensation; in order that the whole might go into the same hands, he proposed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire and report whether any, and if any, what, alterations ought to be made in the compensations allowed by law to the officers concerned in the collection of the revenue; and that the committee on the subject of compensation be discharged.

ed from the consideration of memorials from the revenue officers."

The resolution was agreed to.

DEBTS DUE FROM STATES.

Mr. W. SMITH then called for the order of the day relative to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the debts due from certain States to the United States, as reported by the Commissioners appointed to settle the accounts.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose and observed, that he did not imagine the resolution would have been called up so soon. It had been put on their desks but a few days, and he had been employed on committees every evening and morning since. However, he would make a few observations on the subject.

The resolution under consideration, said Mr. W., was a call on the debtor States for the payment of certain sums of money said to be due to the United States. The State which he had the honor to represent was one of this class. Did he believe it to be a debtor State, the last thing he would ask for would be a relinquishment of that debt; but being fully persuaded that, had a just and equitable settlement been made, or that the nature of the case would have admitted of it at the time it was made, the State of New York would have been a creditor State; and he trusted that he could clearly demonstrate, from arguments drawn from facts, that neither the mode adopted by which the Commissioners were to determine on the claims produced by the respective States, nor the rule of apportionment which they were directed to pursue, could in any manner operate to do that justice which the nature of the case required.

With respect to the mode adopted, it is enacted in the third section of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of all accounts between the United States and individual States." "That the Commissioners are to determine on all such claims as shall have accrued for the general or particular defence during the war, and on the evidence thereof, according to the principles of general equity, (although such claims may not be sanctioned by the resolves of Congress or supported by regular vouchers,) shall determine thereon." Had the words within the parenthesis been omitted, he asked, would the Penobscot expedition, or the frigate built in South Carolina, or a number of such like charges authorized by Congress, been admitted in the settlement? But, by being allowed, the States of Massachusetts and South Carolina are made creditor States. The creditor States have had their credits funded according to the act, but, not satisfied, they are now calling upon the debtor States to make payment—a payment which never could have been contemplated, especially in the manner now called for.

In the seventh section of the before-recited act, the creditor States should have their balances funded. This hath been done, but nothing is mentioned in this act, or any other, to authorize the call on the debtor States in the manner proposed. It is probable, said Mr. W., if it had been contemplated at that time, the act would not have passed.

With respect to the rule of apportionment which the Commissioners were directed by law to pursue, Mr. W. contended that it was impossible that any thing like public justice would be done, particularly in the State of New York; besides, said he, it was a departure from the rule laid down and established when the Articles of Confederation were agreed to, the eighth article of which is, "That all charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, should be defrayed out of the common Treasury, which should be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of lands within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon should be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint. The taxes for paying that proportion should be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislature of the several States within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled." And, therefore, said Mr. W., the act pointing out a different mode was a retrospective act, operating to the disadvantage of some of the States to the advantage of others; had this act been passed immediately at the close of the war, instead of being omitted until six years after the war, it would have operated equally; but no rule of apportionment could then be adopted without a manifest injury to some States, to whom thousands had emigrated from others. This was the case in the State of New York. One-third of the number of inhabitants of that State, when the enumeration was made, had moved into it after the close of the war from the New England States and the State of New Jersey, so that the numbers in those States were diminished, while that of New York was augmented. The mode of apportionment must, in consequence, operate unequally. Even since the settlement had taken place, some thousands of families had come into the State of New York from creditor States, and how could a determination be made? Or would it be just to compel those who had emigrated from creditor States into debtor States, to pay the proportion of the money said to be due from debtor States, whereas, by the settlement, had they remained in the creditor States, they would have been entitled to a proportion of the money due to them? Or, said he, is this resolution calculated to prevent emigration from one State to another?

Mr. W. observed, that attempts had been made to have the privilege of examining the principles of the settlement by the Commissioners, and the charges exhibited and allowed from the respective States, but it had been refused. If, said he, the creditor States were conscious of the settlement being proper, why this refusal? But, until this was done, could it be expected that the debtor States would submit to a settlement which they had every reason to believe was founded on erroneous charges exhibited to the Commissioners?

Debts due from States.

[H. OF R.]

With respect to New York, their advances had been such that the first calculators in the Union, who had been engaged in public business during the war, said that the State of New York must, on an equitable settlement, be a creditor State to the amount of two millions of dollars. Mr. W. said, he had been, from the commencement of the Revolution to the close of the war, either in a legislative or military capacity, excepting about one year, and he was confident that no more could be done than was done by the State of New York; and a State having done all they could do, it was not possible it could be a debtor State. And, said he, shall that State now suffer because it had exhibited fair and honorable accounts, such as the Commissioners observed were like merchant's accounts, and would stand the scruples of law, omitting many accounts which could not be exhibited in proper form, as the nature of the case would not admit of it unless by mere calculation? Adding to this the difficulties that State had to encounter, which ought also to be taken into view on a final settlement.

At the commencement of the war, said Mr. W., unfortunately for the State of New York, the one-half of its inhabitants were disaffected to the then measures, and a number actually took arms against those who were friendly to the Revolution, the suppression of whom, with a constant watch over them, were never brought into the general account. In the beginning of the year 1776, the enemy took New York, and with it nearly one-half of the valuable part of that State. In the year following, Burgoyne's army penetrated its frontiers, and laid waste the greater part of the country north and west of Albany. By the memorable battle of Orisko, upwards of three hundred widows and children were left to be supported by the State, as well as some hundreds at the north part of the State. These, together with the poor from the city of New York, were supported during the war, and no charges made thereof. The endeavors of the enemy to form a junction of their armies near the Hudson river was the cause of that State being so overrun that not one county escaped their ravages. Add to this, one-third of New York, the fine town of Esopus, and several hundred of houses in the frontiers were burnt, and immense property destroyed. For calamities so great, very few thought of obtaining vouchers, and for the destruction of armies no allowance would be made, which occasioned numbers to be reduced from affluence to want.

Large sums of money, said Mr. W., had been paid by the State of New York since the time limited for accounts to be exhibited for a settlement with the United States. The just debts exhibited by the calamities and the reasonableness of the excuse for their not having presented them sooner, operated with them so forcibly that they could not be withstood. Many accounts exhibited and not paid, will amount to upwards of one million of dollars, and probably as reasonable as some of these allowed to the other States by the Commissioners.

But, it will be said, had not other States suffered? Mr. W. said he would ask, what State? Was it any of the New England States? Where, said he, had they their capitals kept from them during the war? Where had they their frontiers overrun and destroyed? Where had they their country laid waste and destroyed? Was it not a fact, said he, that during the war the inhabitants of New York had to procure their salt from the New England States, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, which cost them, on an average, ten bushels of wheat for one of salt, and every other article in proportion? Add to this, they had from time to time taken from them all their grain, excepting what was scarcely sufficient to support their families, by acts of impress, and at a certain limited price, which was delivered for the use of the Army, and at a time when other States furnished supplies of a like kind, and were allowed more than double the price. I have known, said he, working oxen taken by the point of the bayonet from the farmer, and to this day not paid for; and will gentlemen say New York is a debtor State? He hoped not.

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped, when the sufferings of the citizens of the State of New York were only considered, when the vast destruction of their capital, and of their frontiers was taken into consideration, together with their situation during the war, he was persuaded that no more would be said respecting that State being a debtor State, and that such an odious stigma would be done away.

Did not, he said, the Commander-in-Chief observe in the most trying times, viz: in the year 1781, that if it were not for the exertions of the State of New York, and the supplies by them at that time furnished, he must have disbanded the Army? Did not one of the Commissioners, who settled the accounts, declare in this House (being a member at that time) that the debts of the debtor States ought to be done away? Was this not tacitly acknowledging that the accounts exhibited to them varied so much, that it was impossible for them, agreeably to the mode prescribed, to do equal justice? Add to this the charge made by some States for bounties, when that of New York could not exhibit the relative amount of a part of theirs, and others no bounty, when at the same time the classes as directed by law, raised the men by paying large sums for each unknown to the State.

Mr. W. concluded by saying, that since the war, the State of New York had always paid their specie requisitions, which, together with the like paid by Pennsylvania, was the chief support of Congress, until the Constitution or present system of Government took place, while some of the creditor States paid nothing; that, as the State of New York had done as much as their situation would permit them; had paid large sums of money since the war, which was borrowed to support, pay, and clothe their quota of troops; and many other matters of the kind, he hoped that the requ-lution would be negatived, and no more said on the subject.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought there was inquiry which was necessary to precede the present question. Some of the States which were brought in debtors by the Commissioners, might hold debts of the United States, and it would appear somewhat odd that they should be called upon for money, when, perhaps, they were really creditors. In such cases all that could be expected would be, that a balance should be struck. He therefore proposed a resolution, directing the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to inquire whether any of the States brought in debtor States by the Commissioners, were holders of debts of the United States? If they were, he said, the United States had the means of payment in their own hands. He should move that the Committee might rise, in order to bring forward this proposition.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he could not agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] nor was it necessary to say what measures would eventually be proper, in case of a refusal of payment, as that was not now the question.

The subject before them, he said, was a very delicate one, and ought to be treated with every degree of candor. He was glad that the gentleman from New York, had spoken upon the subject with a degree of temper and candor, which did him credit. The discussion was an unpleasant one, and could scarcely fail to excite a degree of irritation in the House, which, however, it would be desirable to avoid as much as possible. For many years, Mr. S. said, this subject had been under consideration, and it was much to be desired, that it could now be brought to a close. He knew no better mode of doing this than the one proposed, viz: that the debtor States should be informed of the sums with which they stood charged, and that payment should be requested in such a way as should prove most agreeable to them.

Mr. S. said, he should not follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] through the whole of his observations, because he did not think them relative to the subject before them. Some of them might have been properly enough suggested when the subject of balancing the accounts was before the House; he believed, indeed, they were brought forward at that time. He would mention some facts, relative to the business, with which perhaps some gentlemen might not be acquainted. In the year 1790, it seemed to be the general wish that an adjustment of debts and credits betwixt the General Government and individual States, with respect to the late war, should take place; that balances should be struck, and those States which were brought in debtors should pay, and those who were found to be creditors should receive what was reported to be just; and, in order to facilitate the business, a great deal of compromise took place, so that it was at length agreed upon with a good deal of unanimity. In order to give the States an opportunity of bringing forward all their claims, the Commissioners were invested with Chancery powers. After the business had gone through the Committee of the Whole, there was only one question which occasioned any discussion, and upon this the yeas and nays were taken; this was the ratio by which the States should be charged. On a motion to strike out this ratio, it was lost, 45 to 10, and, what was remarkable, one-half of the Representatives from the State of New York voted for the existing mode, and the other half for striking it out. [Mr. S. here read an extract from the Journals.] It did not at that time strike the members from that State, that the ratio adopted would injure them. Whether subsequent events had made it unfavorable to them or not, was not now the question, but whether those States which had been reported debtors should be called upon to pay what was due from them.

Mr. S. said, this business might be compared to an arbitration betwixt individuals, where full powers were given to the arbitrators; for after all that could be said about the exertions of individual States was brought forward, it was agreed to put the matter into the hands of three Commissioners to make an award. These Commissioners were bound, on oath, to do their duty faithfully. The award was made and accepted by Congress. Whatever objections were held against it, should have been made at that time before the award had been carried into effect. Any complaints now brought against the principles and mode of settlement, were overruled by that award, as all parties were bound to abide by the arbitration; they could not now come forward and say the principle was bad, and therefore object to pay.

The only question now was, which was the best way of completing the business? He thought the mode proposed was the best. It appeared, by the report of the committee, that the following were the debtor States, viz: New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina. The whole debt was $3,517,584, of which $2,740,000 was owing by New York. The interest of the debt, at 4 per cent. is, $844,211, which being added, made the whole $4,361,802.

In our present embarrassed situation, said Mr. S., this money would be very acceptable. In order to meet the demands of the public creditors, it was well known that recourse must necessarily be had to additional revenue. It would, therefore, be very desirable if these debts could be collected, as it would serve to lessen that sum which must otherwise be collected from the people. Or this money, he said, might be usefully employed in providing for the defence of the country, either by means of a Navy, increase of Armies, or otherwise. Indeed, there were many beneficial objects to which the money might be applied; and he doubted not, when the debtor States knew the situation of the United States, those who were able to pay, at least, would come forward like patriots and cheerfully pay the sums due from them, in such a way as should be most agreeable to themselves.

Mr. S. said, he should suppose that even the debtor States themselves would wish to have these accounts settled, as it must be unpleasant to them, when claims were made from them upon the United States, to be told, they were in debt to the Union. He remembered an instance in the last session, where this was the case with respect to New York.

The people of New York then applied to Congress to put their fortifications into a respectable state of defence; they were then told in this House that they owed money to the United States. This is a very unpleasant reflection. The settlement now desired would do away such disagreeable insinuations in future, and such reflections should stimulate them to take measures to forward the payment of that money. As to the State of New York, he should be the last person who would say any thing that would be disagreeable to that State, as it was a State of consequence in the Union, and entitled to every degree of respect; but gentlemen must know that the finances of that State were in the most flourishing condition—that they had abundance of wealth. [Mr. S. here enumerated an account of their riches.] When, he said, they contemplated the situation of other States, with debts upon their shoulders, to pay the interest of which, and for the support of their civil establishment, they were obliged to tax their citizens, he did not think New York would suffer much by paying the debt in question. The State of South Carolina, he said, was at present considerably in debt, both domestic and foreign, for the payment of the interest of which and their civil list, they were obliged to have recourse to direct taxation on their land, whilst the State of New York had no taxes at all, though he understood the Legislature had recommended a tax to be laid, in order to accustom the people to the payment of a tax.

The only question, Mr. S. said, was whether any material injury could arise from the application proposed to be made to the debtor States for payment. If they had any well-founded objections to the payment of the respective balances, they would of course make them; if not, they would doubtless propose some mode of payment. But, Mr. S. said, if it was the opinion of the House that these debts ought at once to be cancelled, let it be done. Something ought to be concluded upon in order to put an end to so unpleasant a business.

Mr. HARPER said, it was very easy to see, by the turn of the present debate, that no very amicable or fortunate issue would result from the demand they were about to make upon New York. He did not believe that State would be prevailed with to pay the demand in question, and he did not know of any means of coercing them to pay. He was always opposed to threats, when he was not able to strike, or to making a demand which he could not enforce. He had no doubt that the settlement was just and proper, and that this State was really indebted in the sum specified; but, if they disputed the debt and the mode of settlement, they could not force them to pay it. From these considerations, it was his opinion they ought not to make the demand at present. He would not cancel the debt, as, at some future period, they might go into negotiation on the subject. He wished to get rid of the business without a decision. He should therefore move that the Committee rise, and he would afterwards move that it be discharged from a further consideration of the subject.

Mr. CORT hoped the Committee would not rise. The gentleman from South Carolina seemed to think that a period might arrive when it would be proper to negotiate on the subject, but not at present. If the gentleman had stated any reason why he thought any future period would be more proper than the present for a settlement of the business, perhaps he might have concurred with him in opinion; but not having stated any, he was opposed to having the business postponed. The proposition, Mr. C. said, went no further than to ask the several debtor States, whether they would pay? and, until this question was put, they did not know but they were ready and willing to pay. He did not think this was the time to consider what measures should be taken provided the States did not pay. It ought not to be supposed they would refuse to do what was just. A number of the debtor States, indeed, might be considered as creditor States, since the money they owed, did not amount to so much as their share of the whole debt would be, provided it was not paid. [Mr. C. here compared the specific amount of the debts of different States with their share of the debt, to show that it would be their interest that the balances should be paid.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] as was common with persons over-zealous, had leaped before he came to the stile. The question was not now how the balances should be settled; that settlement had been made, and the payment of them was now the question. He hoped the Committee would not rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he did not expect to have heard the observations which had fallen from the gentleman last up; for his part, he was persuaded the Representatives of the debtor States could make calculations for themselves; but he hoped calculations with them was not the object; the justice and equity of the measure would, he trusted, be their guide. Mr. W. wished the gentleman from Connecticut to inquire whether some States had not paid their specie requisitions at about one-third of their value, whilst New York furnished them at the full value.

In answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. W. observed, that he was sensible aid was wanting to the revenue; but he hoped that because New York had funds, they were not to be taken from them, right or wrong. The gentleman was however mistaken in saying there were no taxes in that State. If he would examine the laws of New York, he would find the county and town expenses were raised by tax, and $45,000 annually besides. Mr. W. said, he had flattered himself that the gentleman from Carolina would not have brought forward this subject, as that State had been paid for the frigate built there unauthorized by Congress, which had been of no use to the United States, and the allowing that charge made them a creditor State. With respect to the funds of New York, he hoped they would remain with them as the fruit of industry and frugality. The gentleman had observed that one-half of the delegation from New York had voted for the rule of apportionment, that the Commissioners acted as arbitrators, and that the award was accepted. Mr. W. was of opinion the act and proceeding had thereon, was unauthorized by the Constitution of the United States, as it was a departure from the original contract, and that the State of New York had never accepted of the award, and was not bound thereby; and notwithstanding the gentleman asserted that the State ought not to come forward now and say we will not abide by the settlement, Mr. W. believed many awards had been set aside, and that this ought to be entirely done away.

Mr. CRAIK said, he should not have risen on the occasion, but from an observation which had fallen from the gentleman from Connecticut; he should also be for the Committee rising, and for the same reason as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] and not wish them to sit again on the subject; as this is the wrong time to stir up an alarm in the country, which, he feared, debating on this subject would have a tendency to do. He professed to be well acquainted with the disposition of the people of Maryland, and he knew it would create many disagreeable sensations. Nothing could possibly be gained by the measure, and it certainly would tend to expose our own weakness and inability to carry the demand into effect. They could not at this time promise themselves any good from opening this subject, but much alarm and disaffection may be fostered. He therefore hoped nothing more would be said on the subject.

Mr. DEARBORN said, he had no great objection to the Committee's rising, but a very strong objection to its being refused leave to sit again. The subject before them, he said, required full investigation. He did not doubt but the State of New York and other States would act like individuals in similar situations, viz: honestly and fairly. What had been said about the mode of settlement had nothing to do with the present question. The referees had settled the business according to mutual agreement; they had heard the parties, made the award, and execution was about to be issued. But, at this time, one of the parties came forward and objected to the mode of settlement. What, he asked, would be thought of an individual who should so act? He believed but very indifferently. Taking it for granted that the State of New York would act like an upright individual in the same circumstances, he had great hopes from the proposed application. Nor could he ever consent to tax his constituents until some mode was taken to collect these debts, as he thought them just. Indeed he conceived it to be a reflection on the debtor States to doubt on this subject; and to suppose the application would occasion uneasiness and discontent, was to impute an unworthy conduct to those States. He believed they would act as they ought, and if the money was not immediately paid, some compromise would take place. But, he said, it was not reasonable to suppose, that the people of Massachusetts, whilst $1,200,000 were due to them on this settlement, would consent to be taxed to pay their share of the debt, whilst other States were debtors, and were not called upon to pay the money which they had received out of the Treasury. If the Committee rose, therefore, he hoped it would have leave to sit again.

Mr. GILBERT was not disposed to vote for the Committee's rising at present and to be refused leave to sit again; he was surprised to hear gentlemen object to the principle being examined upon which the balances were settled. He thought no man could conscientiously say the settlement was a fair one; not a man on this floor would like to abide by such a result. When we see New York two or three millions of dollars in debt—more than all the other States put together, can it be supposed they will pay it? The report of the Commissioners say it is a just and bona fide debt; and gentlemen now say it is not how the settlement was made, it must be paid. What, said Mr. G., was there never a judgment reversed? Was there never an arbitration set aside? Certainly there had been. What evidence have we that there was not an egregiously mistaken principle in the parties who settled the accounts? Where is the subscription of the parties to the award? He hoped the Committee would rise, as it is too late to go into a view of the subject with the adequate degree of examination due to it; and that it would again be brought up for further discussion.

Mr. LIVINGSTON hoped the Committee would rise, and have leave to sit again. He was glad the subject was spoken of as being of a delicate nature, and hoped this idea would still be observed. In this view of the subject it ought to have a full and dispassionate discussion. He said he had much to say on the subject—more than the lateness of the hour would admit. He would throw out an idea or two for the gentlemen's consideration, that they may prepare an answer, and which may serve for discussion to-morrow. He would observe that he objected to the nature of the law, and the mode of its execution. The Government of the United States had no right to impose any demand upon the State of New York, except it had given its full consent to the settlement of the Commissioners. The Representatives from that State have no power given them to agree to that arbitration, nor can they without the approbation of their constituents. The Legislature have the sole power to allow it. He did not know of any authority the Representatives had to bind their State to pay debts. His next ground would be that, if the business was considered as an arbitration, they have the right, in cases of controversy, to set aside the award. Were they to be told that it was the interest of some of the debtor States that these balances should be paid? and with the same breath gentlemen say, it is no matter whether the settlement was made fairly or not. He did not expect to have heard such sentiments expressed. He would ask gentlemen, was the award given between individuals in all cases final? Were not the aggrieved party permitted to come into every Court of Justice under the sun to make an appeal? Yet they were told in that House, that the State of New York was bound to pay, whether the accounts were fairly settled or not! One gentleman had taken much pains to endeavor to prove it would be to the advantage of all the debtor States, except New York, that the debts should be paid, and another gentleman had detailed those advantages. No doubt it would be of much advantage if fifteen States were to throw all their debts upon the other one; but, would there be any justice or credit attending such conduct? The answer was natural. He did not wish to throw any reflections on the gentlemen who executed the trust of Commissioners to this settlement; they might have done the best they could; but certain it was that improper charges, to an immense amount, such as would not have been suffered in any Court of Justice, were brought in by the creditor States, which had turned the balance in their favor, and made them creditor instead of debtor States. He therefore hoped that, as these matters required further discussion, the Committee would rise and have leave to sit again.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, that he should have listened in silence to the gentlemen from New York, if they had contented themselves with declaring that they were unwilling to pay to the United States the debt which, upon a settlement of the accounts of the States had been awarded to be due from them. He should likewise, he said, have observed the same line of conduct, if those gentlemen had gone no further than to tell the House and the world that they were rich, and to boast that they were more prosperous than their neighbors; but when this their vaunting was accompanied with a manner, and expressed in a style calculated to cast a reproach upon all other States whose situation was not equally prosperous, he owned, that for his own part he could not passively permit the imputation to pass unnoticed. That the State which those gentlemen so happily represented was wealthier, far wealthier than his own, he meant not to contest or deny; but he would never admit, that it was ascribable, as had been said, to their superior industry. The Treasury of New Jersey was not, Mr. D. said, an overflowing one—their citizens were annually taxed to support their Government and to pay the interest and part of the principal of their debts. If they were comparatively poor, they were proportionably honest. They had never tarnished their reputation of good faith by refusing to acknowledge their just debts, nor avowed an unwillingness to discharge them as fast as their resources should enable them; they had never hastened to enrich the Treasury of the State by withholding from its creditors their just demands, nor sacrificed to the false pride of wealth the interests and claims of those who had trusted to their ability and confided in their justice.

Had the State, Mr. D. said, which he had the honor to represent, done otherwise, they too might probably have boasted of their ill-gotten wealth, more especially if to such an act they had added another not more meritorious, that of appropriating to their own exclusive use a mass of valuable property, the back or Crown lands, seized in the course of the late war from the common enemy, at the common expense, and with the joint forces of the Union.

Mr. D. said, he wished the Committee of the Whole to rise, but not for the purpose of discharging them from the further consideration of the subject. He hoped they would have leave to sit again and decide upon the resolutions that had been offered to them; for he seriously believed, that if ever they were to call upon the debtor States to pay what they owed to the Union, this was the proper season for doing it. Every week's delay, whilst it seemed to give new strength to the unwillingness of those States to discharge their balances, weakened the ability of the General Government to enforce them. If ever it was in the power of the United States to obtain those debts, it was now; Mr. D. therefore hoped that measures would now be taken to enforce a payment of them.

Mr. GILBERT thought the gentleman last up had rather misstated. He did not recollect that any imputation had been cast on New Jersey. He had not boasted on the opulence of New York, nor charged other States with being poor. Gentlemen, he said, took it for granted that the debt charged to the State of New York was a bona fide debt; they think it is bound in duty and conscience to pay what is settled upon it, but he thought this wrong. If gentlemen look to the war, no State had done more or suffered more than New York, and none could stand higher on the score of merit. It was said that some States had not the same advantages as others. But why should that gentleman look at that particular circumstance? Had not other States confiscated land, and got the pre-emption right to land, as well as New York? Had not Massachusetts shared a full part of all the right which New York claimed and obtained from the Indians? And had not New Jersey done the same? He thought such allusions foreign to the subject. Whether the debt was just or not, would require more time than the present lateness of the hour would allow to prove.

Mr. HOLLAND hoped, when this subject came forward to be investigated, it would have been conducted with temper and decorum—particularly from the moderation with which the two gentlemen [Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. SMITH] began it; but the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DAYTON,] remarkable for his attention to order, had implicated all the States reported to be debtor States, hoping that measures would be taken now to enforce payment. He hoped there was justice among those States, and that they would come forward and pay what was due. If they were certain the debt was just, Mr. H. said, they would without doubt come forward and pay—however, he knew North Carolina would. But, when it was generally believed that improper and fraudulent charges had been admitted by the Commissioners, was it not to be expected that there would be a desire in them to have a review of the settlement? He was confident whenever the debtor States should be convinced that the demands were just, they would open their funds and pay them, but not before.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) rose to give a short answer to the members from North Carolina and New York, who had commented upon his observations. The former gentleman had insinuated that those who advocated the motion had done it with intemperance, bordering on indecorum; but Mr. D. was happy to find that no expression of his had been pointed out which might be construed into a violation of the strictest rules of decorum and good order, unless, indeed, for him to say that certain States were debtors of the United States, and that they ought to be required to pay what they owed, could be liable to that construction. The member from New York had affected to misunderstand him, when he spoke of their having withheld from the other States and appropriated to their own use that immense mass of property which had been acquired in the course of the war with Great Britain and their allies from the savages, at the common expense, and by the common exertions of the forces of the United States. He supposed that every member who heard him must have known that he did not allude to petty confiscations, but to those vast tracts of land called vacant or Crown lands, in the conquest of which every regiment belonging to New Jersey, as well as to the other States, were employed. New York had been willing that the Union should participate with them in the expense and danger of the conquest; but, after it was effected, they had refused any share of the benefits; and thus, by means of this and other spoils, had acquired an overflowing Treasury.

Mr. GILBERT said it would seem, by the observations of the gentleman from New Jersey, that the conduct of the State of New York was singular with respect to their having sold their vacant lands. He would ask if there was a State in the Union which had vacant land which had not done the same thing? Had any such State shared its land with the Union? Certainly not; and he could see no propriety in the charge against New York.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to observe, in reference to what had fallen from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LIVINGSTON,] respecting that State not being bound by the decision of Commissioners, because the State had not consented to the settlement. He would remark that, besides the co-operation of the Representatives of that State, they appointed an agent to bring forward their claims, which certainly showed their acquiescence to the proceeding. Mr. S. said he was surprised to hear gentlemen dwell so much upon the injustice of the proceedings of the Commissioners, and upon the improper claims admitted, since he did not know how they could have come at their knowledge on the subject, since those proceedings had never been made public. With respect to the unfortunate frigate which had been alluded to by the gentleman from New York, he could say that the State of South Carolina was then paying for that frigate, and that it was not charged to the United States as had been insinuated.

The Committee rose, and, on leave being asked to sit again—

Mr. HARPER hoped leave would not be given to sit again. He could not possibly contemplate a time when it would be expedient to renew this demand; at the same time he would declare himself opposed to anything like a relinquishment of these claims. However, he would not again go over his reasons for the Committee's being discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. BALDWIN replied upon it, that leave would be given for the Committee to sit again. It would be in fact to pursue the idea which the gentleman himself had lately expressed. The resolution under consideration is commencing the negotiation with the States which he had recommended. Mr. B. expressed great confidence that nothing would be necessary but to commence this negotiation, and that the States would at least discover a satisfactory disposition. If it was true, as had been contended by some members, that the general Board of Commissioners had conducted the business badly, or that they were wicked or corrupted: or if it should be thought by the States that they had proved themselves unequal to the work, as some seemed to suppose, which would set aside their award, the sooner it is known the better, that measures may be taken to form a new Board, and begin the matter anew. He persuaded himself, when they communicated with the States, it would be found there was not one which would desire such a measure. When he recalled the recollection of the manner in which the whole war had been carried on, without any rule of apportionment or any settlement of accounts between the States, and the ill-humor which had grown out of it, constantly aggravated by the yearly calls on the States for moneys to support the old Union, he was sure that no person who was a witness to the transactions of those times would have a wish to see them repeated. The amount was so great, and the whole so perplexed, as well as irritating, that the friends to the peace and union of the country have perhaps never experienced so critical and anxious a period. The Delegates used to bring forward their own State's claims, warmed by local zeal and private interest, and the Councils of the Union were for years agitated by the violence and passions of parties settling their old disputed accounts. Experience seemed to have convinced everybody that no settlement could ever be made in that way; that some persons must be clothed with the character of Judges, and the whole put over into their hands.

In October, 1786, the ordinance for this purpose first passed. He believed it would be found by the Journal that it passed unanimously. He had never himself been witness to any public measure which seemed to take off such a pressure from the mind of every one, or which was received with such enthusiasm. The measure was so popular and satisfactory that it was thought expedient the next year to extend the provisions, and give larger powers of Chancery to the General Board. The final ordinance on this subject was then passed. He believed it would be found in the Journal about May 6, 1787, and that this was also unanimous. After the formation of the Government, under the present Constitution, the same disposition continued, and the act just read by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was passed. If he mistook not, this was also without opposition.

These things, said he, are not unknown in the several States; the men who were concerned in these times and events are not all dead. He believed, when they should communicate with the different State Legislatures, these men would not be backward to show themselves, and to show that they were still of the same mind, and faithful to their engagements. Though some individuals in this House appear to be quite fresh on the subject, as if they had made new discoveries, and seem disposed to begin anew, and say all they know about South Carolina frigate, Penobscot expedition, sea-coast guards, military bounties, rule of quoting, &c., which had been for months, and almost for years, the subjects of general scramble—he had no apprehension there would be found in the States any disposition to revive those disgraceful scenes. However, if the States choose to go over the business again, the sooner it is known the better. This can only be done by writing to them as the present resolution proposes. If they mean to abide by the present settlement, and yet state inconveniences in complying with it, they who had served most with him knew he had not often been an advocate for intemperance in public measures. He should not forbear to mention that there was one part of the subject which gave to him the most unpleasant sensations, and that was, where a State had, in a manner which he thought was not to be justified, obtained an advantage from our Treasury of certificates to the amount of one million two hundred thousand dollars, in the assumption, before the settlement of the accounts, upon a false presumption that we were indebted to them, when at the same time they were indebted to us a million of dollars. He should never believe, till he had seen the attempt made, that they could be reluctant in returning to our Treasury one million two hundred thousand dollars, in certificates, which had in fact been advanced to them by mistake; or that they could expect, in such circumstances, the other States to submit to a direct tax to raise money to pay them a quarterly interest on those certificates.

Mr. LIVINGSTON could not permit it to go out to the world, in the account of this day's debates, that he, or any of his colleagues, had made use of such expressions as charging the Commissioners with being wicked or corrupt, or with being bribed. Such expressions had neither fallen from him nor his colleagues. He had the highest respect for one of them, who was since dead; but still, he believed, men with the best intentions might have admitted improper charges to an immense amount. Indeed, it was impossible that three men, in their closets in Philadelphia, should be able to form a just estimate of the debts of the different States. However, if the Committee have leave to sit again, and, if it were determined that the States should be called upon for the balances, he should bring forward a resolution to this effect, and show the grounds upon which his suspicions were founded.

The Committee had leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 2, 1797.

JOHN MARE DE BORD.

Mr. SWANWICK presented a petition of John Mare de Bord. This was a French gentleman, who had served during the late war in the American Army. Being possessed of immense property in Hispaniola, he did not, at the end of the war, ask for his pay. Being, in the late insurrection in that Island, burned out of his whole property, he came here and applied for the money due to him, in a petition to the House of Representatives. This was during the last session. The Committee of Claims, on his producing a proper attestation of his service, were going to pay his demand. At least, he understood that they designed to do so; yet, it is possible, that he may have mistaken their intention. While matters were in this train, Mr. de Bord told the Committee of Claims that he had, at one time, received, in part of his pay, one hundred dollars from Major Haversham, then in the Continental Army, and now in Georgia. This partial payment he meant as a matter of fair dealing, but Mr. TRACY, chairman of the committee, saw the circumstance in an opposite light. He conceived that if part had been paid, it was likely that the whole might have been so. He, on that account, refused to let the petitioner get the money till an attested account should be obtained from Major Haversham. The petitioner has been at the expense and trouble of obtaining this account properly certified, and he now came forward in a second petition to Congress for the balance proved to be due to him.

Mr. PARKER made an objection to this petition on account of its being indecorously worded, in having made use of the name of the Chairman of the late Committee of Claims [Mr. TRACY] instead of the committee, when speaking of the fate of his former petition. Mr. P. said it might appear to convey some reflection on the conduct of Mr. TRACY, which ought, by all means, to be avoided; he hoped, therefore, however just, it would be better worded before it was received.

Mr. SWANWICK spoke highly of the merits of this petitioner, who, he said, from a pure patriotism and a love of liberty, had fought in the American cause during the late war—for which service he never intended to have made a charge—but having afterwards gone to the West Indies, and being one of the sufferers at St. Domingo, by which he was reduced to distress and beggary, he had made a claim upon the United States for his services. Mr. S. believed he was now kept by a farmer somewhere in the country, in consideration of his past services; and, as to any informality of his petition, he believed it arose from ignorance of the forms required, (being a Frenchman,) and not from any intention to offend the Legislature of a country, which he termed in the conclusion of his petition, the freest and happiest in the world.

Mr. PARKER said, he should be extremely loth to withhold justice from any petitioner, but he hoped the gentleman would withdraw the petition, and only for the reason he had before assigned.

Mr. W. LYMAN was very sorry the wording of it, from so trifling a deviation, should make the petition objectionable. He did not see it at all offensive, as there was good testimony no harm or insult was meant, and it was owing entirely to the gentleman's ignorance of the rules.

Mr. MACON said, it had been determined against at a former session, and that, in addition to the other objection, he thought, ought to operate against receiving it. Although this proposed to produce an account current which had not been produced before, yet, he wondered that it had not come before the Committee last session, when the gentleman himself was before the committee. This petition was also barred by the statute of limitation, and therefore it ought not to be received. There was scarcely a case, Mr. M. said, but was continually coming before the House, time after time, although reported against as barred by that act. It was impossible to get through business, if this practice was allowed. He said the claims of their own citizens were rejected for that reason, and except some new evidence can be produced, it ought to operate against their admission.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the case ought not to be prejudged, but some feeling ought to be exercised towards a man who had hazarded his life in our service, and is now under such reduced circumstances.

Mr. THATCHER said, it appeared to him, that this trifling objection, of its not being exactly worded according to the will of the House, especially when the circumstances of the gentleman are considered, should not obtain to prevent its being heard. It appeared to him, the objections which had been raised bore a disrespectful appearance. But it did not seem there was any such intent in the petitioner. He was of the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that neither that nor its having been before the Committee of Claims should prevent its being received. It appears there are new proofs to offer which he did not, or could not offer before. He wished the gentleman would withdraw his opposition.

The question was then put, "Shall it be referred to the Committee of Claims?" Twenty members only rising in the affirmative, it was not carried.

TREATY WITH ALGIERS.

Mr. PARKER called up the resolution which, some days ago, was laid on the table, relative to a call upon the PRESIDENT for information with respect to the Treaty with the Dey and Regency of Algiers. Mr. P. said, he found in the PRESIDENT'S

Address, at the opening of the session, this paragraph:

"After many delays and disappointments, arising out of the European war, the final arrangements for the fulfilling of the engagements made to the Dey and Regency of Algiers, will, in all present appearance, be crowned with success, but under great, though inevitable disadvantages in the pecuniary transactions, occasioned by that war, which will render a further provision necessary."

Under these circumstances, it was not only proper to know what further Legislative measures were necessary, but also to learn what steps had been taken for carrying into effect the Treaty with the Dey and Regency of Algiers. It was last year, he said, ratified by the PRESIDENT and Senate, and that House had passed the necessary appropriations, and he was sorry that any delay had taken place in carrying it into effect, as he understood some of the prisoners had died between the period of ratification and that of the release of the citizens held in slavery. Some difficulties had arisen, it seemed, with which they were not acquainted, and therefore he had brought forward the present resolution, not doubting that the PRESIDENT would readily give the information required.

Mr. SITGREAVES suggested whether it would not be proper to wait until they received from the PRESIDENT the communications which they had reason to expect from his Speech. It was certain they should receive information from the proper department in due time. The PRESIDENT had said, that further appropriations would be necessary, and, of course, information would be given them on the subject. When this information should be communicated, if it should not be so complete as to satisfy the curiosity of the mover of this resolution, he might lay a resolution upon the table, calling for further particulars. But, in the mean time, he thought it most proper to receive the communication which they every day expected. He had no objection to the resolution itself; he only thought it would be more respectful to the PRESIDENT to wait a few days for the information desired, than to ask for it.

Mr. PARKER wished not to fail in respect to the Chief Magistrate; but as large sums of money had been appropriated to carry the Treaty into effect, and yet, for some cause or other with which they were not acquainted, the business had not been completed, it became important to have some information on the subject. There was great anxiety, he said, in the minds of merchants trading to the Mediterranean, to know the state of this affair. He thought, therefore, they ought to obtain it as soon as possible. It was from respect to the PRESIDENT that he had not called up the resolution before that time. If the inquiry was longer delayed, he thought the House would be wanting in duty to their constituents. After the resolution was passed, he should not be for pressing the subject more than other gentlemen.

Mr. CRAIK said, he did not know that there was such a resolution on the table till then; but even from the mover's own confession, he did not see any use in the measure, as he had said he did not mean to press the matter after the resolution should have passed. The PRESIDENT had told them at the opening of the session that more money would be wanted, owing to some embarrassment having taken place; it was therefore to be expected that he would give them every necessary information on the subject; but, if they entered into the present resolution, it would be tacitly charging the PRESIDENT with neglect. The subject, Mr. C. said, was not particularly pressing, and, as they had much other business on hand, and as he doubted not, they should have the information in due time, he should be opposed to the resolution.

Mr. GALLATIN wished a clause in the law passed March 20, 1794, on intercourse with foreign nations, to be read—he believed it was expressed in general terms. [It was read, and proved to be so.] The PRESIDENT in his Speech, when he alludes to this subject, said Mr. G., only says that “final arrangements for fulfilling the engagements made to the Dey and Regency of Algiers,” &c., and concludes with, “measures are in operation for effecting Treaties with the Regencies of Tunis and Tripoli.” And it was perfectly clear that, if measures had not succeeded with the latter Powers, there was a sufficient sum appropriated to carry into effect the Treaty with Algiers; because there was not only appropriated the money for carrying that Treaty into effect, but also an additional sum of two hundred thousand dollars for both objects. He did not know, therefore, whether they should receive any information on this subject, except it was called for. Mr. G. said, they had already received an estimate of the expenses for the year 1797, and, although there were several items relative to foreign intercourse, there was not a single thing about an appropriation for the Algerine business. He thought, therefore, though sums might be wanted for effecting Treaties with Tunis and Tripoli, the appropriation would be wanted next year, and not this, and therefore there would be money enough now for Algiers. The only question was, whether it was their duty to ask for the information contained in the resolution? he believed it was, especially when they were told there had been great pecuniary losses, they certainly had a right to know what they were. The proposition, he said, did not ask for information how the Treaty had been completed, but how the money had been disposed of. This was information they had a right to have, in order to form a judgment whether these losses might have been avoided or not; and, as he believed they should not have the information except it was asked for, he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. GILBERT did not doubt but the House would get the information upon this subject as soon as possible; and he doubted whether it would come one moment the sooner for the resolution; for the PRESIDENT had promised it in his Speech. He therefore supposed it was now hastening as fast as it could; and he did not know why the House should precipitate the PRESIDENT on the subject.

He wished the House to wait a few days, until, in the ordinary course of time, there was reason to expect it; if it did not then come, he should vote for it, not but he thought it was that very moment preparing with all speed to be laid before the House; but, at present, he should vote against it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, gentlemen seemed to take it for granted, that the PRESIDENT meant to communicate to them information on the subject of the Treaty with the Dey and Regency of Algiers. He did not find this in the PRESIDENT's Address; he found only a kind of excuse that the Treaty had not been carried into effect. He did not say he would communicate what was the immediate occasion of the delay. It was the duty of the House, in a two-fold point of view, to call for this information; first, that they might provide the necessary fund, and secondly, to know what had been the cause of the great delay. The appropriations for carrying the Treaty into effect had been long since made, and unless circumstances unavoidable, and urgency very cogent, had taken place, he could not help thinking there must have been a fault in some department or other. From the usual promptness of the PRESIDENT, it was not to be presumed the delay was with him; but he believed it might be presumed there was a delinquency somewhere. It was not enough for them to be told that the delay arose from unavoidable circumstances; it was their duty to look into the business, and therefore he thought the present call a very proper one.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILBERT] seemed to think they might wait a few days for the information wanted. Mr. S. said, they had already waited for a month, and nothing was yet brought forward. Their session was limited, and it was important that the business to which the resolution before them related, should be speedily taken into consideration. It was very important as it respected commerce, which was never in a more critical situation than at present. It was high time to go into an inquiry on this subject, in order to know the train in which the business was placed, and to what the delays had been owing. He believed they had been owing to the derangements of money transactions in Europe; but of this they ought to be informed; and, if there was any charge to be made against that House on the occasion, it was for having delayed the inquiry so long.

Mr. GILBERT said, the gentleman last up seemed to speak as if the House had nothing to do, and were waiting for business from the PRESIDENT. He said there were various objects of great importance to the United States, which called for their attention; and as he had before said, a short time would probably bring the information without application; and as they did not know that it was unnecessarily retarded, there was no use in passing the present resolution.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, gentlemen who supported this motion, spoke as if the right of the House had been disputed to make the inquiry. He had not heard this doubted. The only reason for opposing it was, that it was unnecessary, and less respectful than it would be to wait for the communication. The PRESIDENT had said, that a further appropriation was necessary this session, and he thought this was a sufficient answer to his colleague [Mr. GALLATIN] and not next session, and therefore, he presumed, he would take care, at a convenient season, the necessary information was laid before them. He would not call upon them to make appropriations without showing both the necessity and the quantity required. He had already said there could be no question about their right of calling for the information in question; but he would not be understood to presume, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LIVINGSTON] that there was a delinquency somewhere; if this were presumed, it would be directly in opposition to the assertion of the PRESIDENT, who had told them the circumstances of delay, &c., had been inevitable. Upon what principle, therefore, gentlemen should conceive there had been a delinquency somewhere, he could not see. He was therefore opposed to the resolution.

The question was put and carried—ayes 44, noes 31.

Mr. PARKER and Mr. GROVE were appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT with the resolution.

KIDNAPPING NEGROES.

Mr. SWANWICK moved, that the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, on the subject of kidnapping negroes and mulattoes, should be recommitted to that committee, with instructions to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion, the question was divided, "Shall the report be recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures?" Carried.

"And that they report by bill or otherwise." Ayes 44. Carried.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. MURRAY said, he had laid a resolution upon the table on a subject somewhat connected with the one just disposed of, which he wished to call up. It was for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the propriety of amending the act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters.

The resolution was agreed to, and a committee was appointed of Messrs. MURRAY, COOPER, and KITTERA.

BALANCES DUE BY STATES.

The order of the day was next called for on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the balances due from individual States to the United States. The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on that subject, when

Mr. COOPER said he had no expectation when this business was first brought forward, that he should have taken any part in the debate that might arise on the mode of dunning the State of New York for a balance of about two millions of dollars said to be due the United States. Yet, when he heard a gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CORR] seem to pride himself that a settlement had been made and our State found in debt, and treating our complaints of errors in that settlement as laughable or childish: when he heard a gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] declare, in a serious tone of voice, that no consideration would ever induce him to relinquish that claim; although errors may have existed, although frauds may have been introduced, although we may have many large and just demands not brought forward at the time of settlement; notwithstanding all this, it seems the gentleman's ears are shut to our complaints. When he heard a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] bring forward a resolution to sequester, or in milder words, withhold the stock which the State of New York has in the funds of the United States; when he heard a gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BALDWIN] who had been on the floor of Congress almost from the beginning; when he had heard that gentleman, with all his experience in the money concerns of the nation, declare, that the United States was always considered indebted to the State of New York until the settlement was made, and by this declaration bringing into view high-toned evidence that errors did exist against us in that settlement; for I contend, said Mr. C., that men and Governments always have a pretty correct idea of their general concerns—to hear all this and be silent, would be criminal: yet to argue on the subject, seemed to be of little use; for, when we look the United States in the face, and demand of them neither more nor less than substantial justice; when we complain that egregious errors exist in the general settlement; when we state that many just charges of large amount were not brought forward; when we state that large quantities of wheat were delivered by our State to the Armies of the United States at the depressed price of one dollar per bushel, according to a price-limiting statute of our State, existing at that time, and certificates issued by the officers for this less than quarter price; when we state that some other States received certificates at five dollars per bushel for their quotas of wheat, and that those certificates counted on their face at the time of liquidation and settlement with ours; when we state that powder-houses were erected at the expense of our State, and the proceeds turned into the magazines of the United States, and the charges never brought in at the general settlement; when we complain of these hardships, what answer do we receive? Why, from Connecticut, the sentiment is had; we do not understand you; from Massachusetts, a still more disagreeable tone, even a sort of intimation that we are quibblers; from New Jersey, a solid declaration that no consideration ought to diminish or dismiss this demand—giving our complaints to the wind without a hearing; from Virginia, a still more tough pill, even an attempt to sequester our stock. And why, or for what cause are we thus roughly handled? Is it because our Government, in order to keep up the Armies of the United States, gave a bounty of six hundred acres of land to such as would serve three years? Is it because our seaports were in the hands of the enemy during the whole war, our towns consumed with fire, and our merchants driven to the mountains? Is it because our frontiers were overrun with white men from Canada and savages from the wilderness? our flourishing villages laid waste and the inhabitants carried into savage captivity? is it because our middle counties bore the burden of being the seat of our own armies for several years? or, is it because the revenue which our State produces to the Union, is not more than a quarter of the whole revenue of the United States, that several States whose revenue to the Union is next to nothing, are so deaf to our complaints of errors and hardships on our part in that settlement?

What opinion, said Mr. C., should we have of a merchant, who should refuse to correct an error of great amount in a settlement made with his fellow-merchant, but should plead the settlement, and thus hold what he had got by a mistake or by a trick? Why, this would be his true character—that the man who is only bound by the law, would do any unjust thing were it not for the law: yea, he would, if you please, pick pockets, were it not for the penalty that follows.

An honest man is never afraid to have his charges examined again and again, knowing that the more the truth is rubbed, the brighter it shines. If the charge of the United States against our State is a just one, it will not be the less so for a new hearing. I again repeat it, what individual would refuse a re-examination of his accounts, if stared in the face by a fellow-trader, stating that he had obtained the greater part of his wealth by an error in settlement? No man would, no man dare. The frowns of society would prostrate him forever were he to attempt it, and more especially if the person of whom he had taken this advantage, was a man of good fame and of equal standing with himself. And, in this point of view, I contend that the State of New York is of sufficient responsibility in the Union; and of such reputation as to her accounts, as to have a fair claim on the United States, that an order may be had for a new hearing.

We further complain bitterly of the rule under which this settlement took place.

In short, said he, if it is honorable, if it is dignified, for the United States to refuse us a rehearing, or attempt to sequester our stock, it is not less honorable, it is not less dignified for our State to sell and transfer their stock in the public fund, and withhold payment of the same until the errors which exist against us can be corrected.

I shall be asked, said he, how this can be done? On which subject I beg leave to advance a thought that hath struck my mind as a thing that would be satisfactory to our State, and no more than substantially honorable and just on the part of the United States; which idea I shall cast before the Committee, to the end that if the measure now before the Committee should prove insufficient, something on its basis may be adopted; that is, that three Commissioners be vested with full power from the United States, to join three Commissioners from our State, with like power. Let them hear and determine whether any, and if any, how much we are in debt to the Union? I have no doubt such a measure would be satisfactory to our Legislature, and I believe, if found in debt, they would make arrangements for payment. Should Congress refuse a rehearing of the just complaints of that settlement, as it relates to our State, which is entitled to this sort of tender dealing, I shall be for no provision being made to pay the demand. On the other hand, should Congress offer this reasonable and fair thing of a rehearing, and our State refuse or neglect to act, I shall be greatly disappointed in their attachment to the General Government, which I am sure is firm and of a durable nature.

Mr. HAVENS said, when these resolutions were first proposed, he did not think them very exceptionable, being brought forward on the plausible ground of giving information to the different States of the sums in which they stood indebted; but, if his information was right, notification had already been made to the different States of the amount of the balances found against them; and, therefore, these resolutions, could only be looked upon as leading to something further, even to compulsory means being used to obtain a settlement. In this point of view, though the resolutions contained nothing directly objectionable, they became so, and it behooved the Representatives of New York to oppose them.

Though, Mr. H. said, he was not authorized to say what was the opinion of the Legislature of New York of the settlement in question, amongst the most enlightened citizens of that State, he knew it was considered not only as unjust as to principle, but very greatly erroneous, and highly injurious to that State. He thought it probable that this was the opinion of the Legislature also; and substantial justice required that any error in any account should be rectified; at least, that the party who thought there was an error, should be satisfied. If the State of New York was satisfied with respect to the debt in question, he had no doubt it would be paid.

With a view of putting the business into a less objectionable form, he would propose an amendment, viz: after "earnest request," "that if they (the said States) or any of them, object to the principle upon which the balances have been made, they will make known their objections to the Government of the United States; but if no objection, that they will cause provision to be made," &c. Mr. H. said, he could see no objection which could be reasonably made to this amendment. If the State of New York had any objections to the settlement, they would of course appoint an agent to inquire into the mode in which the accounts had been settled; this inquiry would produce satisfaction, and whatever was found to be the balance, it would be cheerfully paid; but if this amendment were not agreed to, he said there might be embarrassments thrown in the way—embarrassments which might prove insurmountable.

It had been remarked, Mr. H. said, that this was a kind of arbitration, and that the award was final. He never understood it in that point of light. If the business had assumed the face of an arbitration, it would have been settled in a public manner. An agent would not only have been appointed to bring in their own claims, but also to have examined those of others. But the business had been settled, rather in a private manner than otherwise. The books had been kept from view. If there had been no irregularity in the settlement, he could see no objection to its being laid before the United States at large. He had always understood there was some reason for keeping the accounts from public inspection, and it appeared somewhat strange. It looked as if there had been some errors committed which it were improper to show to the people of the United States. At any rate such ideas had prevailed; they had at least prevailed in the State of New York. For these reasons, he trusted, the amendment would not be objected to.

Mr. HENDERSON hoped the amendment would not prevail. It looked like inviting objections, at a time when there was no proof that any objections existed to the payment of the balances in question. It was allowed by the opposers of the report before them, that, at some period, it would be proper to enter into a negotiation with the debtor States. He thought there could be no better time than the present, nor any better mode than that prescribed by the resolutions before them.

Mr. KITCHELL said, it seemed to him as if the amendment was introduced for the purpose of giving the State of New York an opportunity to make apologies for not doing what justice and honor required of them; and supposed that the balance was to be drawn, and then kicked out of doors. It was very extraordinary that New York, having been notified upwards of two years of this debt, they would now require them to give some plea in justification of their conduct.

The gentleman up some time ago [Mr. COOPER] had painted the situation of that State during the war in very strong colors. Mr. K. said, they had most of them been acquainted with New York and other States during that period, and he thought it might be well known that other States did as much, and suffered as much. New Jersey had equal reason to complain of suffering, and, perhaps boast of doing, with that State. But while that gentleman boasted of what New York had done, Mr. K. would speak of what New Jersey had not done. New Jersey had not spent her time during the war in arranging her accounts, instead of being active in the cause of the country. She did not sit down supine and easy at the end of the war, and not care about her debt; but she taxed her own citizens heavily to settle those accounts. She did not take her accounts and put them into the hands of A, B, and C, meanwhile neglecting to pay her just debts, by which she happened not to be a debtor State. She did not, at the close of the war, obtain any money unjustly from the Treasury of the United States; nor did she come forward and seize on lands won by freemen from tyrants; she did not impose taxes on neighboring States to the amount of fifty or an hundred thousand dollars per annum. No. But she had everything to fear, and everything to suffer, as much as New York. The House only called them to come forward to do what was just and right. We only ask them, said Mr. K., to come forward to pay what was awarded as justly due from them. As to the method of the payment, that is not specified; if they think this or that is the best manner to do it, let them come forward and state it; but if they refuse to settle it, they must be made. Let them state their objections themselves; he presumed they had not delegated their Representatives to come to that House and object to the payment of their debts. No. They were sent there for the good of the Union, to attend to Legislative business, and he thought they ought not to have interfered in this business without a delegated power. He should object to the amendment; but as to the resolution, he hoped it would pass in its first form; and when passed, New York could come forward and state any objection they may have, and then proper justice would doubtless be done.

Mr. HAVENS said, the gentleman from Jersey had been telling the House of what that State had not done, but he may with propriety be reminded of what it had done. Did not the gentleman recollect when that State laid a very heavy tax on the light-house at Sandyhook; he would ask him what principle that was from? Mr. H. would not have mentioned this, but as the gentleman had been boasting about the good conduct of the State he represented, he could not refrain. He said, he despised anything like advocacy on State merits or degradation on State evils; he thought such things had an unfavorable aspect to other parts of the Union. He therefore wished it had been avoided, but since it had been brought up, it could not well be left. That gentleman said the State of Jersey had not engrossed the back lands: he would ask him whether it was not because they never had it in their power? They could not get at them, but wherever it lay in their jurisdiction, Mr. H. was persuaded, they would have done it. However the tax on the light-house could well be remembered, if nothing else.

Mr. KITCHELL said, he did not mean to reflect on the State of New York. He intended only to refer to what had been said about the industry and wealth of that State at the expense of all the other States. With respect to the tax laid upon the light-house, he would ask whether the State of New York had not laid taxes upon every shallop and boat which passed from New Jersey to that State?

Mr. SWANWICK said, it was of little importance to the House what taxes had been laid by the State of New York or New Jersey. He hoped the amendment would not pass, because it would seem as if they themselves doubted the justice of the debt. If they had objections to the demand, they would state them, without any provision for the purpose.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, he should confine his observations to the amendment, as that was under consideration. When the general resolution was under debate, it was objected by the Representatives from the State of New York, that she could not be bound to pay the balance in question, because she had not given her consent as a State to the law for apportioning the mode of settlement; but now they were told they must wait till that State make objections; that the Delegates in that House had no right to object to it, yet the State was to be bound by this settlement, which was made according to a law passed by the Delegates of that State in common with others. But if the Delegates had not a right (which was his own opinion) to object to the justness of the debt, they had certainly no right to frame the law originally, and then the resolution was wholly out of the question.

JANUARY, 1797.]

Debts due from States.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. L. said, he did not think the amendment of his colleague invited objection. The friends of the resolution told them, that the application was made to know, whether it was agreeable to the States to pay the money or not? Now the amendment made the explanation what they said it was, but what appeared to the Delegates from New York doubtful. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would prevail. If it should not, it would cause what gentlemen seemed to wish to avoid, delay; because, if it was negatived, he should think it his duty to call for some delay, before the House agreed to pass the resolution before them. He therefore hoped, if gentlemen wished for celerity, or consistency with their own arguments, they would not oppose the amendment.

The motion was put and negatived, there being only 21 members for it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON then moved, that the Committee rise for the purpose of a postponement. He thought they had a risk to ask this from the candor of the House. It was a subject which required mature consideration, and more time than gentlemen had yet been able to give it. He hoped therefore this delay would be granted. He wished before he decided on the business to obtain the sense of his constituents on the subject. For his own part he did not wish the decision to be put off altogether. He knew the disadvantages under which the Representatives of what were called the debtor States labored, and he wished to have it determined whether the State of New York was a debtor or a creditor, whether the whole transaction was to be binding, or whether the whole should be buried in oblivion? The result might be this. The Delegates from the State of New York do not represent her as a separate State, but as a State of the whole. It was possible that that State might come to such measures, as might induce her Representatives in that House to withdraw further opposition to the resolution before them.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped, as the gentleman seemed so earnestly to wish it, the Committee would rise.

The Committee accordingly rose and obtained leave to sit again, when

Mr. LIVINGSTON asked, if it was in order to move to postpone the business to a day certain?

4th CON.—58

If so, he wished it postponed till that day three weeks.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. L. that the business was not then before them, and Mr. W. SMITH moved that the House adjourn. It adjourned accordingly.

TUESDAY, January 3.

SAMUEL SMITH, of Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

A new member, to wit: SAMUEL WHITTLESEY DANA, from Connecticut, in place of URIAH TRACY, appointed a Senator of the United States, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. SWANWICK, so much of the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures as related to the petition of Aaron Sheffield, on the ground of new evidence being received, was recommitted to that committee.

BOUNTY TO OFFICERS, &c. OF LATE WAR.

Mr. CORT, from the committee appointed to inquire into and report their opinion of the equity and expediency of extending to the representatives of officers and soldiers of the late Army, who died in the service, the benefits given by the resolution of Congress, of September 16, 1776, to the representatives of officers and soldiers slain by the enemy, made the following report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That, by the said resolution, in addition to the pay and bounty in money and clothing, to officers and soldiers who should serve in the Army during the war, certain quantities of land were promised to those who should so serve, and to the representatives of those who should be slain by the enemy; and that, by a resolution of Congress, on the 18th of the same month, the same encouragement was extended to those who had engaged before that time as well as after it. For a variety of reasons, which your committee suppose it of no consequence for them to detail to the House, they can well conceive that it might have been a question of expediency, at the time of passing the said resolutions, whether the benefits secured to those who were slain, should not have extended to those who died in the service; but those reasons appear to have no application to the present question; and it is now more than twenty years since that resolution passed, and more than thirteen since the close of the service to which it applied: your committee are therefore of opinion that there are no considerations, either of equity or of expediency, which would either justify or require the extension contemplated in the reference."

BALANCES DUE BY STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of the balances due from individual States to the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the further consideration of the subject should be postponed to that day three weeks, for the reasons which had been urged by his colleague yesterday.

Mr. CORT hoped, except some stronger reasons than had yet been given for the postponement, it would not take place. The conduct of gentlemen from the State of New York, he thought extraordinary on this occasion. It appeared as if they wished to give the business the go-by in silence, by means of delay. There had already been time enough for bringing objections forward, if there had been any, for the last three years; but now, when they were about to be called upon to pay, time was demanded in which to bring forward objections. For his part, he thought the resolution ought to pass at present.

H. OF R.]

Debts due from States.

Mr. LIVINGSTON was sorry the deputation from New York should be suspected of disingenuous conduct. They had explained their reasons for wishing the postponement, which were that they might have an opportunity to consult the State which they represented, and not to give the subject the "go-by" in silence, as the gentleman from Connecticut had supposed. Some of those members did not consider themselves as Representatives of New York, in a separate, independent capacity, but in general, as a State of the Union; and that it was necessary to have particular instructions on this point. The report, he said, had only been laid a few days on the table; and if his motion had yesterday been in order, for a postponement, he had not a doubt, from the disposition of the House, it would have passed. The gentleman from Connecticut had said that three years had passed since the settlement of these accounts, and no objection had been made to it on the part of New York. He acknowledged that three years had elapsed, and no steps had been taken to enforce the demand. He believed, indeed, that there was a kind of understanding at the time, that these debts were to be buried in oblivion. The creditor States had had their credits secured, but no order had been taken with respect to the debts. He mentioned this as a reason for no steps having been taken. He spoke of it, however, only from information. He hoped the delay of three years in the business, would not be brought as an objection against the short postponement now asked for. It had never been their custom, he said, to press subjects which were important, when delay was required by any member, on reasonable ground. The time asked was only a few weeks, that the members may consult their constituents, after which they were willing to give the discussion all the weight it would admit. He therefore relied upon it that the postponement would be granted.

Mr. N. SMITH said, it was never the custom of the House to press a subject when there was any reasonable ground for delay. The gentlemen from New York said it was necessary to hear from their State on the present subject, as they were not authorized to act for that State in its individual capacity. He agreed that they had no right to appear in behalf of that State individually, but he could see no reason for waiting to hear from thence before the resolution in question was passed. Could they not resolve to ask a debtor for payment, without asking leave of their debtor?—Were they about to adopt coercive measures, it would be reasonable to give them notice; but they were merely asking for the money. This, he said, was the proper mode of doing it, and would draw forth their objections, if they had any, to the payment. These objections would be given by the State, and this was the regular way of receiving them; and therefore he could see no possible reason to postpone the present question.

Mr. GILBERT said, it would be recollected when the subject of these balances was under consideration, three years ago, that there was really an understanding in many of the debtor States, that, though it was necessary that provision should be made for funding what was due to the creditor States, there the business would stop; and, when the motion for relinquishing the debts was agitated, it was said there was no occasion to pass such a resolution, as there was no disposition in Government to enforce the payment. A member then in the House, and who was also one of the Commissioners, made the motion for relinquishing the claim, as improper. It was observed by the gentleman last up, from Connecticut, [Mr. N. SMITH,] that the members from New York had no business to represent the State individually. He did not understand the meaning of this assertion. Though he considered himself as a Representative of the Union, he thought himself particularly so of New York. In making this claim, Mr. G. said, the House should be assured it was well-founded. Whether it was so or not, this was the proper time to show, and it was therefore necessary that the Representatives of New York should have time to collect facts to show that the debt was not a fair one. There was no disposition, he said, in those members to give the motion the go-by; but the subject was of a serious nature, and required the delay which had been solicited. Another member from Connecticut [Mr. CORN] had endeavored, on a preceding day, to make it appear that it would be the interest of the other States to make New York pay the debt in question. Upon the same plan, he said, it might be the interest of all the States in the Union to combine and throw a tax on an individual State. He hoped the motion would prevail.

Mr. CHRISTIE wished the postponement not to take place. The gentleman who made the motion had already had an opportunity of making a long speech on the occasion, and, if the subject was put off for three weeks, he supposed they should have the story over again. He did not possess the fear which his colleague had expressed, of imitating the debtor States, by asking for payment. He thought when they wanted money they ought to call upon those who owed it for payment. If they gave the matter the go-by now, they should never receive anything. He was for bringing it to an immediate termination.

Mr. MACON said he should vote for the postponement. His reason was, that whatever was determined upon, the debtor States might not have it to say they had been unfairly used. North Carolina could not be interested in the delay, but gentlemen from New York had stated that they could, by means of the proposed delay, obtain certain facts which would throw light upon the subject. He did not know that this would be the case; but he thought they ought to be indulged, as very frequently delays were granted in business of much less importance. This very day, he said, a postponement had taken place in a decision upon a report respecting some land in the back country, on a plea of gaining information; and surely, when this liberty was allowed in matters of comparatively small moment, it ought to be allowed on a subject which, perhaps, was the most delicate that ever came before that House. He knew it was the general sentiment of his State that, if the settlement had been a fair one, they should not have been debtors but creditors; the postponement was, however, for too short a time to benefit them, but, as it had been desired by the gentlemen from New York, he wished it to take place.

Mr. MURRAY said, as a postponement for three weeks would not answer any purpose to the gentlemen of North Carolina, he wished it had been moved to extend it to six. He would, for his part, vote for any amendment to a measure which he conceived to be so radically wrong. He could wish the measure delayed to another session. Possibly delay might be of great value, not considering it on the scale of pounds, shillings, and pence, but on the score of public peace and tranquility. What, from the present temper of that House, and from the account given by the gentlemen from New York of the sentiments of that State, could be expected to be gained by the proposed inquiry? Nothing, he feared, but discontent and disunion, compared with which, four millions of dollars sunk into nothing. If a delay for three weeks were to take place, the justice of the claim would not be lessened, and gentlemen who desired it would be satisfied. And besides, he hoped, if a delay of one week only took place, the advocates of this measure, when they came to look coolly into the business, would be so satisfied of the mischiefs which would attend the pursuing of it, that they would be ready to relinquish it altogether.

It was hinted, Mr. M. said, that some of the States would refuse to pay; but if the gentleman's motion succeeded, and the demand was made, if it were refused, it must be enforced, or the dignity of the Government must be sunk. Had the gentleman from Connecticut imagined this? But, said he, suppose the resolution takes effect, and the Governments of the debtor States do not choose to comply, and you do not choose to enforce the demand, the law would sleep on your desk, and the impotence of the Government of the United States would be seen by all the world; and, if you did determine to force the States into a payment, you might, in some measure, throw them out of the Union in their individual capacity. Mr. M. said, he was not one of those who denied the justice of the demand; but he considered the matter more as a great political question, than as to what related to the four millions of dollars.

While he was up, Mr. M. said, he would just add, that he did not believe the State which he represented would be one of those which would refuse to comply with the demand; but, as he never could contemplate the payment of the whole debt by the State, he supposed the State of Maryland would make payment only upon the same conditions with other debtor States.

Mr. MACON said, that one reason for his voting for the postponement was, that the Legislature of New York was now in session, and might be immediately applied to. For his own part, he could wish the business postponed another year; as, never having been mentioned in Congress since the settlement, it had laid so long asleep that few members had thought upon the subject, and the different Legislatures had never taken any order upon the matter. Being from a debtor State, he was placed in rather a delicate situation, and therefore he had not chosen to say much upon the business; and believing, from the temper of the House, that a motion for a postponement of the subject till the next year would not have been carried, he had forborne making it; but these gentlemen in three weeks may be able to learn the will of their Legislature upon the subject.

Mr. THATCHER said, that when the motion was first brought forward, he was inclined to wish it might not be acted upon this session, but from a different motive than that which actuated other gentlemen. He thought the session short, and that they had business of greater weight which demanded their attention; but he thought the reasons which had been offered for a postponement were such as would convince every man that the resolution ought to be passed without the delay of a day or an hour. What was the reason, he asked, why some gentlemen wished for a postponement for three, others for six weeks, and others for a year? On the idea that there was a tacit understanding between the United States and individual States, that these balances would never be called for—what had been the consequence? The State of New York, finding the United States had slept over the subject, believed that they should not be called upon, and now, when the call was about to be made, it was said they were unprepared. But if the call was not persisted in, it would give countenance to the idea of its being abandoned, and because it appeared that one of the Commissioners had said it would never be called for, he therefore thought it now necessary to counteract that idea, and let it go no further.

This notification, Mr. T. said, was no more than a bare notification to the individual States that they had certain demands upon them. When this was done, if they had any objections to make to them, then was the proper time to choose agents to come forward and declare these objections; for, said he, if the different Representatives were to inform their States what was doing, the information would be irregular; therefore, the same reasons offered by the gentlemen for a postponement convinced him of the propriety of passing the resolution. Why, he said, were suggestions made that these States were unwilling to pay their debts? He thought it extremely wrong to form such a conjecture. The gentlemen who represent that State had said, they had no right to say that the State did not mean to pay the money; that they are the Representatives from New York to the United States, and of course they cannot speak the language of that State on this particular.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MURRAY] had offered a reason for not passing this resolution, which would have some weight in it if it was well-founded. These debts were not to be called for, he said, because it would cause confusion, and throw the debtor States out of the Union. If he thought so, he would not vote for a postponement of the subject, but that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to blot it entirely out of the books. But he had no such idea. They did not know at present that the State of New York, or any other State, was disinclined to pay, as the Representatives had acknowledged they had no authority to make a declaration on the subject. As far as he understood the subject, the settlement was fair, just, and honorable; and every motive which would induce an individual to pay his debts, ought to operate on the debtor States to pay theirs.

Mr. GILBERT would just make one observation on what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts. He, as well as several others, had taken it for granted that this balance was a conclusive settlement, and from thence there was no appeal. If so, it was fit time it should be known. As to the idea of the gentleman that the Representatives from New York ought not particularly to espouse that State, Mr. G. had no such idea. It was true he was a Representative of the Union, and as such he thought he had a right to give his ideas as fully as he pleased on that subject; he believed if no appeal was allowed the citizens of New York would be very much dissatisfied. The motion made by his colleague was only for a short postponement; but gentlemen said there was no ground for it at all; their ideas are, that the settlement was so conclusive as not to be suspected of injustice; but he thought this ought to be decided before a positive demand was made. He thought it was now the time to have that inquiry made; and he was sure, if upon a fair investigation there was good ground for the demand, that State would not refuse payment.

Mr. WILLIAMS did not mean to postpone the question over the session, but merely for three weeks; but if gentlemen who represented debtor States at a distant part of the Union would wish it, he hoped they would observe it; he should not object. He again mentioned the prevailing opinion, that the debtor States would not be called upon. He was sorry to hear gentlemen term this settlement a fair one. If it was what they described it to be, he would ask, why were they afraid of having it brought into a second examination? If they thought it what they called it, they would not refuse a discussion. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THATCHER] had said that not a day nor an hour ought to be spared in passing this resolution. He was sure that New York would not, on comparison with the State from which that gentleman came, lose any thing, either as to her expenditures or actual losses. He would ask for two weeks, if the other request could not be granted. He only desired three weeks.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was at a loss to know what end could be answered by delay. Gentlemen had better at once propose a resolution that the settlement was an unjust one, and that therefore another should take place; but no one would attempt to prove that idea—no one had ventured to prove that assertion. It was in vain, he said, to dispute a point without its errors could be pointed out. The resolution required no coercive measures; it only asked the debtor States to come forward and fairly settle what the Commissioners justly reported to be due. The many observations made upon the subject in opposition to the question could only tend to put off the discussion. However, he believed the settlement to be binding; and to adopt the resolution would be the only way to bring the matter to a decision, and it could not fairly be objected to. He hoped, therefore, there would be no delay.

Mr. POTTER was averse to the postponement, because no sufficient reason had been given for it. It had been said, that when the Commissioners' report was received, the creditor States had had their credits funded, yet it had been tacitly understood the debtor States were never to be called upon for their balances. This, he said, was not a sufficient reason for the delay. It had been said that it was improper at this time to call upon these States for their balances. Was there any better time, he asked, for calling for a debt than when the debtor was able to pay, or than when the creditor wanted the money? He thought not. If there existed any objections to the payment of these debts, this was the best mode of bringing them forward.

It was said by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MURRAY] that this was a bad time to make the application, and that it might throw the United States into great confusion. If this were likely to be the case, it was best to know it soon. He had no idea of relinquishing the claim; and if they were not to be upon friendly terms with the State of New York, or any other State, but by the same means which gained them the friendship of the Dey and Regency of Algiers, he should not wish for it.

Mr. P. said he did not see upon what terms gentlemen objected to this resolution. It was a reflection upon the people of New York to do so. He himself had no doubt but they would pay the money when the demand was regularly made upon them, as it was their share of the price of the Revolution and of their freedom; and that gentlemen should suppose that making these demands was calculated to create confusion in the United States was extraordinary. By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, they had a calculation on the subject of direct taxation. How were these taxes, he asked, to be collected? Were they not to be demanded from States which were taxing their own inhabitants? And would not those people, if the State of New York and others were excused from the payment of their debts, have good reason to complain at thus being called upon to make good other deficiencies? And would not they also be as likely to show a spirit of resistance when such demands were made upon them, as the State of New York when she was called upon to discharge her just debts? He believed the one case was fully as probable as the other.

Had the resolution on the table alone been attended to, the present business would have been simple, as it was a mere request for payment, and must have been answered with the money, or reasons why it was not paid? But the subject had been greatly wandered from. As gentlemen were, however, extremely anxious for a delay of three weeks, he had no great objection to its being granted, though no sufficient reason had been given for it. Mr. P. concluded by saying, he doubted not the honor of New York would force them to pay the money.

Mr. GILBERT rose, when the SPEAKER informed the House that the gentleman had already spoken twice, and that, according to the rules, without leave, he could not be permitted to speak a third time. Leave was granted; when Mr. GILBERT again objected to the justice of the claim against New York, and re-urged the propriety of a postponement.

Mr. THATCHER said, if he had the most distant suspicion that the application in question had any tendency to produce disunion amongst the States, he should be as strongly opposed to it as any man, because he considered the union of the States as the rock of their salvation.

The gentlemen from New York, who were the principal advocates for the postponement, did not agree sufficiently amongst themselves to warrant the measure. One or more of them said they were not authorized to act in the business, others said they were. If authorized, they could not want a postponement for instructions; and if not authorized, the resolution ought to pass, that their State might authorize somebody. Another gentleman had said a postponement was wanted because the settlement was not just. He believed it was just, for three reasons, viz: first, because though the settlement had been made three years, no objection had been made to it; because the settlement had been partly executed, so far as to pay the interest to the creditor States; and because the law making provision for the settlement and final adoption of it, made no provision for an appeal from that settlement.

For these three reasons, which Mr. T. said he had merely mentioned, but which would not suffer from being dilated upon, he should be opposed to every idea of breaking up the settlement which had been made.

The gentleman before him [Mr. WILLIAMS] said the House would not give them time to make the necessary inquiries. Mr. T. asked, what inquiries were necessary? The gentleman seemed to misunderstand the resolution. It was merely to give notice to the State to pay the debt, and did not preclude any reason which they might have to give why it should not be paid. He hoped, therefore, no postponement would take place, but that the resolution would be agreed to.

Mr. MURRAY said, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THATCHER] had misunderstood him, if he thought he had asserted that certain States would be thrown out of the Union if the resolution was entered into. He thought he had accompanied what he had said with such expressions as that he could not have been mistaken. His meaning was, that if the State of Delaware, for instance, was obliged to pay the debt due from her, added to her present burdens, it would have the effect to bear her down so much as to deprive her of her political consequence in the Union. Other States who were debtor States might be mentioned, with whom these debts, in addition to the direct taxes, would have been burdensome. He did not mean that the Union would be dissolved by it.

Mr. CRAIK rose to make a motion, if in order, that he thought would meet the ideas of many gentlemen, and many of the objections urged by others; and, for reasons which operated in his own mind, he hoped would prevail, which was, to postpone the further consideration of this subject till the next Congress. It appeared to him that the reasons given by the gentleman from New York for a postponement of the business only three weeks, would not operate on him to vote for it; the object did not at all extend to his ideas, that urged for a reason that the settlement was not equitable. Mr. C. said, he did not mean to object upon that ground. He wished there may be time allowed for cool deliberation. The States would have it in their power to re-examine the settlement which had been made. He would wish the door at once to be shut to the business at the present session. He was surprised to hear gentlemen deny that the carrying of this measure into effect was not likely to produce warmth in the country. He thought the conduct of gentlemen in that House proved the contrary; for he thought they could not expect that the people whom they represented would be more cool on the subject than they were. The consideration of this warmth, he said, operated in his mind against taking up the business at all.

Did not that House pledge itself, when it once took up a subject, that it would go as far as it could in it? Gentlemen said that they did not mean to take any coercive measures, but only to make the demand. If the House determine they will call on the debtor States, they call it a just debt by that determination, and must go through to enforce the payment; but if after that declaration they do not enforce it, it will only expose their weakness, and without answering the least purpose. When he considered himself in the capacity of a Representative of the United States this was his opinion; and when he again considered himself more particularly a Representative for Maryland, one of the debtor States, he could see no reason to alter his opinion. He was bound to oppose the resolution.

Mr. C. thought the State of Delaware, though it had scarcely been mentioned, would be more particularly affected by a payment of the balances in question than any other. The State of New York, he said, was fully able to pay; but the same could not be said of Delaware. Indeed, when he saw New York unwilling and Delaware unable to pay these balances, as a Representative of Maryland, who was a small debtor, he could not consent to the payment of that debt, when there seemed to be no probability of enforcing payment from other States.

He hoped, therefore, the House would agree that this was not the proper time to make the application in question, and vote for a postponement till next session.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH said, if he understood the measure, it was to inform the States that there was such a sum of money stood charged against them. There was no threat in the resolution; and if they had any objections to make to the demand, they would then make them. He had no objection to the notice being expressed in as mild terms as possible. The opposition to the resolution was as warm, he said, as if it carried an execution along with it. He thought this warmth might be withheld, at least for the present.

He supposed there would be delay long enough before the money would be paid.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that this was not merely a notification, but a requisition. A tacit agreement had been urged. Why, then, all this unexampled hurry in pushing it on now? This had an aspect as if the matter was to be hurried on because the Commissioners who had recommended an abolition of the debtor balances were not in the House. The hurry now exhibited was not consistent with the candor always expected from the House. The question was immensely interesting and important. The celerity in pushing this thing through the House might have a bad effect on the debtor States. Gentlemen say that this call cannot produce warmth. At the same time they do themselves betray the utmost warmth.

A member inquired what was the question?

The SPEAKER said, the question was for a postponement for three weeks. The gentleman from Maryland had moved to postpone till next session, which was not in order. A day certain must be mentioned, and even that would not be in order, except seconded, which was not the case with the gentleman's former motion.

Mr. CRAIK then moved, and the motion was seconded, to postpone the question until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. GALLATIN said, there seemed to be three different grounds upon which a postponement was urged. The first was, on an insinuation that some sort of agreement had taken place, when the sums due to the creditor States were funded, that the balances due from the debtor States were to be relinquished. So far from this taking place, Mr. G. said, a motion to this effect had been made and negatived at that time, by the yeas and nays being taken upon it, 53 to 28. He was hurt, therefore, to hear of this insinuation. The next ground for a postponement was founded on a suspicion that the settlement made by the Commissioners was not just. He said he was not going to express any opinion whether the settlement was a just one or not; whether the rules adopted by the Commissioners were good or not; whether the mode of stating the accounts had been the best. It was desirable that a private settlement should take place, and though it fell hard on some, it was not the less desirable; but supposing, however, that any of the debtor States, or any State, had a right to object to the settlement, to the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, and of Congress, and were not to be bound except by the Judges of the Supreme Court, the proper time to have made the objections was when the bill for funding the balances to the creditor States passed, for that was the time for carrying the settlement into execution.

Why, therefore, Mr. G. said, there should be a postponement of three weeks to enable the New York members to send to their State he did not know. They had had time enough, and he thought the business would have been better done three years ago than now.

The arguments adduced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MURRAY] seemed to have weight; that to carry the measure into effect might create confusion; and that we had not power over the States to enforce payment. As to the danger of confusion, there was as much on the one side as the other; because those States which were to receive benefit from the payment by the debtor States would have as much cause to complain if those debts were not paid as those debtors being obliged to pay what they owe could have.

The only ground, then, was the want of power to coerce the States; and this, he owned, appeared to be strong. Yet, this ground was rather against the resolution itself. It was better, he said, to quit the whole business at once, than to postpone—than to leave the subject to irritate the minds of the people to no purpose. If it were postponed till next session, the people would be operated upon by a fear of having the money to pay; and the States who owed it would also remain dissatisfied.

Mr. G. thought, therefore, it would be best to put the question, and to see whether they had the power in doubt, or not. Rather than adopt any resolution to postpone, he would cancel the subject altogether.

He would say a word as to coercion. He did not see any power they had over the States, except by attaching any of their property. He saw no other way in which they could lay hands on a State: nor was this owing to the weakness of Government, as had been insinuated. This settlement of accounts was a remnant of the old Government, and had nothing to do with the present; for now, their power was to be exercised over individuals, and not over States.

As to the resolution itself, if they went into a Committee of the Whole, he might perhaps make some observations upon it. He had been at a loss to know why this subject had not been entered into before, and why it should be brought forward now. With respect to the notification, he believed the States had already been notified. As it would not be in order, however, to go into the subject generally, he had confined himself to the question for postponement.

Debts due from States.

[H. of R.]

Mr. CRAIK's motion was then put for postponing till the first Monday in December next, and lost—years 27.

Mr. WILLIAMS's motion was put for postponing three weeks, and lost—years 29, nays 51.

Mr. COOPER then moved the question for a delay of one week, which was lost by the same number.

The question was then put for the House going into a Committee on the subject, and carried—years 50.

And the House went into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VAN ALLEN said he wished to simplify the subject as much as possible. He believed it was very important to convince the State of New York that the settlement had been made upon fair and honorable principles; because, if they were convinced of this, they would have no objection to pay the debt; but, knowing the general sentiments which prevailed in that State of the unfairness of the transaction, he was desirous that some step should be taken which would serve to adjust the business. He thought he held in his hand an amendment which was calculated to have that effect. It was as follows: To insert after the word "indeed," "and that the proceedings of the said Commissioners shall be open for the inspection of such agent or agents as the said debtor States, or either of them, shall appoint to inspect the same."

Mr. HARPER believed that the gentleman who brought forward this amendment would have been the last to have done so, if he had seen all the mischiefs which would be consequent upon carrying it into effect. It would be to undo all that had been done with the greatest labor, and with the greatest difficulty, for three years; and what, he asked, would be the consequence? Were they to resettle the subject, and consume two or three more years in the affair, there would be no security that New York, or some other State, would not be dissatisfied; so that there would be no end of such a business. He was of the number of those who wished to have passed by this settlement, at present, altogether; but the majority had said, "We will have a decision. Let them make one. If he was called upon to vote upon the resolution, he believed he should vote against it; but at all events he should deprecate, more than any other possible course, the ripping up of this long dispute."

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped there would be no objection to the amendment of his colleague. If he understood it, it meant this: that they wish to know upon what principle the Commissioners settled those accounts, and whether the statements were accurate. It was conceived, he said, that some States had brought a number of articles into the charge which others had not, and that thereby they became creditor States, whereas they would otherwise have been debtor States. Some States, it was suspected, had been allowed four times as much for the same articles as other States, and only because they charged it. If this is the case, it must be certainly cause of discontent to those States denominated debtor States; if not, where will be the injury of exposing the accounts to give satisfaction to those States? It may be, Mr. W. said, that New York would be disappointed in her judgment on this; if so, he believed there would be no difficulty to the payment. Was it not right, then, he asked, that they should have all the information possible on this subject—that the principle should be known—not that they wished to overturn anything that had been done; the motion extended only to a necessary inquiry, for what they were to pay the money? The settlement was altogether in the dark. The Commissioners had full power. No person was allowed to come before the Board with or for information, and no specific account rendered of the debt, but merely the sum-total. Perhaps that was the first time that ever accounts were so settled. Surely, then, New York could not be blamed for doubting the fairness of that settlement, especially when they knew somewhat of the proportion they furnished to many other States that were returned creditor States. There must have been wrong charges and calculations made. He hoped, therefore, if they were to be called upon for payment of the demand, they would be allowed to see upon what principle the settlement took place.

Mr. W. SMITH observed, with respect to the gentleman from New York opposing the motion, that the members of that State had generally allowed (and nothing could prove the contrary) that they were not instructed by their Legislature to oppose this settlement. The House, he observed, did not know that New York opposed it; they did not know that they would scruple to pay the money. He thought it had been sufficiently discussed, and, until the House were possessed of information on the unwillingness of that State to settle these accounts, it was in vain for so much debate to take place, when time was so much wanted.

Mr. VAN ALLEN said, the settlement was either made up on just and equitable principles or not. If upon principles that were fair, the people of New York would be satisfied with them, and pay the demand; if not, they surely would object. But, he said, would not that obscure way of doing business tend to make them think that there was something which the Government would wish not to be shown to day-light? The effects of the resolution would be this: that New York would be satisfied that the debt was owing, and therefore proceed to take means to pay it, or would be able to satisfy the General Government that it was not owing—either of which would have far superior advantages to the mode hitherto adopted. This was his reason for making the motion, and it was but just that it should pass.

The question was then put on the amendment, and lost, as only twenty members rose in the affirmative.

Mr. MACON said the original question was now before the Committee, on which he should make a few observations. It had been observed that the present was the proper time to call for the debts, but he thought it, of all times, the worst. It was well known what a scarcity of money there was now. How came these States in debt to the United States? Who made them debtors? He, answered, The United States. The United States, he said, had assumed the State debts—some of which were not half, others not a quarter, of the sum assumed. Thus, many States which were now debtors would have been creditors. If North Carolina had supposed she would not have become a creditor State, he did not believe she would have been willing to have given up the Western Territory.

Mr. LOCKE said he believed his observations would answer no purpose, but, as he could not comply with the settlement, he must give his reasons, which were, the unfairness and privacy of the settlement. North Carolina had every reason to believe she was a large creditor State, particularly as she struck off a million of dollars, at her own expense and credit, for the general cause. She exerted herself as much, or perhaps more, than any other State, and three times more than some of her neighbors who were creditors. However, he would waive any further observations at present, but should vote against the resolution.

Mr. GILBERT thought the subject ought to have more consideration, and therefore moved the Committee may rise, and have leave to sit again.

Mr. COOPER supposed the House would next send and form a Treaty with New York, as he supposed they were as bad as the Algerines. He meant to make a motion to that effect to-morrow.

The Committee then rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

TREATY WITH ALGIERS.

Mr. PARKER, from the Committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT with the resolution of the House requesting information on the situation of affairs between the United States and the Algerines, reported that the PRESIDENT informed them that, before he had heard of the resolution, he had directed the necessary papers to be made out, and, as soon as they were ready, they should be laid before the House.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. HARPER said, that a Report had been made by the Secretary of the Treasury, during the last session, of a statement of the internal revenue of the United States, with an account of the expense of collection, &c. He said it was a mere temporary order; but, as it was desirable information, he thought it would be well for the House to be furnished with a similar statement every session; he proposed a resolution, to this effect:

“Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the next, and every succeeding session of Congress, within ten days after their meeting, a statement of the internal revenue and the expense of the collection, and produce thereof.”

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom it was referred to consider the subject of further revenues, and the provisions for more effectually securing the internal revenues, reported thereon; which was ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SMITH wished to make it the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. CRAIK wished a delay for a fortnight. The subject was new to him, and he wished to consult his constituents.

Mr. GALLATIN said that the Committee of Ways and Means had thought it needless to enter into details on this subject, till they saw whether the House would agree to the general principle of the resolution. The subject had been known since last session: the sooner it was entered into, so much the better. Either these or some other funds must be found out.

Mr. MURRAY wished his colleague [Mr. CRAIK] to withdraw his motion. This was done. The report was made the order of the day for Monday next, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF IMPORTERS OF GOODS.

Mr. BLOUNT moved that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any what, alterations are necessary in the existing laws respecting the entry of goods, for the relief of importers of goods into the ports of North Carolina, lying upon the waters of Pamlico Sound, and the better securing the duties payable thereon. Mr. B. urged, as his reason for introducing this motion, the great disadvantages attending the entries in those parts, in proof of which he read a letter from a respectable correspondent, making complaints on that score. It was accordingly committed.

LICENSES TO PILOTS.

On motion,

Resolved, That a law ought to be passed, authorizing the Boards of Commissioners of Pilotage, in Virginia and Maryland, to grant licenses to persons qualified to pilot vessels to any of the bays or rivers of the Chesapeake.

Whereupon, it was ordered that a bill be prepared and brought in by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

DANIEL BUCK, from Vermont, appeared and took his seat.

REMISSION OF PENALTIES.

Mr. SWANWICK presented two petitions, one from William Patten, the other from David Miller, formerly grocers in this city, praying for a remission of penalties incurred in having sold wine and spirits by retail, without license. The former stated that he had declined business in August last, and had only reserved the remainder of a hogshead of spirits for the use of workmen employed in a building, and that if any part of it had been sold, it was without his knowledge. The latter stated, that he had only reserved a cask of damaged wine for the purpose of making vinegar, and that none of it had been sold, except on great solicitation, one quart by his wife to a strange man. Mr. S. moved that these petitions be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Objections were made to a reference of them at all, as an improper subject for Legislative interference. If the petitioners, it was said, had offended against the law, they ought to pay the penalty; and if that House were to employ themselves in such petitions, they might sit the whole year round about subjects worse than nothing.

Mr. SWANWICK observed, on the other hand, that he understood the cases of these petitioners were hard ones, having had some conversation with the District Attorney on the subject, and that, at least, the petitioners ought to have a reference, since, if the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures (or a select committee, if such a reference should be thought more proper) saw no reason to make an exception against the law in favor of these petitioners; and he believed it would not be said they were very apt to do so; their report would be very summary, and consume but little of the time of the House.

A reference was denied, by a great majority.

UNITED STATES TITLES TO LANDS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, as they had lately shown much anxiety about the ideal property of the United States, he thought it was necessary to show some respect to its real property; for this purpose he moved a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the title of the United States to lands lying west of Pennsylvania, between the forty-first and forty-second degrees of north latitude, lately claimed and sold by the State of Connecticut."

Ordered to lie upon the table.

BALANCES DUE BY STATES.

A motion was made for the House going in a Committee on the balances due from certain States to the United States; when

Mr. NICHOLAS rose and said, though the proposition he had made the other day was at that time thought improper, he was more and more convinced of its propriety. He thought the course proposed to be taken by the report which had been made was not the best; he thought they were courting opposition, and giving the State of New York an opportunity of embodying its opposition, so as to make it dangerous to attempt, if it should hereafter be thought necessary, to enforce the payment of the balance in question. He believed the United States had it in their power at present to do themselves justice; but were the United States to lay their hands on the funds of the State of New York as a security for their debt, there would be nothing left to operate upon the minds of the people of that State but the justice of the measure, as they would no longer foster any idea of evading the debt. He could see no objection to this proceeding.

If there was danger of a serious conflict with that State, in order to recover this debt, he, for one, would choose to relinquish it altogether; but if they were to pay themselves by laying hold of their stock, he believed that State would acquiesce in the measure, and there would no more be heard of it, which might not be the case if they made a demand, and were to wait for objections or a refusal of payment. From the zeal which had been shown by the gentlemen from New York on this occasion, he asked if it would be extraordinary if that State should put it out of their power to do themselves justice; and whether, when the opposition to the demand should be drawn into a focus, it would not be increased in its force? He thought there could be no doubt it.

There was one objection to a proceeding of this kind that might have some weight. It might be said, for instance, that the State from whence he came, or others, might refuse to pay, after they had distrained upon the funds of New York for their debt. It might be so. He believed that one of the debtor States could never pay. This was no reason why they should not receive the debt from New York. They might nevertheless allow so much from the amount as should be equal to the deficiency in the payments of the other States. He thought to adopt this plan would be to avoid any disagreeable conflict which might otherwise take place, and be a means of preserving harmony between that State and the United States; he therefore proposed a resolution to the following effect, which he wished to be committed to the same Committee of the Whole to which was referred the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject:

"Resolved, That the balances due from certain States in the settlement of accounts between individual States and the United States, shall be discharged out of the funds which such States may hold in the Public Debt of the United States, and that the Secretary of the Treasury have directions accordingly."

Mr. GILBERT said this conduct was unexampled even between nations at war. It was at once making power right. It was true, no such remedy could be taken with the State which the mover represented, as it did not possess any part of the stock of the United States. How far this conduct was right, would need, he thought, to be reflected upon a little. Even European nations had abandoned the practice of violating public faith. The gentleman had given it as a reason for his conduct, that the State of New York might withdraw their money from the funds, and thereby prevent them from paying themselves. He believed they might do that in three days' time, and therefore the gentleman's project could not be carried into effect. But he trusted the United States would never show themselves so lost to every principle of honor as to attempt such a measure.

Mr. HARTLEY hoped this measure would not be referred. He thought the measure a very improper one. It differed exceedingly from the resolution reported by the Committee; that contemplated a friendly request to the debtor States to make payment; but the resolution now offered went to coercion immediately. By our Treaty with Great Britain, the public securities were guarantied, and not to be attached or seized upon any pretence whatever. Shall we, then, said Mr. H., treat a sister State worse than a strange nation? He hoped so ungenerous a policy would not prevail. He had no doubt but the State of New York would be inclined to do what was just and right; and if they objected to pay, they would doubtless give their reasons for it. As to the State of Delaware, Mr. HARTLEY was of opinion that she was unable to pay the balance found against her. He presumed she would state her inability, and that relief would be granted her. Though that State perhaps did not advance much money during the war, yet she furnished more than in proportion to the number of citizens; he was therefore decidedly against the resolution.

Mr. LIVINGSTON had no objection to the reference, because he was curious to hear arguments in support of this new mode of keeping up harmony between the States and the United States. It would doubtless require great ingenuity, and introduce a new kind of morality and of logic, to prove that to seize upon the property of a State was to cultivate harmony with it; for, in his opinion, the proposition was contrary to all principle and fair conduct.

Mr. CORR was at a loss to know the intention of the mover of the present resolution, whether it was to forward or defeat the object in view. If he intended to serve the cause, he would make use of the same homely adage in respect to him that he had done with respect to another gentleman, that "he leaped before he came to the stile." The original resolution, he said, was merely to call upon the States for payment; but to talk about seizing their property, was to suppose they would not pay. The gentlemen of New York, it was true, had said much against the justice of the debt; but they were not authorized to act in the matter. Had they asked for money? No. Was it proper, therefore, in this stage of the subject to take such a step as was then proposed? It was even a very serious question to determine whether, in any case, they should be authorized to seize their funds.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped that the House had more confidence in the honor of that State than to take it for granted they would refuse to pay their just debts; he hoped they would not. Such a step at any time would require much serious consideration before it was adopted. Besides, he said, it was singling out the State of New York, as though there were no other States in that situation; but even in any situation, he should doubt as to the justice of adopting this measure; it was, as the gentleman last up observed, quite prejudging a refusal before it was asked of them. And even were they to refuse payment, he was as doubtful of the propriety of laying hands on their property. He hoped the House would never embark in a measure so unjust as that proposed. The resolution first read was in itself moderate, and gave equal liberty to all the debtor States, whereas this was very severe and levelled only at that State.

Mr. GALLATIN said the arguments of the gentleman from South Carolina were rather against the resolution itself, than against the propriety of committing it. One of the gentleman's arguments was not founded in fact: he had said that the measure would affect New York only. But of the six debtor States, four of them had property in the funds of the United States; two of them had more than they owed. Pennsylvania had six times as much in the funds as she was reported to owe; therefore the measure could not be singular towards New York.

But, Mr. G. said, he considered that when a resolution was laid upon the table, the only argument against committing it must be, that it was evidently glaringly imprudent and improper. As to this resolution being proper or improper, prudent or imprudent, he could not say, because not under consideration; but he thought there was nothing so glaringly improper in it, as to prevent discussion.

He said he had only heard one thing which was an objection to the motion being committed, which was from the gentleman from New York. He said the measure was disgraceful, and such as would not be adopted by one hostile nation towards another. That gentleman, Mr. G. said, should recollect one thing: supposing that it would be disgraceful to seize the property of individuals in the public funds, on account of any misconduct of that nation, yet there was nothing disgraceful in the measure now proposed. That gentleman had said that no nation at war would seize the property of their enemy. Did he not know that England had seized all French property which they could lay their hands upon? Here was a State, he said, which owed them a sum of money, and the measure proposed was, to take their property in the funds to pay it. He thought there was no difficulty in the case, if they supposed the transaction to happen between individuals. If a person had laid money in his hands, and at the same time owed him money, he should at least discuss the matter in his mind, whether he would let him have the money before he paid him what he owed. All that was asked, he said, was that the matter should be discussed; if it was found improper, it would, of course, be rejected.

Mr. CORR thought there was some difference betwixt the resolution before them being referred to a Committee of the Whole and the committee upon the subject of the balances.

Mr. S. SMITH said, before the question was put, he wished to say a few words on the subject. Gentlemen might say they would lay hands on the property of the State of New York. The gentlemen from thence had said, that State would not pay the debt. But Maryland, he said, would pay; and she depended on the interest of her stock in the funds of the United States to pay her civil list. If they chose to seize the funds of New York, why should they seize those of Maryland? Maryland, he said, was every year purchasing fresh stock. At this time, he believed, Maryland had money to lay out in these stocks. A resolution of this kind, he said, would make it possible for the United States to seize the property of individual States without right. He thought payment should first be asked. Until this was done, they should not take a step of this kind, which would have a tendency to destroy the public faith. He hoped, therefore, that the resolution would not be committed, as he would not have it supposed possible that the United States would, at any time, seize property which had been lodged for security in their funds.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, if it was possible his motion would produce the effect the gentleman last up supposed, he would withdraw it; he thought it might be so modified as that such an effect could not even be supposed. He thought its tendency would not extend further than he meant in making the motion, viz: to prevent a transfer of their money in the United States stocks for a certain time; it would be putting into the power of the nation an eventual security.

He said, he had not been shaken by the railery of the gentleman from New York, nor had he heard any objection which had any weight on him. He should not, as had been insinuated by that gentleman, pretend to use any new logic or fine words. He thought the motion would act as a preventive to keep the passions of the people from being raised, when they find this House exercises their power; now, he said, was the very time they had the power, it were foolish for men to use force when it can have no effect. If the motion had all the force which the gentleman from Maryland conceived, he would be willing to withdraw his motion; however, when the House went in Committee on it, he should hear the ideas of gentlemen more fully. He intended it merely as a security, which, he thought, from the declarations of gentlemen of that State, to be necessary.

The question was put, on Mr. NICHOLAS'S amendment, and negatived—ayes 35, noes 42.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the original report.

Mr. READ hoped the resolution would be agreed to. He said he had attended to all the objections which had been made to the measure, and they did not appear to him to have any real weight. They were principally these: It was said by some the debt was not justly due; that the rule of apportionment was not what it ought to have been; and that it was not in the power of the United States to enforce payment of the debts. The resolution was also objected to on the ground of policy.

With respect to the justice of the settlement, he did not believe that the debtor States would pretend that the debts were not justly due, and, therefore, the arguments on this head were of no weight, as they ought not to anticipate such a conduct. With respect to the power to coerce, it was frivolous in the extreme to talk of this. It was supposing the debtor States to object to the demand, whereas they presumed no such thing. He believed the debtor States would pay. With respect to the policy of the measure, it was his opinion that there was no better policy in either States or individuals than to pay their debts. If our Government, he said, was founded upon erroneous principles, vicious measures might be necessary; but so long as it was founded on equal rights and privileges, there could be no sounder policy than to make justice and equity our guide.

It had been supposed that the State of New York would not pay her debts; that she would prove herself less friendly to the Union, less Federal, than others. He did not believe this; he believed that State perfectly Federal. Would not the same arguments fall upon the creditor States? Were they to omit calling upon the debtor States, would not the creditor States be disappointed by these debts not being paid? Would it not have a tendency to make them less friendly, less Federal, were they to be called upon for money which the debtor States ought to have paid?

Mr. R. said, it was clear, upon the principles of policy and justice, the application ought to be made at this time. The longer persons neglected to pay any just debt, the more unwilling they were to pay; and the difficulty of recovering it increased in proportion to the delay.

In respect to the State of Massachusetts, which he had the honor to represent, it was one of the creditor States. It was at present burdened with very large debts, contracted in support of the war. Many persons expected, and perhaps the State in general, that their account would be allowed. The amount was $1,200,000. They supposed this sum would be paid by the debtor States, and if it were not paid, it would make a direct tax very unpopular with them.

There had been an objection urged by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] which he thought had not been noticed. He said there had been large emigrations from other States into that State since the settlement of the accounts, which had so increased their population as to greatly increase their debt, that being estimated on the scale of population. If it was true that such an emigration had taken place, and he expected it was, it enriched the State of New York, and enabled her to pay the debt. The people knew when they went into that State that they would have to bear a part of the debt. They had left creditor States, and by these emigrations of young and enterprising men, those States were impaired, the aged and infirm being left behind.

Mr. R. concluded by saying, that it was proper requisition should be made for the payment; and he doubted not it would be complied with.

Mr. FREEMAN thought the resolution a proper one. It was agreed, he said, on all hands, that revenue was much wanted, to meet the present exigencies of the country; the people in the creditor States were extremely dissatisfied at the delay of payment in the debtor States. He should be unwilling to vote for taxes to supply national wants, while this settlement was left unpaid; upon this ground he should vote for the resolution, and he hoped it would now pass. The gentleman from New York had objected to it, on the ground of the inhabitants being changed in that State since the time the debt was incurred. Mr. F.

said, if people thought worth while to emigrate from other States to that, and reside there, the accumulation of their profits and wealth would render them regardless of the pretended burden which the State debts would put on them; and, on the ground of apportionment, he thought no rule could be more equal and just than that which was made at the time of the settlement.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose and recapitulated his observations before made on the subject of apportionment, insisting that the great emigration to that State, which he stated at two-thirds of the present number since the year 1789, would render it very unjust in them to lay a tax to pay this debt, whereas it should now have been a creditor State, if that emigration had not taken place. He asked whether it would be honest or just to call on persons who came from creditor States, where they would have received advantage, now to be taxed to pay the debts incurred before they left their own State? If this mode was to be adopted, he contended it would be but poor encouragement for emigration, and it would be impossible for such a State to discriminate.

Mr. GILBERT wished, before the question was put, to observe on what fell from some gentlemen on the want of revenue. He well knew the United States did want revenue; but he would ask gentlemen, whether that is a reason why New York should pay an unjust debt? He said it was proper, before the debt was paid, that the State should be satisfied the claim was just. He was sensible and sorry that nothing which could now be urged would have a tendency to prevent the resolution passing; but he thought gentlemen should consider the subject well before they voted for it. These debts, he said, were incurred by the United States, and not by the individual States, and, under the Old Confederation, it was supposed that ample provision would be made for the discharge of them; he knew of no right there was to saddle these debts on any individual State. Mr. G. again enlarged upon the mode of settlement, and the declaration of the Commissioner [said to be General Irwin, late a member of Congress from Pennsylvania,] that the balances would never be called for. He did not think one man in the House could conscientiously say the demand was just. He then adverted to the services of New York during the war; he said, he did not like to draw comparisons, but he must declare, while no State did more than New York, after all it was brought in arrears. His constituents thought it an unjust demand, and could it be supposed they would like to pay it? New York, he said, in imposts and tonnage, furnishes four-fifteenths of that branch of the revenue collected by the United States. As to the policy of the measure, he should leave gentlemen to judge of it. There was no basis on which the demand could be constitutionally founded.

Mr. SITGRAVES said, from the nature of the objections which had been made, he should have been as well satisfied if the present subject had not at all been stirred; but having been moved, it ought not to be abandoned. And this flowed from the nature of the objections offered; because, if they had a right, they had the moral or physical power of enforcing that right. There could be no doubt, if the money was due, it ought to be paid, and every consideration of expediency pointed out this as the proper time. He knew he had heard the gentlemen from New York, over and over, and over again, deny that the debt was due; but, supposing this to be the case, why not make the application? If, when that application was made, any State did not choose to pay the money, they would, of course, state their objections. But he was well satisfied they ought not to stop at making the demand. They had been told, though not in direct terms, in such as were well understood, that we might demand, if we pleased, but, under the present impressions of New York, they would not pay the debt said to be due from them. They had been told by other gentlemen that they had not the means to coerce the payment. If this were the case, it was proper they should lay hands upon the only thing in their power, which was their share of the Public Debt of the Union.

By this, Mr. S. said, it would be seen, that he meant to revive the question of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS.] He was very indifferent about the fate of the former motion, because he knew there was no rule of order that could prevent an amendment being introduced in the Committee of the Whole for discussion. He said, if they could get at this money without violating any principle of right, they ought to lay hands on at least a debt of $1,200,000, for which they were receiving interest; more especially as this was a part of the balance found against them in the settlement of the accounts.

Mr. S. said, he could draw no analogy between the present business and the British Treaty, and wondered any gentleman should think of introducing that subject. It might be perfectly true, he said, that it would be improper for one nation to lay hands on the property of another; but, was there any law to prevent him from laying hold of his antagonist? And if, said he, the property of the State of New York is in my hand, and she owed me money, where was the propriety of paying with my right hand, when there was an uncertainty of receiving with the other? He thought there could be no objection on this ground; but there was an objection on account of the negotiability of Government paper. He owned he had scruples on that subject. The gentleman from Virginia, having doubtless considered the subject, could perhaps remove them. In order, therefore, to bring the motion before the Committee, he moved to add the following amendment:

“Resolved, That any transfer of the debt of the United States in the books of the Treasury, held by any of the debtor States, by the settlement of accounts between the several States and the United States, or by any person holding evidences of the said debt, shall be withheld, until the balances of the said States shall be discharged.”

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he did not understand what scruples the gentleman from Pennsylvania could have about the transferable property of these debts.

JANUARY, 1797.]

Debts due from States.

[H. OF R.]

He was satisfied with respect to New York, and it was impossible any other corporate body or person could be affected by the motion. The transfer, he said, was a sale of the property, therefore, a denial of transfer would completely prevent any person from being involved in this measure, besides the State in question.

Mr. GILBERT asked the gentleman last up, if there was no difficulty of a Constitutional kind in the way of this measure? If he understood the Constitution, they could not pass an ex post facto law. Had they not already said this paper should be transferable? If so, had they a right to say it should not be transferable? Was this the regard which the Legislature intended to show to its own faith? He trusted it was not.

Mr. POTTER objected to the present motion. He said the State of New York was a debtor, or not. She would either show herself not to be a debtor, or pay. But to pass this resolution, would be to consider them as swindlers. If it was a debt, he was confident they would pay it.

Mr. P. said, he could not account for the manner in which the gentlemen from New York had managed this subject. In one place, they say they have no authority to act, and yet, in the next moment, they proceed to oppose the resolution to call upon their State for the debt, as if they supposed that, unless they opposed the matter, their State would be so simple and honest as to pay, without objection. But, for his part, until he knew whether the State would pay this debt, or not, he should believe they would pay it honorably.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose to vindicate the conduct of the New York members in speaking on the subject—he also wished to know why the resolution should be levelled at New York only; he considered it as very unfair dealing. He said, they only contended, if the settlement was fair, the demand would be complied with; until they were convinced of that, it could not be expected. He would ask, respecting the motion under consideration—was it fair for them to lay their hands on all they could, because it was in their power? The gentleman who brought forward this second resolution, perhaps, knew that the State he represented had no money in the United States' fund, else he would not have moved it. He asked again, why they should aim at New York alone, when Delaware and other States were in a like situation?

Mr. GALLATIN wished the mover to modify the resolution, so that it should not affect any State to a greater amount than the debt they owed. For instance, the balance against Pennsylvania was about eighty thousand dollars, but she had upwards of four hundred thousand in the funds, and he should wish that the provision should not reach to a higher sum than the eighty thousand. He said, he had, however, no sort of view to Pennsylvania, because he believed she would make no objection to fulfil her engagements.

An amendment to this effect was introduced, when the question was put and negatived—45 to 30.

The original resolution being under consideration—

Mr. HENDERSON said, he should not have risen, but for an observation of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GILBERT.] That gentleman had said, "that he did not believe there was a member of that Committee who really believed the balance found against the State of New York to be just." Mr. H. said, if he were of this opinion, he should vote against the resolution; but, believing, as he did, that the balances were just, being settled by men of abilities and integrity, who had no interest to do other than right, and as no objection had ever been made by any of the States against the balances, he should think himself unfaithful to his constituents, if he did not vote for it. He begged, therefore, the gentleman would except him from the number who did not believe the debt just.

Mr. GILBERT allowed the gentleman might be an exception; he again adverted to the services and sufferings of New York during the war, observing, with respect to the settlement, that, while other States brought everything, and circumstance, and more than all in their account, New York brought nothing but what was fair and upright; and that they cast nearly a million of dollars more, for the support of the whole, than all the delinquent States put together.

Mr. THATCHER would tell the gentleman that he believed from his heart, that the debt was just.

Mr. POTTER said, one gentleman from New York talked of the great exertions of that State in the war, another came forward and said, he did not believe there was a member in the House who believed in his heart the debt was just. Every State in the Union, he said, might come forward and boast of what they had done; but it would serve little purpose; for his part, he believed New York had done the least, and been benefited more than any two States. He wished, also, to be excepted from the gentleman's account. He thought the debt just.

Mr. BURGESS.—Mr. Chairman, the State of North Carolina is among those called debtor States—her Representatives feel some of the observations which have been made, forcibly—that North Carolina is unwilling to pay just demands they cannot concede; that she is not willing to pay this demand, they do believe; and yet, I am not prepared to assert this an unjust one. The amendment lately negatived might have given means to have quieted, or have justified her—gentlemen, however, thought it a dangerous one—perhaps it was. That amendment might have precluded them from the means of satisfying her how the exertions, expenses, or sufferings of sister States, so far exceeded hers, as to leave her, justly, so great a debtor; and believing as she does, that she did all she could—are her Representatives to blame for opposing the present resolution on your table? I beg gentlemen to consider the extent of this demand, and the small resources of revenue North Carolina possesses, and ever has possessed—I believe, sir, I am correct in saying, it nearly equals the one-half of the aggregate amount of her nett revenues from her charter from Charles the Second, until the commencement of the war. This, sir, is no trifling aggravation. Will gentlemen stop, then, one moment? will they reflect? Will the dignity of the United States be promoted by receding from a demand, earnestly, solemnly made? How? where? where is it to be made? If just, sir, I would ask, is it prudent? But will the State of North Carolina, with the information it possesses, think it just? Permit me, sir, gentlemen have spoken of what other States have done, and of what they have not done; with leave, I will state a little of what North Carolina has done and suffered—of what she has not done—of what she cannot do—and of what, I fear, she will both do and suffer. But just let me say what she was, is, and may be. I have not been in the habit of troubling the House with long harangues, nor do I now intend to do it. As my voice is weak, and I am no orator, I must beg a patient indulgence.

Debts due from States.

Sir, North Carolina was, before the war, a wide extended territory of eighty or ninety thousand square miles, with less than two hundred thousand inhabitants, consisting of farmers, planters, laborers, and hunters—in spacious settlements—without great cities—with little money, and not much capital—with numerous flocks and herds—no rich men, and but few paupers. Perhaps, in no known country of the world was property more equally divided, the inhabitants less dependent on or united with each other, with a revenue short of fifty thousand dollars, and with little public debt.

North Carolina, sir, now has less than half her former extent of territory; and, according to the last census, nearly double the number of inhabitants. Ruined cities, desolated villages, deserted farms, a few rich and many poor, little increase of revenue, and a public debt glaring her in the face—increased to the amount of twenty years of her revenue. She has no claim to the character of a commercial country: she possesses small resources, and she has nearly lost, by at least, the ill-timed, however well-intended interposition of sister States, all value in a species of property, once of considerable estimation; a species of property which the Almighty, in wrath to our forefathers, suffered to be entailed on us, and which it is hardly possible she can be happy with, and most certain, for a time at least, with her present habits, be so without.

North Carolina has some resources which time may mature, to an independent, happy mediocrity. If she cannot figure with her commercial sister States, and aid you with extensive revenues of her own collection, she will be a great consumer—her sons love good cheer and fine clothes—they are numerous, and return your merchants their imposts with handsome profits. Witness the Newbern principalities, so conspicuous in all the great commercial States. She may not, if you check her, give you numerous, independent, and faithful citizens, and armies of hardy soldiers.

Of what North Carolina has done in the common cause, she will not boast, to lessen the comparative merit of sister States. She did all she could—so did others—mighty was the struggle—rich the prize—contested and glorious the result. But, sir, North Carolina was the first theatre of war—the blockade of Boston excepted. Unfortunately her citizens were of divided politics; this the English Government knew, and made there the first efforts—thousands joined them—internal war raged with violence: to which your Journals bear ample testimony, by the well-earned laurels so liberally then bestowed to the success of the advocates of liberty. But, alas! the fire was kindled—for seventeen years and upwards, her villages, fields, and forests, were never free from the inroads of the enemy, aided by her misguided sons. From the Virginia line to the Southern boundary—from the shores of the Atlantic to the Indian settlements, was this devoted country exposed to domestic, foreign, and savage cruelty; a scene of desolation, fire, and sword; while, far removed from the seat of preparation and power, she was constrained to exceed her own resources. Twenty millions of dollars were emitted; several millions of which exchanged for service and supplies, and sunk in possession of the holders, to the ruin of her citizens; nor is she able to indemnify them. This falling discount was incurable; and with this, the over-rigid economy of her agents rendered doubly oppressive. I appeal to her records for the truth of this, and ask, was this the case in all the States? No, sir. From these two sources is her present disastrous state and mighty debt. The detail is better conceived than expressed—to justify ourselves, rather than accuse others, is my object.

Again, sir, North Carolina independently gained and gave up as common stock, for liquidation of public expense, more than half her territory. Although some of her ablest statesmen wept at the surrender, she was deaf to their remonstrances. I ask gentlemen if she would have done thus, had she expected the present demand? Besides, sir, North Carolina, conscious that her convulsed state, and other circumstances above adduced, would prevent an arrangement of accounts that would secure her equal justice, was opposed to the assumption by which this debt is created. I do not make this matter of merit, but state it as a natural cause that may increase her discontent.

Again, sir, North Carolina, far removed from the seat of public information, and with little advantages of frequent commercial intercourse, had not the opportunity of equal benefit from the pittance of the rigid economy which her agents had left her citizens. With honest indignation, she now reflects that her public securities are swept away by foreigners and citizens who, with more prompt information, perverted her every village and almost every farm, as the enemy, in time of war, and with little less fatality, and almost without money and without price.

Again, sir, I would observe, of what North Carolina cannot do. I beg her pardon, if I under-rate her; but I do believe she cannot pay the demand, with the accruing interest, and provide for her own Government; the more especially so, if the apportionment of direct taxes contemplated should obtain, without unreasonably and unequally burdening that part of your citizens.

North Carolina, I fear, sir. I greatly fear, contemplating what she was, what she now is, what she may be, if only equally burdened, relative circumstances considered, and what she has done and suffered—what she has not done, and what she cannot do—will really complain, and be convulsed to the very centre.

North Carolina, sir, claims, her Representatives conceive she may, with modest decency demand, that the claims contained in the resolution on your table, if not relinquished, should be suspended. I appeal, sir, with confidence—I appeal to the candor, the feeling of every gentleman on this floor. can it be doubted but that her exertions, her sufferings during the war, and her apparent willingness since, to contribute to the common fund, by her so liberal and extensive cession, entitle her to at least the last, if not the first, of these requests?

Mr. S. SMITH said, he was one of those who could have wished the present subject had not been brought before the House; but, being before it, he was ready to give his vote for the measure, as it was incumbent upon them to endeavor to get the balances paid. The gentlemen from New York and North Carolina, had complained of the injustice of the debt. The State which he represented, he said, was a debtor State, and they were willing and able to pay. The gentlemen from New York, it appeared, were anxious to have the whole subject opened again. One of those gentlemen gave as a reason for this, that stores in the account were charged more in one State than in another. He saw no injury in this, as flour might be purchased in Virginia at seven dollars a barrel, when, in Pennsylvania, it might be eleven. This single objection showed what cavilling would be the consequence of an opening anew the accounts.

Mr. S. said, it appeared to him that the State of North Carolina had less reason to complain than any other State in the Union. He did not mean to say that they exerted themselves less; and, he believed, the exertions of New York were not exceeded, according to her means, by any other State.

An observation, he said, had been made, on the subject of assumptions, by a gentleman from North Carolina. He meant not to have ripped up this subject afresh; but, since it had been mentioned, he would say that their debt had been occasioned by too high an assumption; if that had not been the case, they would have had to receive a very considerable sum. New York, he said, assumed her debt at two millions, of which she received one million two hundred thousand. Let her, said he, disgorge that sum. How, he asked, did New York get possession of her treasure? By the blood and treasure of the whole, in her vacant territory. This was the way in which she became rich; and it was extraordinary that a State which had gained so much by the Revolution, should be averse from disgorging her just debt. How they were to get at this debt he knew not, but they must pay. It was doubted it would not be paid; but he trusted that a State, famed for her order and good government, would not refuse to pay a debt so justly due. It was a large State, and, he thought, able to pay, and it was but just.

When the mode of settlement was agreed to, Mr. S. said, none knew who would be debtors and who creditors. All acquiesced in it. Why, then, talk about going anew into the subject, which might take them a year to settle the principles upon which it should be opened.

He trusted these balances would be paid, as the Representatives of creditor States would be very unwilling to lay a direct tax upon their constituents until they were discharged.

Mr. GILBERT rose to explain to gentlemen who thought the New York members had said, that their State would not pay—they said it would not be willing to pay, unless it knew for what, and that accounts were fairly settled. The assumption, he said, was made out then by the corresponding census; why, then, should they disgorge what the United States assumed to them more than any other State?

Mr. BLOUNT observed, that he had said so much on a former occasion upon this subject, and knowing that whatever he might say would have no effect upon the decision, he meant to have satisfied himself with showing by the yeas and nays, that he had not been consenting to the measure. But when he heard the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] say, "North Carolina had less reason than any other State to complain," it would have been criminal in him to have been silent. He had made the assertion without a single fact—it could not be true. He believed the United States would not believe it. Were not Georgia and South Carolina, Mr. B. asked, defended by North Carolina? Could it have been believed that Georgia was a creditor State, when charged on the ratio of two Representatives, when entitled to less than one? Some part of the war, he said, Georgia had not more than five hundred inhabitants. Had not South Carolina militia from North Carolina in almost every month of the war? Such an assertion was one, that, on reflection, the gentleman would be ashamed of having made; he should call for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. S. SMITH defended his assertion, which he grounded on her debt having been very considerably over-assumed.

Mr. BLOUNT said, if they had no other grounds of complaint, they should have complained of this. If North Carolina had had no debt assumed, he said, she would have been a creditor for more than two millions. She would have sunk the debt, instead of having a debt of more than four hundred and thirty thousand at home, and under a charge of owing to the United States more than five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said that it was extraordinary, that gentlemen should be continually insisting upon the impropriety of going into an inquiry, whether the claims in question were just or unjust, yet they themselves went into comparisons betwixt the services of different States. He would not make any comparison on the subject; but he would do what he thought necessary, viz : testify to the world his objections to the present proceedings. He had already taken up so much time of the Committee, which, however, had been mostly employed in fruitless attempts to get the subject postponed, that he should be unwilling then to trespass long upon their patience.

This business, he said, originated under the Old Confederation. The States agreed upon an order for the settlement of their debts, but in the new Constitution, they entered into no new Governmental compact for the settlement of these debts, so that it was found to be necessary to take up the subject. They, therefore, found two laws passed. Here, he said, was the great evil which New York had to complain of. Here, every State who wished to set aside the settlement should point. The United States, who was a party concerned, passed a law appointing Commissioners and prescribing rules to govern the two parties, without any delegation from the States. All the States, he said, would always have an interest in throwing a burden upon one State; and the injustice complained of would appear, if it was shown that this was done. It was not only their interest, he said, to do this, but rules had actually been prescribed which were unjust to some of the States. This law, he said, was passed. New York had no Representatives in the matter who had power to bind her to this new settlement. The amount of that State was kept clear and regular, with vouchers to every charge; but in this law, it was allowed to the Commissioners to receive accounts unsupported by vouchers, if they should see proper. He asked if this were just to those who had been scrupulously correct? If it were just, he thanked God he had never learnt or practised upon such principles of justice. Another rule established was, how the debt should be divided amongst the different States. The States had prescribed rules, under the Old Confederation, but these were changed by this law. It was now settled that the rule of apportionment should be made upon a scale of population. How this affected New York had been shown by one of his colleagues, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] From forty or fifty thousand inhabitants, which was about their number at the conclusion of the war, from emigration, they had then one hundred and thirty, or one hundred and forty thousand. He asked, therefore, whether this rule was just? If it was not, how could gentlemen be charged with advocating unfounded positions, and even have a week's delay refused to gain information on the subject. It was his opinion these arguments had weight; but, perhaps, his opinion might not have much weight with the Committee.

But, setting aside the principle of apportioning the debt, taking it for granted that New York consented to the whole, still, he said, there were principles even in common law, under an award, which this business had been likened to, that would enable them to attain relief under their complaints. It was impossible; time had not been allowed them to do it, to bring forward vouchers; otherwise they should have proved that such overcharges had been made by other States as would have convinced that House of the propriety of setting aside this settlement; but, not having these vouchers, he would say no more on this head.

The rules of settlement being changed without their consent, being, in their opinion, unjust, if it was in vain that he appealed to the justice and equity of the House, he would appeal to the expediency of the present measure. The debt, he said, might be just. He would not be understood as saying that the State of New York considered the debt as unjust, but he thought she did. Thinking it unjust, the probability was she would refuse to pay it, and produce her vouchers to the world, to show that she ought not to pay it. In what situation would the United States then be?

The State of New York was not to be looked upon as an individual—it was a sovereign, independent State of the Union; persuaded of the injustice of the present claim, she would refuse to pay it. Already, said he, you would have taken one step; you have said you would be paid. They had been told, he said, by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. W. SMITH] of the advantages which would arise to the Union by the payment of this debt by the State of New York. He told them of the Navy, the Forts, &c., it would build. Indeed, he put him in mind of the exploits of Don Quixotte; for, though he had not built himself wind-mills, he had erected himself many beautiful castles in the air, which, he fancied, would have their proper effect upon the House.

He hoped the reasons he adduced, if they had not the effect to reject the proposition, would at least show that the State of New York had ground to be dissatisfied with the proceeding.

Mr. BALDWIN said, if the observations of the gentleman last up were well founded, there would be something to justify the House to cancel the debts; but he thought it could be plainly proved they were not. If the gentleman would give himself the trouble to look at the old ordinance, he would find the whole of the settlement accompanied by vouchers of incontestable authority; the Commissioners admitted of nothing but real parole evidence; they heard the story, examined the evidence, and then reported what was their best judgment of the true settlement. Mr. B. also answered to the observation of the member on the obscurity of the settlement. He observed that it would be inconsistent, improper, and almost impossible, to go back again into the settlement. He said that the settlement was authorized by three several unanimous acts of the Government, which he thought sufficiently good auspices to warrant a procedure; and as good as could be expected, were the settlement to begin again. Mr. B. said, such a scene as was exhibited at the commencement of the sitting of the Commissioners perhaps never before occurred; it appeared as though all the individual States were in severe conflict with the United States to obtain their settlements; it was done with closed doors. Such a scene he hoped never again to witness.

As for the State he lived in, they had been paying and paying, and yet found themselves unable to settle their accounts. She would not have been a creditor State in this balance had not her debt been assumed at three hundred thousand dollars instead of seven hundred thousand dollars. There was a bill brought in to assume her at the other four hundred thousand, but it fell through, either in this House or the Senate, by which she became a creditor to a small amount.

Mr. POTTER said, the gentleman from New York ought not to complain that the demand was unconstitutional, when, if there was any grievance, it ought to have been made at the time when the census was taken. They appointed agents to go before the Commissioners; they then agreed to the measure, and if it had turned to their advantage, most likely they would not have now objected. If they had any vouchers, then would have been the time to have produced them, and not have stopped three years before a complaint was to be heard. New York, he said, was fond of funding and assumption systems, but not of re-funding. Their objections to the settlement were improper at present. He wished the question to be taken.

The question was then put and carried—ayes 53.

The Committee then rose, and on motion being made for the House to take up the business,

Mr. CHRISTIE hoped the House would adjourn. He had no doubt the gentleman from New York meant to give them a few more long speeches on the occasion, and he did not wish to stay then to hear them.

On the motion for adjournment, there were—ayes 39, noes 38.

So the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 5.

Mr. DENT requested to be excused from serving on the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, which was granted, and Mr. S. SMITH appointed in his place.

BALANCES DUE BY STATES.

The House then, according to the order of the day, took up the report of the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the State debts.

The first resolution was read as follows:

“Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to give information to the several States who were, by the Commissioners appointed to settle accounts between the United States and the individual States, found indebted to the United States of the several sums in which they were so found indebted, accompanying such information with a statement of interest from the last day of December, 1789, to the first day of January, 1797, calculated on the same principles on which interest has been allowed and either funded or paid on the correspondent sums for which the United States were found, by the said Commissioners, indebted to certain States; and with an earnest request that they will cause provision to be made, as speedily as may be, for paying the said sums, respectively, for which they were found indebted by the said Commissioners, with interest, into the Treasury of the United States.”

Mr. GALLATIN moved to amend the resolution by adding the words, “either funded or,” printed in italic; which was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT called for the yeas and nays on the decision.

Mr. HOLLAND said, before the question was taken, he would beg the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, whilst he showed his objections to the resolutions before them. In doing this, he said, he felt himself under considerable embarrassment, from a knowledge that the House was pretty much tired of the debate.

He said, they had no other evidence of the debts in question but the report of the Commissioners. If he was convinced the debts were just, he should be the last person to object to them; but when he considered the circumstances attending the report, and the way in which it was brought about, he very much doubted the justice of it. It might be remarked, that the Commissioners were from States which would be gainers by the settlement, all of them being creditors.

[The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman that the report was not to be considered as the report of the select committee, but as resolutions agreed to by the Committee of the Whole.]

Mr. H. said, he was speaking of the report of the Commissioners. Constant attempts, he said, had been made to keep the principles upon which the Commissioners acted out of sight. This seemed to wrap the matter still more in mystery. For what purpose, he asked, were these kept out of sight? If they were proper, they could not suffer by being brought into view. But this, it seemed, could not be done. Even one of the Commissioners, he said, was the person who brought forward a resolution to strike out the balances due from the several States. What could this arise from but from a conviction that the settlement operated unequally?

The circumstances carried something in them very suspicious; but when he heard gentlemen say that the creditor States were permitted to reckon State paper depreciated three and four for one, whilst other States were not so admitted, he was still more inclined to doubt the truth and justice of the settlement.

The peculiar situation of North Carolina was such, he said, as must make their debt, at first view, appear unjust. At that time the State had an existing Board of Army Accounts; but, in consequence of the suspicion of some fraud, its proceedings were arrested, and before a second Board was formed this settlement was made. In consequence of which, North Carolina was prevented from bringing forward accounts which she otherwise would have brought forward. This was enough to show the hardship of the settlement on that State, and to justify his vote against the present question.

It had been said that it was too late to bring forward these objections at this time, and that they should have been brought forward earlier to have had any weight. Had they not been brought forward before, this objection might have some weight. But, he asked, if there had not been objections made to the assumption and funding systems, against the admission of the Commissioners' report on the books of the Treasury? And whether an attempt was not made to have struck out the balances said to be due from the debtor States?

The business had always been taken up in a Legislative capacity, and gentlemen made a point of supporting what they conceived to be the interest of their several States. Not a single member from the creditor States had supported the injustice of the settlement. It might be in consequence of this disposition that the minority had always been borne down, and, he feared, would then be borne down. Pecuniary considerations seemed to have a strong influence on gentlemen in that House. Every thing last session, he said, gave way to pecuniary considerations. Nothing was heard at that time but the promotion of commerce. In consequence, they had entered into the British Treaty. They were still actuated by the same desire of pecuniary interest. They were now determined to raise money; and, because it could not be raised from any other source, it must be levied upon sister States. It put him in mind, he said, of a bark wrecked at sea, when all its stores were lost, and some desperate measures were to be taken to save themselves; but, though the United States might be in considerable pecuniary distress, he trusted they should not adopt the measure now proposed.

Mr. PAGE.—The question before you, sir, appeared to me, when first offered to this House, to be of so delicate a nature that I wished to get rid of it; and therefore I voted to put off the further consideration of it until the next session of Congress. I foresaw the loss of time it would occasion now, and dreaded the altercation and warmth it was calculated to produce at a time when all possible occasion for altercation and warmth should be avoided. I confess I thought, too, that a postponement of the question till next session would be conciliatory to the debtor States; prevent unnecessary and ill-timed warmth in them, and be a sufficient notification of the claims of the creditor States. I confess also, sir, that I thought the debtor States would then come forward and pay their balances; or, with temper and respect, state their difficulties as to their ability to pay; or their objections to the settlement of their respective accounts. And I am free to declare that I think it would well become the wisdom and justice of Congress to receive and consider such statements, and to relinquish all claim to a balance due from a sister State, when inability to pay is its apology for non-compliance with the requisition of the law, (which I look upon as in fact made upon the passing of the act.) and to revise the settlement of the Commissioners by a committee of a member from every State in the Union, rather than to require of some what is impracticable, and of other States what they firmly believe it is unjust to demand. The settlement of accounts between the States by the Commissioners has been compared to an arbitration between individuals; but, granting the comparison holds good in every respect, which I doubt, an honest creditor would surely not object to a re-hearing, or to a new reference, if his debtor declared that he could produce new vouchers for credits which had not been produced at the first arbitration, and could prove that there were errors in both the debits and credits to the prejudice of the debtor. But even if an honest creditor could refuse a new hearing, or a second reference to arbitrators, it does not follow that the Representatives of sovereign States, confederated for their mutual strength and support, and which, by the co-operation of all of them, have been rescued from oppression, and have been enabled to establish their independence, and an happy form of Government, under which those Representatives are voting, and whose chief duty it is to promote the general welfare—I say, it does not follow that the Representatives of such States, so circumstanced, should act like individual merchants, and be bound by the same rules of rigid justice (if it may be so called) as a merchant, whose credit may be destroyed, or his capital in trade injured, were he to abandon the advantage gained by an arbitration in his favor. God forbid, sir! that this House should ever treat a sister State as one merchant is frequently induced to treat another. I would rather this moment agree to give the debtor States credit, on the books of the Treasury, as was proposed by the honest and candid member who had been one of the Commissioners, to whom the member from New York [Mr. GILBERT] alluded yesterday, than to have agreed to sequester the property of those States in our funds, as has been proposed.

I look upon the business before us, sir, as part of that unfinished, impracticable business of the Old Confederation; and although I believe a requisition for quotas of any sum which may be required of the States for the support of our Government and for payment of the principal and interest of the National Debt, would be duly respected by the States, yet I fear the one now proposed would be as ineffectual as under the Confederation. I wish therefore to avoid the risk of national authority—the whole balances are not worth the risk of loss of authority over the States; or of exciting discontent in a single State. Members who make light of the ill-will of sister States, were not present when the endearing arguments were used in favor of the assumption of the State debts—pure paternal affection and Federal principles led to the vote for paying the debts of the sister States, contracted (as it was said) “in their joint and glorious struggle for their liberties.” I fear, sir, if the same argument will not induce this House to consent to make the expenses of all the States in that struggle, a joint expense, it will be said that either Federalism and fraternal affection have declined amongst us, and avarice has taken their place; or, that the assumption of the State debts was intended more to increase the National Debt and the funded stock than to diminish the State debts; and to gain an influence over the States, than to show them the fraternal regard of Congress. I agree with the member from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] that had the accounts between the States been first settled, the assumption of the balances due would have appeared more intelligible; but to States which know that their vouchers for large contributions and payments were destroyed by the enemy, for which they could receive no credits, and that the lands they gave to the United States were more than sufficient to pay all their debts and those of the debtor States together—I say, to States who know this, and are in this situation, it is not enough to make the statement intelligible to them. As the case stands, it is not very intelligible; but I can see how it may be made a part of the funding system and assumption, and so become intelligible: that is, by emitting stock to the amount of the balances due, and paying it to the creditor States; making its interest and time of redemption such as Congress may think proper; and this I had rather do than have a contest between the debtor and creditor States, as much as I dislike the assumption and funding system. Thinking thus, I shall vote against agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole.

Debts due from States.

Mr. KITCHELL said, he should not have troubled the House with a single observation, had gentlemen not given an idea of their wish to strike out this balance, whether just or unjust. Some States had done more, and some less, during the war, but he thought it extremely unjust for the creditor States to suffer on account of the delinquency of others: he thought the idea of striking off, could be only supported by members from the debtor States. Taking it in any form, he contended, it would be very unjust to tax the creditor States while these debts remained unpaid. He thought no fair, just, and honorable person could conceive it proper.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he would make a single observation, which was rather of a personal nature. It had been said, that one of the Commissioners, who was a member of that House, had been in favor of striking out the balances due from the debtor States. He believed the gentleman alluded to was a member from Pennsylvania. Mr. G. said he was not a member of the House at that time, but he had looked into the proceedings of that period, and he found he did not vote on any question on the bill itself. There was one question, however, on which he did vote. It was for an inquiry into the principles upon which the accounts had been settled, and he voted in favor of it. He hoped, therefore, they should hear no more objections of this kind.

Mr. GILBERT rose to answer to the observations of the two gentlemen last up, and still supported his assertion, that one of the Commissioners had moved to strike out the balances; he did not know whether his name appeared on the Journal of the House or not. In answer to the gentleman of Jersey, he would only say, that there not being an application for appeal against this measure before now, did not prove the justness of the debt: they were never asked for it till now.

Mr. KITCHELL again rose and said, he thought the silence of the States heretofore seemed a good proof of the justice of the settlement. However, he thought as the Legislatures had not made application, no attention ought to be paid to individuals.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if gentlemen would recur to the Journals of the House, they would find that the Representatives of the debtor States had uniformly opposed this mode of settlement; but as it had never gone to the State Legislature, he thought that a good reason why they had never complained; they never had been applied to.

The question on the first resolution was then taken, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 27, as follows:

The second resolution then came under consideration, which reads thus:

Resolved, That payment of the said sums respectively found due from the said States, [by the said Commissioners, with interest thereon at 4 per cent. per annum, from the last day of December, 1789, to the first day of January, 1795,] may be received in any of the six, three per cent. stock, or deferred stock of the United States, in the same proportions as the United States have paid and allowed for the correspondent sums in which they were found indebted to certain States, by the report of the said Commissioners."

Mr. COIT moved to add to this resolution the words printed in brackets. The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

It was ordered that the Clerk do carry these resolutions, as amended, to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

Mr. KITCHELL wished to move an additional resolution, to the same effect with one which had already been negatived, and upon the decision of which he should call for the yeas and nays. It appeared to him just that the balances should be paid; and he should think himself inexcusable were he to omit any opportunity of endeavoring to get the money. He himself had entertained no doubt but the State of New York, as well as the other States, would have paid their debt, until the members from that State had said she would not pay. If this was their opinion, he thought the House would act an unwise part, and it would be said they were spending their time in vain if they did not use means to get the money. He therefore moved a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That all transfers of debt of the United States in the books of the Treasury, by any of the States indebted to the United States, on a settlement made by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose, or any person holding the debts of the said States, to the amount of their respective balances, be prohibited until the payment of the balances of the said States respectively."

Mr. COOPER hoped the question would be taken, without debate. He thought it too disgraceful to be discussed.

Mr. HENDERSON wished to amend the motion, by striking out the word "prohibited," and inserting, "suspended till further order of Congress."

Mr. KITCHELL had no objection to the amendment.

Mr. VENABLE suggested whether it would not be proper to pass a law on the occasion? As there was a law making the stock transferable, he believed it was necessary to have a law to repeal it. He believed a resolution would not repeal a law.

Mr. NICHOLAS never heard before that a resolution was incompetent to its object: it went through all the forms of a law, as the PRESIDENT must approve of it. However, if gentlemen thought it ought to be postponed and carried through a more formal process, he should not object, but he thought this quite competent. All that was requisite to make it perfectly effectual, he thought was included in the resolution, without spending the time the other procedure would take.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, in some things it may not be necessary to proceed by that form; but he thought in a thing of so much importance as this, it ought to go through the House in the form of a bill, first brought in and received its second and third reading. And if it was not so done, he thought it would not have the same operation as a law.

Mr. HARTLEY hoped a question would be taken upon the resolution as offered; another resolution may then be added, directing a committee to bring in a bill conformable to it. He hoped it would not go on in this extraordinary way, so much opposed to the moderate measures which had marked their proceeding, but take the question as it is at present.

Mr. PAGE said, that he thought such a motion highly improper, not only as it had been rejected by the House, as improper to be submitted to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole, on account of its mischievous tendency; and also, as it had been rejected by a large majority of that Committee to which it was proposed, notwithstanding the refusal of the House to refer it; but because it certainly was, as it had been represented in the debates on those occasions, an indelicate and irritating measure, an insult to the debtor States, and at the same time injurious to public faith, and the credit of the funds. He thought the motion out of order, or, if not contrary to the written orders of the House, it appeared to him to be contrary to a rule which ought to be immutable, and written on every member's heart. I mean, said Mr. P., a regard for propriety and decency; a regard to which, in my opinion, should lead members to acquiesce in the rejection of their motions, under such circumstances as have occurred on the present occasion. Independent of this consideration, he thought that the amendment proposed so materially altered the original resolution, and was so calculated to produce warm and tedious debates in the House, and to excite resentment in the debtor States, and was also so absolutely unnecessary to be agreed to at this time, that he hoped the question would not now be put, and to prevent it he moved for the previous question.

Mr. KITCHELL said, he took it for granted, that he went no further than perfectly accorded with the rules of the House, for which he appealed to the Chair. The SPEAKER informed the member, that it was consistent with order.

The previous question was then called for, to wit: "Shall the main question to agree to the said resolution now be put?"

And on the previous question, "Shall the main question be now put?" it passed in the negative—yeas 23, nays 62, as follows:

STATEMENT—Continued.

States.	Sums in State debts, which, had no assumption taken place before the settlement of accounts, it would have been necessary to assume in order to render the aggregate of the ultimate balance due to and from the several States equal to the aggregate of the balances now due to and from the several States.	Proportion of each State of the aggregate sum which it would have been necessary to assume per the preceding column.	Ultimate balances which would have been due to and from the several States, had no assumption taken place before the settlement of accounts, but had the sums mentioned in the last column but one been respectively assumed for certain States after the settlement of accounts.		Sums to be deducted from sums originally assumed for each State, supposing the interest accrued during 1790, '91, upon State debts, as summed for said States, had not been charged to said States in the settlement of their accounts.	Proportion of the sums to be deducted from the original assumption, according to the supposition of the preceding column.	Balances which would have been found for and against the interest accrued during 1790 and 1791, upon the State debts originally assumed for the said States, had not been charged to the said States in the settlement of accounts.

Monsieur Poirey—Encouragement to Miners.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HENDERSON said, that every day's experience convinced him of the propriety of adopting some rule to close upon petitions which had already been decided upon by the House; for, if petitioners were permitted to bring forward their claims session after session, when they had already been rejected, they might be wholly employed in the business. In order to bring the question before the House, he proposed a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, further rules are necessary to be adopted by this House, and added to the Standing Rules of the House."

The resolution was agreed to—ayes 31, noes 24.

Messrs. MUHLENBERG, BALDWIN, and HENDERSON, were appointed a committee pursuant thereto.

MONSIEUR POIREY.

Mr. MADISON called up the report of the Secretary of War, on the petition of Monsieur Poirey, formerly Secretary and Aid-de-camp to the Marquis Lafayette.

The report is dated the 5th of April, 1796. It states that the petitioner may have performed the duties of Aid-de-camp to the Marquis, but it is not certain whether he was only a supernumerary aid. His exact services cannot be precisely defined, without access could be had to the general orders issued by the Commander-in-Chief, and Major-General Lafayette. It appears that M. Poirey never received pay, as Secretary or Aid-de-camp. As to his pay in the former capacity, two resolutions of Congress, dated June 17, 1777, stipulate the one, that the pay of a secretary to a Brigadier General in a separate command, is to be fifty dollars per month; and the other, that the pay of the secretary of the Commander-in-Chief in the Northern department, be sixty dollars per month.

Supposing M. Poirey to come under this description, the objections are a tacit waiver of it, as stated in his petition, and the act of limitations. Both exclude the petitioner. But the Secretary of War hints, that perhaps he may be more favorably looked upon, as he waived claiming his pay when it might have been had. He only recurred to it, when misfortune and distress made the application a duty. He was beyond sea when the act of limitation passed, and probably knew nothing about it.

Mr. MADISON moved that a bill should be brought in. It was objected by Mr. MACON, that this gentleman, by a refusal of his claim, would be in no worse situation than hundreds of old soldiers who had petitioned the House without having known any thing about the statute of limitations. They had been refused, and on the same ground so should this petitioner be.

The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. S. SMITH proposed the following resolution to the House:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, amendments may be necessary to the act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States?"

MESSRS. S. SMITH, HARTLEY, PARKER, VAN CORTLANDT, and DEARBORN, were appointed a committee pursuant to the same.

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

Mr. GALLATIN proposed the following resolution to the House:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the progress made in carrying into effect the act providing for the sale of lands in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river, and also whether any, and if any, what, alterations are necessary in the same?"

Mr. MADISON submitted it to the mover whether it might not be more proper immediately to make the inquiry of the proper Department, without a committee? In general he did not see the necessity of a committee when the application would be immediately made to the Department.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he was not very well informed as to the propriety of his motion. His reason for bringing forward the resolution was, that in our present great want of revenue, he wished to know whether we had any prospect of receiving anything from the sale of our lands? He feared we had not much to expect from it at present. He believed a committee would be proper. A committee of five was appointed.

JOHN CLEVES SYMMES.

Mr. HENDERSON called up the order of the day on the claim of John Cleves Symmes.

Mr. GALLATIN wished, if in order, it might be referred to a select committee. He observed there were a number of papers relative to it which were necessary to be examined, that the Attorney General did not give all the information that was necessary on the subject, he would therefore move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of it, in order to recommit it, as he wished it to be brought to a proper issue.

Mr. KITCHELL did not know that he should object to this proposition, but observed that last session it was referred to a select committee; after sitting on it some time, it was referred to the Attorney General; now referred to a Committee of the Whole, and proposed to be recommitted. He thought this might be saved if gentlemen would give themselves the trouble to examine the papers.

After some observations from Messrs. HENDERSON and GILBERT, it was referred to Messrs. GALLATIN, VENABLE, HAVENS, AMES, and SHERBURNE, to examine and report thereon.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO MINING.

Mr. HENDERSON called for the order of the day on the report of the committee of February 12th, 1796, to whom was referred the memorial of Nicholas J. Roosevelt, and Jacob Mark.

The following report of the select committee was read, viz:

"That the said memorialists having procured from the mining countries in Europe, a number of men, well-skilled in the arts of mineralogy and metallurgy, have them now in the United States, either connected with, or employed by them.

"That, by their means, they offer to explore the Territory of the United States, for mines of metals, semi-metals, and all other minerals; provided a reasonable time be allowed them to make the search, and the right of working the mines, when discovered, be exclusively vested in them, for a sufficient period; they rendering a proper proportion of the gross product to the United States.

"The Committee are of opinion, that their offers merit the attention and encouragement of Congress; the general use of all metals, and of most minerals, rendering it a very desirable object to possess them within our own limits. Appearances, too, as your committee are informed, justify the opinion, that many valuable mines do exist within the Territory of the United States, which can only be rendered useful, by that skill and knowledge of the subject, which the peculiar circumstances of Europe enable the memorialists to offer.

"Your committee, therefore, recommend the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That a right be granted to Nicholas Roosevelt and Jacob Mark, and their associates, during the term of — years, to enter upon any of the waste lands in the Territory of the United States, the Indian title whereof is extinguished, to search and explore the same, for mines of metals, semi-metals, and all other minerals.

"Resolved, That the right of working all such mines as shall be discovered by the said Nicholas Roosevelt and Jacob Mark, and their associates, shall be vested in them, for the term of — years; they rendering an equitable proportion of the gross product of such mines to the United States."

Mr. SWIFT objected to the report, as making a grant without a valuable consideration. To make a grant of this kind, he said, would embarrass the property of the United States. To allow such persons to search for mines and erect machines for working them, would greatly lessen the value of our lands. He hoped, therefore, that the report would be disagreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON believed the gentleman from Connecticut had not attended sufficiently to the resolution before the Committee, when he asserted that it proposed to make a grant without consideration, as it was there said that they were to render a certain portion of the proceeds to the United States; so that if the business was profitable to them, it would be so to the United States. The consideration, he said, embraced two objects of public improvement, worthy the attention of Government. It would make us independent of foreign nations for the more precious and useful metals. If these metals, said he, lie entombed in the bowels of the earth, they are of no use to any one. This provision, he said, would encourage individuals to search and explore for these metals, and might eventually be productive to the revenue of the United States. In several parts of Europe, he believed, mines were of great value to the revenue. He was of opinion there were valuable mines in the United States, and an opportunity now offered of exploring them without expense to the Union. He saw no inconvenience that would arise from this, and several advantages. To go into a detail of the business was not necessary at present. The principle alone was what they had to determine upon. There might be exceptions made. He believed there ought to be some of the more common articles reserved; but he believed the more precious metals should be left to be explored by adventurous individuals. Instead of embarrassing our Territory, he believed it would be a means of promoting settlement, as wherever metals were found, population would take place, and the land would be increased in value. And it need not embarrass the sale, because the property of the metals might be sold with the land, if desired. Government, he said, would run no risk, would be at no expense, and the revenues would probably be increased.

Mr. GALLATIN thought such a principle would not have been supported. He hoped they should have allowed our own citizens to have found out our metals. To give a privilege to persons to work mines, and to enter upon any of our land, on such terms, would be a most extraordinary policy. The natural consequence would be the enhancement of the price of metal. He trusted the report would be disagreed to.

Mr. MACON said, that such a measure would give a monopoly of all the mines of the United States. The best policy, he believed, in all such cases, was to leave the business to the industry of our citizens. He believed they would work the mines, if it was their interest to do so; if it was not, he did not wish to offer them an inducement to do it.

Mr. HENDERSON did not wish the business to be confined to one set of adventurers. He would rather wish to encourage adventurers. It was meant only that when these persons found the mines, they should have the exclusive privilege of working them for a certain term.

The report was disagreed to, the Committee rose, and the House confirmed the disagreement.

FRIDAY, January 6.

WILLIAM FINDLEY, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat.

INVALID CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. D. FOSTER, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, on the 24th of December, 1795, on a return from the Accountant of the Treasury, on certain claims not admitted to be valid. This report classed the claims under different heads; and the Committee of Claims recommended an agreement to the whole, except the eleventh class, which included the petition of John T. Gilman, who prayed for compensation as a Commissioner for endorsing new-emission money, issued by Congress in March, 1780; which they recommended to be disagreed to, believing him to be entitled to his claim.

After some observations, chiefly urging the impropriety of deciding upon these claims in a mass, instead of individually; in order to obtain papers which were called for, and which were in the

STATEMENTS OF REVENUE.

Mr. HARPER called up the resolution which he laid upon the table the other day, calling for certain statements from the Treasury Department, relative to the revenues of the United States, within ten days after the meeting of each session.

Mr. GALLATIN wished the gentleman from South Carolina would amend his resolution, by adding a request for like statements for this session. As it might be alleged the notice was short, and complete statements could not be made out, it might be said, "such statements as could be conveniently furnished."

Mr. HARPER said, he thought of making a separate resolution for the purpose the gentleman had mentioned; but, on inquiry at the Treasury Office, and finding that such information had not been received there as would enable the Secretary to furnish a return, he declined it. This arose from the former order on this subject having been only temporary, and the officers in different parts of the Union not having instructions to forward the statements required. The resolution was agreed to.

ROBERT HARRIS.

Mr. CHRISTIE called for the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Robert Harris.

The petitioner, it appears, was a Captain of what was called the Flying Camp, in Maryland, during the late war. He raised his own company in 1776. In December, 1777, owing to the fatigues of the service, his health was impaired, and he left the service, and went over to the West Indies, for the benefit of his health. Before he went, it was said, (though it did not appear in evidence,) he applied to the Paymaster of the Army for his pay, but was only able to get two months' pay out of eleven, which was due. When he returned from the West Indies, in the year 1780, he applied to the Treasury for payment for the remaining nine months; when, instead of three hundred and sixty dollars, he was offered sixteen only, which was the amount due—reckoning upon the scale of depreciation which had taken place in his absence. This he refused to receive, and appeals to the justice of Congress for relief.

The following is part of the report of the Committee of Claims:

"As very many, indeed nearly all the officers and privates, under similar circumstances, have received their wages, by the rule established, as aforesaid; and as Captain Harris shows no reason why he did not receive his money from the Paymaster, the committee think it would be inexpedient to establish a new rule at this time; and are therefore of opinion his memorial ought not to be granted, and that he have leave to withdraw the same."

Mr. CHRISTIE said, that as the House were so much in the habit of agreeing to reports from the Committee of Claims, he despaired of making them disagree to this report. It was, however, a gross trick. The money was received back at its full worth at the Treasury.

Mr. FOSTER contended that after the money was given to the Paymaster, currency was in a constant state of depreciation. Whose was the money after it went into the hand of the Paymaster? It was that of Captain Harris, and he might at any time have received it. Captain H. did not call for it until it was sunk very low; and were the United States to suffer for his negligence in not calling? He presumed not. It was returned to the Treasury, and sunk in value before he came for it.

Mr. DEARBORN said, that it was common for officers to receive money at a depreciated rate; and the Paymaster not having money in hand, they had often been obliged to wait six or twelve months, and he could see no reason for making this depreciation more than others. It would be endless to go into all cases. Mr. Harris might have received his money at any time for two years. Mr. D. could not see why he should get the money at any higher rate than was current at the time when he called for it.

Mr. CRAIK wished to know, if Captain Harris had applied to the Paymaster for his money, and at what time?

Mr. D. FOSTER answered, it was impossible to know whether he did apply or not: he only knew, which he thought sufficient, that he might have received the money.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, that Captain Harris informed him that he did apply to the Paymaster when he left the service, and could only get two months pay out of eleven months. He said, Mr. DEARBORN knew well enough of its being possible to call on a Paymaster without getting money. When he left the service he could get no more than the pay for two months.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that Captain Harris resigned on the 9th of November, 1777; he soon after went to the West Indies; on coming back to the United States, he found that the money had been returned whole and sound to the Treasury, it had suffered no loss. The petitioner was not barred by the act of limitations, and as no possible injury could be sustained by the United States paying it; as they had received it in full, it was just that it should be paid. There was no other case like this.

Mr. MACON said that this would be like many other stories. There would never be any thing like it till the petition was granted. Last year there was a petition about the Northwestern Territory; the prayer was granted; and, soon after, the table was covered with petitions. Captain Harris went out of the country, and it was his own fault he did not make application in time. The consequences would be very great if the depreciation was to be made up to this man.

Mr. LYMAN said, that there was a harder case than this in Massachusetts. Two Paymasters ran away with $40,000. They were elected by the officers of the troops. The Paymasters are elected entirely by the officers, and it was doubtful if privates were bound by this election. Yet Congress refused to indemnify them; and Captain Harris's situation, whether he applied or not, could not be so hard as these men, who were never paid. If the House attended to this he hoped, in justice, they would take up all others on their application to that effect.

Mr. DEARBORN replied. He said that, when Captain Harris applied, the Paymaster had no more than the two months pay in his hands. He might probably have received the money in full in two or three months, but did not apply. Then the question was, whether, after staying some years, and the money was very much depreciated, he or the United States was to lose by that depreciation?

Mr. S. SMITH said that, if the money had remained in the hands of the Paymaster, the petitioner must have been responsible for the depreciation; but, while the money was gold and silver, the Paymaster, like an honest man, returned it to the Treasury. The United States had committed themselves by reaccepting it. They had no right to take advantage of the depreciation; they received the identical money, and ought to have paid it. He knew not whether this was law, but he knew it was equity and justice.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, that Mr. LYMAN had called that a much harder case in Massachusetts than Captain Harris's. The Paymasters ran away. What odds did it make to the petitioner, when the United States ran away with the money, whether it was by a Paymaster or otherwise, that he lost the money? The money was paid back while it was good money. It was a bona fide debt. He did not know if the petition was agreeable to law, but he knew it to consist with equity. Every man knew that Captain Harris had not received justice.

Mr. SWANWICK spoke a few words in favor of the petition. He thought it exceedingly improper to charge a depreciation to this man when they received back into their Treasury the full money; this he thought an unfair advantage. Had motives of policy prevailed, great advantages of this kind, he presumed, might have been obtained. The Government, and not Captain Harris, ought to have had the depreciation. It was a very hard case.

Mr. KITTERA objected against it. If this were the only solitary case where valuable officers had not received their rights, he should vote for it, but he knew very many accounts had been settled upon the same principle. That he had been present last Winter when a petition came in, that was said to be on a singular case. Presently, on its success, many others followed it; and he thought the same dangerous tendency would naturally occur, were they to grant this.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, that he had made every inquiry at the War Office that could be made. Major Howell had made repeated inquiries, and could not find a single case in the same situation.

The Committee agreed to the report. They rose; the House agreed to the report of the Committee of the Whole; and the prayer of the petitioner was refused.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he wished to lay a resolution on the table respecting an alteration in the Constitution; it was in that part of it which directed the Electors of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT to vote for two persons, one of whom should be PRESIDENT and the other VICE PRESIDENT. It had been discovered that great inconveniences might arise from this mode of election. Gentlemen must be satisfied that it could not answer the end intended, viz: to carry into effect the real intention of the Electors. He believed there could be no objection, therefore, to the alteration which he was about to propose, as it went only to authorize Electors to designate whom they meant to be PRESIDENT and whom VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. S. thought this a proper time for bringing forward this amendment, for two reasons—because the matter was fresh in people's minds, and because it was right to do it at a period the most remote from an election, in order that the States might have time to ratify the amendment before an election might be near at hand; because, if postponed till near the time of an election, the uncertainty of its being ratified would have a disagreeable effect. He would, for this purpose, propose a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the third clause of the first section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States ought to be amended in such manner as that the Electors of a President and Vice President be directed to designate whom they vote for as President, and for whom as Vice President; and that the said amendment be proposed to the different State Legislatures for their concurrence, in order that it may become part of the Constitution of the United States."

The resolution was ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, January 9.

The motion of yesterday, on the alteration of the Constitution respecting the election of PRESIDENT, was committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DEARBORN, from the committee to whom it was referred to inquire whether any and what alterations ought to be made by law in the compensation of the officers of the United States, reported it as their opinion that the salaries of the Secretary of War and Attorney General should be augmented $500; and that the salaries of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney General, Postmaster General, Treasurer, Comptroller of the Treasury, Commissioner of the Revenue, Auditor, Register, Assistant Postmaster, and Keeper of Military Stores, should be increased 25 per cent. They also recommend that the act for regulating the compensations allowed to clerks in public offices, passed last session, should be continued for the year 1797, and no longer; and also that an additional compensation should be allowed to the Loan officers of Massachusetts and New York of $375, and $300 to be distributed among the clerks in each office; and that the sum of $120 be allowed among the clerks in the Loan office of Pennsylvania for the present year. This report was twice read, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Thursday.

Mr. D. also, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill for establishing an uniform Militia system throughout the United States, reported a new bill, which was twice read, committed to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for Friday.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill for licensing pilots in the States of Virginia and Maryland, within the waters of those States. It was read a second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for Friday.

A Message in writing was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which the SPEAKER having opened, he declared to be of a confidential nature, and that therefore the House and galleries must be cleared of all but the members and the Clerk. They were cleared accordingly.

After the doors had been closed little more than half an hour, they were again thrown open.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petitions of Richard R. Saltonstall, Jacob Broom, Robert Dawson, William Crowley Jordan, John Nicholson, and the proprietors of the glass manufactory of Boston, and of sundry hat manufacturers in the United States.

Mr. Saltonstall had formerly obtained a patent for securing to him an improved use of sumach, and complained that he had been disturbed in his right by others who pretended his discovery had been made in other countries before he obtained his patent. He prayed for security in the enjoyment of his patent, or compensation for his expenses. The committee reported that a Court of Law was the proper tribunal for an appeal, and resolved that the prayer of the petitioner could not be granted.

Jacob Broom is the proprietor of a cotton mill on Brandywine creek. He prays that the duty on raw cotton may be repealed, and that an additional duty may be laid on cotton goods imported. The committee report that to repeal the duty on raw cotton imported would be to damp the growth of cotton in our own country, and that imported cotton goods already paying a duty of 12½ per cent., the tax was sufficiently high to allow ample room for competition. The petition was therefore not granted.

Robert Dawson is a manufacturer of bolting cloths at Wilmington. He prays for a repeal of the duty on raw silk, in order to aid his manufactory, the produce of which, he says, is superior to any imported. The committee report that the superior quality of these bolting cloths was sufficient to recommend them, without embarrassing the revenue by a repeal of the present duty. The petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

William Crowley Jordan is a silk manufacturer, who is desirous of establishing a silk manufactory in this country, and prays Congress to assist him with some addition to his capital. The committee reported, that if our finances were in a state to encourage a scheme of this sort, they should very much doubt of its success from the high price of labor. This petition was also disagreed to.

John Nicholson, of this city, and the proprietors of the glass manufactory at Boston, pray their manufactories may be encouraged by an additional duty on glass imported. The committee report it as their opinion that the high price of labor, which time only could cure, was a greater obstacle to their manufactory than the duty, and that therefore the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

Sundry manufacturers of hats in the United States pray for an increase of duty on hats, for the encouragement of their manufactory. The committee's opinion upon this petition was the same as upon the last, and it was of course disagreed to.

The reports were twice read, and the House concurred in them.

INTERNAL REVENUES.

Mr. W. SMITH called for the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom it was referred, to take into consideration the subject of further revenues, and the provisions requisite for improving and more effectually securing the internal revenues; which being agreed to, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and the following resolution was brought under consideration:

Resolved, That it will be expedient to abolish the tax laid on spirits distilled from materials of the growth or produce of the United States, at any other place than a city, town, or village, or at any distillery in a city, town, or village, at which there shall be one or more stills, which singly, if only one, or together, if more than one, shall be of less capacity than four hundred gallons; and to collect this branch of the revenue from a tax on the capacity of the stills."

Mr. MACON said it appeared to him that this provision would have the effect to destroy all the small stills in the country, and to establish large distilleries. In the country, where fruit was generally distilled, this would be a great inconvenience, as it was necessary to be done immediately. He believed the system was going on pretty well at present, and he thought it unnecessary to make any change in it.

Mr. HENDERSON hoped the resolution before them would not be agreed to. He believed it would operate against many of the small stills. Perhaps, indeed, this was the meaning of it; for, if he remembered rightly, a gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HARPER,] on a former occasion, had expressed a wish that small stills might be annihilated, and large distilleries erected. With respect to New Jersey, Mr. H. said, the article of cider was mostly distilled. It was difficult to carry this to a distance, and therefore the number of small stills was very considerable; but, should this resolution be carried, it would subject them to great difficulties, and, in many instances, amount to a prohibition from distilling at all. He believed the system at present was pretty generally satisfactory.

Mr. GALLATIN said, both the gentlemen from North Carolina and from New Jersey seemed to be certain that the plan proposed would have the effect to destroy small stills, and from thence derived their objections to it. He wished they would show how this would be done. He believed the law might be so carried into effect, but he also believed that it might be so arranged as to avoid it.

Gentlemen had said that the present system was very well. He would say it was not so. It was unproductive. The expense of collection upon that part of the revenue which was drawn from spirits distilled in the country, on domestic materials, cost from 32 to 33 per cent. collecting. What the nett amount of the duty was he did not recollect; he believed it was from $150,000 to $200,000 per annum. It was clear, he said, that the moment a direct tax was laid upon the still, instead of the spirits, two-thirds of the expense of collection would be got rid of; all that was necessary being to measure the still, instead of having an officer to watch the operations of the distiller. Here, he said, frauds could not be easily committed. Nothing was necessary to be known, but whether a man distilled or not; if he distilled without a license, he would be liable to a penalty, and this was all the fraud which could be practised.

Another great objection to the present system, Mr. G. said, was, that it gave great advantages to the unfair trader over him who traded fairly. Some were advantaged through ignorance, and some through design; an oath, he said, would bind some men, but not all. This would be altogether prevented by the plan proposed. Every man would stand upon the same ground.

It was true, and it was the only objection which could be made to it, that if an equal tax was laid upon the capacities of all stills, there would be an advantage in favor of large stills; because, upon large stills, large capitals would be employed, and they would be worked throughout the whole year; but, in order to remove this objection, he thought a certain scale should be formed, in order to proportion the duty according to the size of the still. He was of opinion that this single provision would remove all objections. If the resolution was agreed to, it would of course be referred back to bring in a bill, and then it would be seen whether this evil could not be remedied in the way mentioned. All the revenue officers, Mr. G. said, were agreed as to the propriety of this measure.

Mr. PARKER said, if the mode proposed could be so modified as not to injure the small stills, he should have no objections to it; but if it were to have that effect, he trusted he should be able to show that it was a very improper measure.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, at first the report appeared to him in an unfavorable light. He feared it would have the effect—nor was the fear an unreasonable one—to injure small stills; but he now saw it possible to prevent their injury, and even to protect them. He thought there was a regulation of greater importance than the one mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN.] He thought small stills should have the privilege of taking out licenses for a shorter time than a year. Foreseeing that the House would have an entire control over the subject when it came before them in the form of a bill, he did not mean to oppose it in this stage.

The resolution was agreed to, the Committee rose, the House concurred in it, and it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill.

CASE OF M. POIREY.

On motion of Mr. MADISON, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of War, on the petition of M. Poirey, Secretary and Aid-de-camp to Major General Lafayette.

It appears that M. Poirey followed the example of General Lafayette, in declining to receive any pay for his services in the course of the late war; but, like his master, having been overtaken by misfortune, he calls upon the equity and generosity of the American nation to afford him relief, in the same manner as they had, unasked, requited the service of General Lafayette.

The report being read, Mr. MADISON, in order to take the sense of the House, moved the following resolution:

“That provision ought to be made by law for settling the claim of M. Poirey.”

Mr. M. said that the plea of the petitioner seemed to be this, that, since the House had behaved with generosity to the General himself, they would be equally favorable to him.

Mr. COIT said that there was an infinite number of cases of the same kind. He wished, on this account, that it had been at once sent to the Committee of Claims. It would then have been compared with other cases of the same nature. He moved that the Committee of the Whole should rise for that purpose.

Mr. LYMAN hoped that they would not rise. The House was as competent to decide at present as they ever could be. The whole facts were before them. Mr. L. was for rejecting the petition. He did not understand this way of first giving up a claim and then coming back a second time.

Mr. COIT thought that it was of importance to decide uniformly. As other cases of the same kind had been before the Committee of Claims, he wished this to be referred in order to have a similar decision with others.

Mr. SWANWICK did not wish the Committee to rise, nor the petition to be referred to the Committee of Claims. He thought that it would be an uncommonly hard and disagreeable case, after a man had served this country, that he should not be paid for it. He considered it even as bad policy, setting gratitude out of the question. The American Revolution had indirectly conducted to that of France, by which the petitioner had been reduced to ruin. Mr. S. urged the propriety of granting the prayer of the petitioner. It was a case analogous to that of Lafayette himself. Having paid the General, we ought of course to pay the Secretary. The latter had, like the former, waived his claim till compelled by necessity. He hoped that the Committee would not take advantage of this generosity to deprive him of the money.

Mr. THATCHER doubted whether the two cases were analogous. It had been said that Lafayette generously made a waiver of his claim, and that the Aid-de-camp did the like. As to the latter, Mr. T. had doubts. If this had really been the case, he should be willing to let him be paid now.

Mr. S. SMITH insisted that the case of this officer and Lafayette bore a close resemblance. This gentleman had not been paid. He was not in the list of officers who had been so. He had cast himself on the liberality and equity of the House. Mr. S. hoped that the request of the petitioner would be granted.

Mr. SWANWICK asked what kind of appearance this country would make in Europe, if it should be told that the General had been paid, but not his Aid-de-camp? When a native American was cut off by the statute of limitations, there was still this to be said, that he had gained and shared in the advantages of the American Revolution. But the French officer had no consolation of that kind. It had tended to precipitate this gentleman and others into ruin.

Mr. KITCHELL was against the petition, and he did not see in what way the petitioner could be said to have waived his claim. As for the grant to Lafayette, he had been of much use to this country in many other respects, as well as by his military services; he had been the means of America's obtaining pecuniary aid.

Mr. DAYTON understood his colleague last year as being rather against the quantum than the principle of the compensation. He saw no use for rising in order to refer. The facts were all before the Committee. No new information could be got. It was known that Lafayette and his family were in a particular situation. Not one of them took any money. Mr. D. would consider it as extremely hard to hold up the statute of limitations against any person, either an American or a foreigner, who was beyond seas when it passed.

Mr. MACON thought the case of Debord equally hard, as well as many others. Thus a man petitioned the House who had gone to Kentucky, thinking that he could do better beyond the mountains; he came back, and applied for what was due, declaring that he never once heard of the statute: he was refused redress, as well as many others. Mr. M. said that we are as bound to take care of our own citizens as of Frenchmen. As for the French Revolution, we have nothing to do with it in this question.

Mr. MURRAY said, there is not a farmer in the United States who would not approve the affording of relief in this case; for, said he, who among them, if a young man, fond of agriculture, should serve him faithfully for a year, and at the end of that period, wishing to pursue his inquiries into distant lands, should leave him, but decline to be paid for his services because he did not want the money, would, if that same young man should return in the course of a few years in distress, and ask of his equity and generosity what, before, he could have claimed of his justice, turn a deaf ear to him, and say, "I owe you nothing; since you did not receive your due when you might have had it, I cannot now listen to your distress." He believed no one would be found to do this.

Mr. COIT endeavored to show that the rules of morality which suited domestic concerns could not, in this case, be applicable or practicable in regard to the statute of limitations.

Mr. MURRAY repeated his hopes that the prayer would be granted.

The Committee agreed to the resolution; they rose, and the Chairman reported.

MESSRS. MADISON, SWANWICK, and MURRAY, were appointed a committee to bring in a bill pursuant thereto.

TUESDAY, January 10.

WADE HAMPTON, from South Carolina, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. THATCHER, from the committee appointed to inquire if any or what alterations were necessary in the establishment of Post Offices and Post Roads, reported a bill, which was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

ADDITIONAL TAXES.

Mr. HENDERSON proposed a resolution to the House, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of laying a tax upon all theatrical exhibitions; and also to inquire whether any, and if any, what, articles of foreign growth or manufacture imported into the United States, or of articles manufactured or used within the United States, will allow of an additional duty to be laid upon them; and to report thereon?"

Mr. H. said his reason for offering this resolution to the House was, because the subject of revenue was likely soon to come before them. It was, he said, in contemplation to lay a tax upon land, which appeared to him an object of the greatest importance, and that every means of indirect taxation should be resorted to before direct taxation was adopted. He did not wish to be understood to be opposed to direct taxation when all other means failed; but he was of opinion there were objects upon which indirect taxes might be laid, which had not yet been attended to. It was on this account he offered the above resolution.

JOHN GIBBONS.

On motion of Mr. MILLEDGE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of John Gibbons, Treasurer of Georgia. The report, which was as follows, was read:

The Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Gibbons, Treasurer of the State of Georgia, report—

That the petitioner, in his official capacity, prays that final settlement certificates may be issued in favor of the said State, for the sum of $123,283 70, contained in a certificate, dated the 18th May, 1785, and signed by John Pierce, Commissioner, which is not considered by the officers of Government as a final settlement certificate, and payment of interest thereon is refused; or that some other relief may be granted.

On the investigation of this claim, the committee find the following facts, viz:

The State of Georgia paid the officers of their line up to the close of the war, and the five years' pay, commonly called commutation.

On the 1st day of June, 1784, Congress passed a resolution which provides "that the several States shall be credited, in their accounts with the United States, for the specie value of all sums by them paid to their officers and soldiers in the Continental Army, due from the United States; provided such payments shall have been notified to the Paymaster General, and by him charged to such officers and soldiers, in settling their accounts with the United States; and interest shall be allowed the said States from the time of payment so made.

On the 7th of May, 1787, Congress ordained that a Board of three Commissioners should be appointed, whose duty it should be to receive from the Comptroller of the Treasury, and from the Commissioner of Army Accounts, all the accounts and claims of the several States, &c., that a final adjustment of such claims, on uniform and equitable principles, might be had.

On the 6th day of August, 1790, a law was passed by Congress, similar to the ordinance above mentioned, authorizing and directing the said three Commissioners to receive and examine all claims of the individual States against the United States, which should be exhibited to them before the 1st day of July, 1791; the powers of which Commissioners were, on the 23d day of January, 1792, extended to the 1st day of July, 1793; since which, they have settled the said claims, and their settlement has received the approbation and sanction of Congress—in which the State of Georgia is found to be a creditor State, to the amount of — dollars.

On the 18th day of May, 1785, John Pierce, Commissioner of Army Accounts, gave a certificate that, in the final settlement made by him of the accounts of pay and commutation of the officers of the Georgia line, he found the State had paid their officers for sums due prior to August 1st, 1780, and from that time up to, and including the year 1783, and including commutation, the sum of $123,283 70; for which payments the said State was to have credit in the account with the United States, agreeably to the resolution of Congress of June 1st, 1784.

The State of Georgia has attempted to obtain interest on this certificate, both before and since the act passed the 4th August, 1790, and have been refused.

On the 9th day of April, 1791, an explicit refusal, in writing, was given by the then Secretary of the Treasury, alleging that the sum of this certificate was already passed to the credit of the State of Georgia, in the books of the Pay Office, and that it would be included in the statement of the General Board of Commissioners, and could not be funded by the aforesaid act of the 4th of August, 1790.

This decision was not satisfactory to the State of Georgia, and on the 12th day of April, 1792, they presented a memorial to the House of Representatives, praying that separate final settlement certificates might issue for the certificate mentioned above; which was referred to the Secretary of War, but no report was ever made upon it, and the memorial is said to have been lost or mislaid.

On the 9th of April, 1794, the memorial now under consideration was presented, and referred to the Secretary of the Treasury; and on the 5th of January, 1795, returned without any report; and on the 10th December, 1795, referred to the Committee of Claims.

The committee are of opinion that this certificate of $123,283 70 was not presented to the Commissioners who settled the accounts of the individual States with the United States, nor by them allowed. This opinion they derive from the circumstance of the original certificate being now in the hands of the agent of the State, which, if allowed, must have been reserved by the Commissioners; and by a certificate of Patrick Ferrall, who was principal clerk to the said Board of Commissioners.

It seems, by this last certificate, that Mr. John Wereat, Agent for the State of Georgia, had in his possession the certificate of Mr. Pierce, aforesaid, but claimed that it was a final settlement with the United States, and just claim against them by the State of Georgia, as assignee to the officers; and would not lay it before the Commissioners.

The committee are clearly of opinion, this certificate ought not to be considered as a final settlement certificate, for the purpose of being funded on the act of August 4th, 1790, but that the claim was regularly to have been laid before the aforesaid Board of Commissioners, and a good claim against the United States in the general settlement. Had Mr. Pierce not interfered in this business, and had he not given a certificate, the claim would have indisputably come under the resolution of Congress of June 1st, 1784; and his interference does not alter the nature of the claim, as he expressly grounds it on the same resolution; which circumstance must remove all doubt on the subject.

The Secretary of the Treasury decided upon the request for interest, or to loan this certificate, seasonably for the exhibition of the claim to the Board of Commissioners; but the State of Georgia suffered the limitation to bar them, and did not even petition Congress until long after they were barred.

A strict adherence to the limitation in this case, appears to the committee of the utmost importance, as allowance of this claim would now, in effect, destroy the equality and defeat the propriety of the settlement made by the said Board of Commissioners: they are therefore of opinion that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. MILLEDGE said that, although the Committee of Claims had supposed this claim was barred by that committee, yet he thought it clearly was not. It was a Continental debt, properly founded on a certificate which it could not be doubted was good. Five years they were in possession of that certificate. In May, 1787, he said, Congress passed a law to establish three Commissioners to examine into the claims and debts of the States. Georgia had claims against the Union, but she kept back $1,230,000, lest she should be considered a creditor State. He said Georgia had suffered more than any other State during the war, being the Southern outpost or picket. The most numerous tribes of savages were continually on her frontiers, and she was obliged to be perpetually in arms; therefore the hand of the United States ought to deal tenderly towards her; they ought to strengthen her, instead of oppressing her, by withholding from her a just claim. A general adjustment took place in 1785, on uniform and equitable principles; then, how this came to be barred, he could no way account.

On the 9th of April, 1791, the late Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Hamilton) wrote to them that this account was passed to the account of Georgia, and would be included in the settlement of the General Board of Commissioners. This was three months previous to the settlement at that Board. In six months after this, or three months after the final settlement, we get information that we are deprived of that settlement which we expected to receive as unquestionably our just due. This certificate, which specified our claim, was not admitted into the account. Now, from this representation, which is incontrovertibly just, could it be conceived, said Mr M., that such a report against the claim should be returned? He must conceive that there was much justice in the claim.

Mr. BALDWIN enlarged, in explanation, somewhat on the observations of his colleague. After repeating the advice given by Mr. Hamilton on the subject, he went on to explain that a Mr. Pierce, Commissioner of Army Accounts, was despatched from the General Government to settle the arrears of the troops in the Southern States; that, owing to a number of circumstances, and none so much as the great distance of Georgia, three years had elapsed before he reached them. The Army became very impatient and solicitous for their pay. After repeated applications and apprehensions, the State ordered the Treasurer to advance money to quiet their murmurs. It was done, not doubting but that the Commissioner would soon arrive, and repay the State. At the time before-mentioned, Mr. Pierce arrived. Every one knows the scarcity of money at that time; and it was also as well known that this John Pierce's certificates were as good as cash: it was only necessary to believe them genuine, and they freely passed for cash. Mr. Pierce did not know what to do, as the money had been paid. However, at length, to prevent a number of items, and making out settlements to a number of names, he gave a general certificate of the whole sum on one piece of paper. There was no doubt of that paper. It was only necessary to prove it was the real liquidated certificate of John Pierce, and it became current, if real. Mr. B. did believe that it could have been funded. There could be no objection, the paper of Mr. Pierce was then so unobjectionable. The funding law admitted those certificates to be paid in, and this was in no respect different from other certificates issued by John Pierce.

We wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury. He considered the notes of the same value we took them to be, and wrote us everything was well.—the sum was already passed to the credit of the State—and that it would be included in the statement of the Board of Commissioners. In July, when their agent came to Georgia, it was found that this was not the case; and it was then past hopes, the Board having risen. It was therefore alleged to this misinformation that the claim was not given in at the Board. We placed every possible dependence on the advice of that Department, whose direction we considered as certain. If the Secretary of the Treasury had said that the claim could not be considered as liquidated, but must be given in to the Commissioners, or it could not be allowed if it had not then been delivered, we should have had no excuse; but from this source of direction it must have been thought sufficient. It was therefore but just, in this situation of things, that the claim should be allowed.

Mr. W. SMITH, from attending to the facts stated by the members from Georgia, and the statement and report of the committee, was convinced of this important fact: that this was not a certificate given by Mr. Pierce to an individual, but to a State. As such, it ought to have been brought forward at the general settlement of the States' accounts. Mr. Gibbons did not stand himself as a creditor, but the State; and now Mr. Gibbons comes forward with this claim under another appearance—an individual. No, Mr. S. said, he must consider it still as the State: in this view it must be considered. The State thus chose to assume the debt, and become the creditor of the United States; and, from that consideration, she ought to have come in with the others to have had the settlement. Why, then, did she not come forward at that time? Mr. S. supposed it was because it would be more to her advantage to have the certificate funded. They had either to bring it forward to the Board, and lose the chance of funding it, or run the risk: they chose the latter. And can they now blame the United States, after it was declared that no State claims should be granted after the limitation by the Board of Settlement? Can they now, said Mr. S., expect this claim, because they chose to run a hazard of losing that opportunity with a view of more profit? No. Were this allowed, claims would soon pour in from other States for accounts pretended to be unsettled. Mr. S. then proceeded to justify the Secretary of the Treasury from the charge of misjudgment in the case. All other States, he said, would have been in the same situation, had they not fairly brought forward their claims to the general settlement. South Carolina had some millions of dollars to put into the general account, which she fairly did, and never pretended to fund it. He thought other States had equal claim, if this was allowed.

Mr. COIT spoke at some length against allowing the claim, as he had every reason to believe, from a strict examination of the papers and circumstances attending them, that the State had been allowed the amount of their claim; to which, Mr. BALDWIN returned an explanatory answer.

Mr. D. FOSTER said, if gentlemen would examine the papers, there was no ground for supposing the Secretary of the Treasury in an error.

Mr. J. SMITH made some remarks similar to those of Mr. COIT, to whom Mr. GALLATIN answered, in favor of the claim. He thought the case appeared clearly a claim founded on substantial justice, and ought to be granted.

Mr. J. SMITH again spoke, to whom Mr. NICOLAS made reply.

JANUARY, 1797.]

Gilbert Dench.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. W. SMITH did not think the evidence in favor of the claim sufficient to admit it.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

M. POIREY.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom it was referred to bring in a bill for making provision for the satisfaction of the claim of M. Poirey, Secretary and Aid-de-camp of General Lafayette, reported a bill; which was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he had a proposition to make relative to the communication yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and therefore moved that the House and galleries might be cleared.

They were cleared accordingly; and, soon-after, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

RICHARD WINN, from South Carolina, appeared and took his seat.

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SWIFT, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech relative to the promotion of agriculture, made a report, recommending the institution of a society for that purpose, under the patronage of Government, which might act as a common centre to all other societies of a similar kind throughout the United States. No public provision is contemplated except for the salary of a Secretary and for stationery; but if the state of the Treasury should make even this unadvisable, it is stated it might be carried into effect without pecuniary aid. The report is accompanied by a plan, the principal articles of which are, that a society shall be established at the Seat of Government; that it shall comprehend the Legislature of the United States, the Judges, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, and such other persons as should choose to become members agreeably to the rules prescribed; that an annual meeting should be held at the Seat of Government, at which is to be chosen the President, Secretary, &c., and a Board, to consist of not more than thirty persons, which shall be called "A Board of Agriculture;" that the society shall be a body corporate; that a report shall be made annually, &c. The report concluded with a resolution in these words:

"Resolved, That a society for the promotion of Agriculture ought to be established at the Seat of Government of the United States."

The report was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

GILBERT DENCH.

On motion of Mr. W. LYMAN, the unfinished business of yesterday was postponed, in order to take up the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Gilbert Dench. The House accordingly went into a Committee of the Whole on that subject, when the report, which was as follows, was read:

"That, it appears by the statement of the petitioner, and is proved by the documents which accompany his petition, that in the year 1781 he contracted with Jabez Hatch, then Deputy Quartermaster General, to transport clothing, &c. for the United States; and, in 1782, he made another contract with the same officer, to transport military stores for the United States, which two contracts were both faithfully performed by him. The first contract was made for certificates, and paid according to the terms of it; the second contract, to the amount of more than $20,000, was made for specie, and, when it became due to the petitioner, the said Hatch had not cash to fulfil the contract on the part of the United States. Application was made to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and a loan obtained in certificates or orders, in anticipation of the Continental taxes, then in collection. Having obtained these orders or certificates, the said Jabez Hatch paid the same to the petitioner in satisfaction of the contract, and he gave a receipt in full, as having received specie nominally. This loan was soon after reimbursed in the Treasury of Massachusetts, by an order from the Superintendent of Finance for the United States.

"The committee find that those certificates, issued in anticipation of the taxes, like other public paper at that time, passed at a discount, and that the petitioner suffered by their depreciation. They are, however, of opinion that at this time to undertake to redress the injuries sustained by individuals in the depreciation of public paper during the late war, would be productive of greater evils than any possible advantages resulting from the attempt could compensate.

"The petitioner has heretofore brought this subject under the view of Congress, who, after a full investigation, resolved that the prayer of this petition ought not to be granted. Though the committee are sorry for the misfortunes of Mr. Dench, they cannot find sufficient reasons to justify an opinion that the House should now make a different decision; and, therefore, report, that he have leave to withdraw his petition."

Mr. THATCHER said, that he hoped the Committee would not approve such a report. They had been afraid that an agreement to it would make the door open for many others. He had contracted for specie; he had been paid in depreciated paper; he ought to have the difference made good. Mr. T. desired that the account given in by Mr. Dench might be read. This was done.

Mr. MACON differed entirely from Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Dench had granted a receipt as for so much specie. The committee had only to look at the facts. The matter was closed; Mr. Dench could have no claim. If there was any reference it should be to the State of Massachusetts, whose paper had depreciated.

Mr. VARNUM vindicated the claim of Mr. Dench. The individual State had no concern in repairing the depreciation. It was the United States, with whom the petitioner contracted, that ought to make good his loss.

Mr. SPRIGG thought that, by consenting to the request, there would be a derangement of precedents. He looked on the case of Captain Harris, decided but a few days ago, as much stronger than that of Mr. Dench. Mr. Harris was to have been paid in specie, but he did not receive it. The Treasury said to him, "You shall receive nothing but depreciated paper." There were many such cases. The present petitioner says that he was compelled to sell his certificates. Wherein does this differ from the case of Mr. Harris? Mr. S. could see nothing in the two cases to warrant a different decision.

Mr. MADISON said, that if any gain or saving had been made in this transaction it was by the State of Massachusetts. The United States had once paid the money. If a method could be pointed out of sharing the loss equally between them, he confessed that, for his part, he would approve of it.

Mr. DEARBORN thought that this case was materially different from Harris's. Dench contracted for specie, and was paid with paper. He was under a necessity of getting paper in order to pay the people whom he had engaged, and who were calling on him by hundreds. As for Mr. Harris, every officer in the Army was forced to accept of depreciated paper. He was no worse than others. This bargain was made expressly and exclusively for specie, at a time when paper would not be taken.

Mr. J. SMITH said, that Dench had been badly used, but innumerable other cases were much worse. Mr. Dench suffered no more than others who took depreciated paper instead of specie. He was obliged to sell his certificates before they were due; but the citizens of Massachusetts actually paid in real specie the tax of which these certificates were partly in anticipation. Mr. S. said that the House were every day rejecting claims more equitable than this one. He was almost going to have said that, in point of equity, it was much less strong than any other claim which they had met with.

Mr. WILLIAMS was against the prayer of the petition. The United States had paid the money. The complying with this demand would open the door to numbers with this principle in their view.

Mr. LIVINGSTON thought this case in a peculiar situation. The payment was made in depreciated paper. By this the United States gained nothing. One-half or so had been lost to the petitioner, and it must have been gained by somebody. To whom, then, was the creditor to look for reimbursement? Massachusetts stood in the situation of a person receiving money without authority to do so. Members from that State did well to advocate the payment of the balance to Mr. Dench. The transaction was disgraceful; it ought not to come abroad to the world. He thought that Dench should be satisfied by Massachusetts.

Messrs. VARNUM, THATCHER, and SEWALL, rose successively in reply to Mr. LIVINGSTON. They insisted that he had mistaken and misstated the case, as Massachusetts had gained nothing by the depreciation.

Mr. SEWALL said that urgency of the service of the United States was the cause of the anticipation. This produced the depreciation; it is well known what a man suffers by anticipating his revenue. The necessity was originated, and the consequences ought to be supported by the United States.

Mr. HARPER said, that Mr. LIVINGSTON had represented the case as branching into two points: Ought the petitioner to be paid, and, if so, who ought to pay him? The first point the gentleman had passed over. This Mr. H. would take up. Mr. Dench was under no compulsion to sell his certificates until they became due, when he would have got full payment. He chose to go on, as the lesser of two evils. Perhaps there was not a single man, having any dealings with the United States, who had not been in the very same situation. Mr. H. was sorry that the petitioner should have been so treated, but he could not, for his life, conceive what gentlemen meant by calling his case a peculiar one. Mr. H. could quote cases by thousands which had been refused, and which were more entitled to the compassion, to the attention, he would not say to the justice, of the House. We had nothing to do in this case in particular, after finding it necessary to establish some great principle which would comprehend the whole.

Mr. W. LYMAN would not agree to the report of the Committee of Claims. The petitioner never could be paid by Massachusetts, which had already borne her full share. It was well known what very great dependence was placed upon that State. At one time more than one-half of the troops in the Continental Army belonged to it. The daily food of the inhabitants, and almost every thing else, was often in a state of requisition.

Mr. PRESTON was against the report of the committee. Who was bound to bear the loss? He did not think that it would be Massachusetts. It would be very unjust to make the petitioner a loser. It could, therefore, fall only on the United States. This might be deemed inexpedient, as opening a wide door. Mr. P. could not help this, nor bring himself to vote for the report on the table.

Mr. VENABLE said, that hundreds of cases, admitted to be just, and which had been laid on the table, were refused rather than the statute of limitations should be broken. He wondered why this thing had been brought forward.

Mr. THATCHER denied again that Massachusetts gained any thing by this depreciation. Mr. Dench was obliged to anticipate when three hundred people were daily calling on him for money on account of his contract. The case of Captain Harris was quite different. He did not call for the money when he might have had it, and every officer was in the habit of accepting money at the depreciation as well as he.

Mr. POTTER denied that there was any peculiarity in the case. Mr. Dench was exactly in the same situation with many others.

Mr. CHRISTIE thought that the introduction of this claim, just after that of Harris's had been rejected, was the most extraordinary thing in the world. He said that cases in that House were apt to have merit according to the coldness of the climate from which they came. In the affair of Captain Harris, not one farthing was to be got. To say that they would pay Dench to the full, when officers had been selling their certificates at a shilling per pound, was the merest farce in nature. Why, in the name of common sense, was this petitioner singled out? He never could see the merit which this petition had, unless that sort which he had named already. There was not in the case of Dench one-tenth part of the merit which many others had that the House rejected.

Mr. DAYTON concurred in the report of the select committee. There was nothing more in this instance than in many others. It would be letting in a flood of claims.

After a long debate the question on agreeing to the report of the Committee of Claims was put and carried. The Committee rose and the House confirmed the agreement.

A bill was received from the Senate for repealing the limitation of the act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States; and to continue in force the same. It was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

M. POIREY.

Mr. MADISON called for the order of the day on the bill for making provision for the claim of Monsieur Poirey, as Secretary and Aid-de-camp to Major General Lafayette.

The House accordingly went into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, and rose and reported the bill without amendment. The House then took it up; when

Mr. DEARBORN said, he was not present when this business had before been under discussion. He hoped that all claims intended to have been taken out of the statute of limitation would have been referred to the Committee of Claims, and proceeded with regularly. He did not admire the taking of them out in this way. There were many cases of soldiers and sailors, who, from certain circumstances, had been prevented from making their claims in time; and, as long as there were many cases of this kind unattended to, he should be against taking up cases like the present separately.

Mr. WILLIAMS wished to know whether this officer acted in two capacities or one? He thought no officer ought to be considered in two.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the House had considered this officer's case as totally different from that of any other, as he never intended to have made any claim, but to have followed the example of his General. Having, like him, however, been overtaken by misfortune, he claimed also the bounty of the United States. It was on this account that the bill was brought in. As to whether he should be considered in one or two capacities, was not now the question. He doubted not the Accountant of the War Department would take care of that.

Mr. MADISON observed, that if he saw any danger from the precedent of making this provision, he should not be for it; but he believed the precedent could not be extended to any other case. This officer, he had learned, would have been put on the foreign list had it not been that he was so wrapped up in the conduct of his General, as to consider it indelicate to receive any payment. He relied upon the prosperous fortune of General Lafayette for recompense. This had failed him. If, said Mr. M., anything could afford comfort to the General in his present unfortunate confinement, it would doubtless be to find that the United States had extended their liberality to the relief of his faithful servant.

Mr. DEARBORN said, he had no objection to their doing something for this gentleman; but he did not see why they should allow him, from generosity, what they refused to others on the ground of justice. It was a common saying, "we should be just before we are generous," and he thought it would be dishonorable and unjust to allow relief in this case, and refuse it to our own deserving citizens, whose claims were at least equally strong.

Mr. HARTLEY spoke in favor of the claim.

Mr. SWANWICK said, justice and generosity were both combined in this case. This gentleman being a foreigner, he did not stand on the same ground with our own citizens, who, though they might have suffered equally in the service, were now, in common with their fellow-citizens, reaping the fruits of their labors. To grant relief in this case, as had been observed by the gentleman from Virginia, would afford a degree of consolation to the mind of the unfortunate General in the gloom of his dungeon; but, on the contrary, if it were refused, it would doubtless give him a painful wound.

Mr. MADISON said, when he was up before, he had omitted to answer the question of the gentleman from New York. It did not appear clear, he said, what part of the time M. Poirey was Secretary, and what part Aid-de-camp; they had chosen, therefore, to insert both characters. He would, of course, be allowed according to his services.

Mr. WILLIAMS doubted the propriety of expressing it; nor did he approve of this way of requiring this officer. He thought they were going contrary to the limitation act; he thought it would have been better to have allowed him a certain sum as a gratuity.

Mr. COOPER was in favor of the bill, because he thought the services of General Lafayette ought never to be eradicated from the minds of Americans.

The question was put and carried, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, January 12.

MITIGATION OF PENALTIES.

Mr. COIT said, it was necessary that some alterations should be made in the act providing for the mitigation of penalties in certain cases under the revenue laws, different constructions having been put upon it by the officers of the Treasury.

JANUARY, 1797.]

John Gibbons.

[H. OF R.]

He, therefore, proposed a resolution to the following effect; which was agreed to.

"Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations ought to be made in the act providing for the mitigation of penalties incurred under the revenue laws, in certain cases therein mentioned, and to report by bill or otherwise."

JOHN GIBBONS.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, as to the petition of John Gibbons.

Mr. MILLEDGE said, that a member from Connecticut had asked what was become of the account mentioned in the certificate? It was said that it had been carried into the general account. Mr. M. had now got the original account, with the original certificate, as given by Mr. Pierce, at the bottom of it. The Committee had only this report from the Committee of Claims to look to. The diligence of their late chairman (Mr. TRACY, now of the Senate,) was well known. They had hence, on this account, no further information to look for. It was now clearly proved, by the production of this paper, that Georgia had not been paid; that the debt was due by the United States. He regarded the certificate as obviating every objection.

Mr. BALDWIN attacked the report of the Committee of Claims. If it had not been entirely against probability he would have been one of the last men in the world to oppose it. The task was extremely painful. None of the gentlemen of the committee had even said that it was probable that Georgia had received payment. The report was superficial. Could they not have taken pains to determine whether the fact was that Georgia had been paid or otherwise? Their report does not say that such payment has been made. The defence of the report occupied a different ground from the report itself.

Mr. POTTER said, that every State in the Union could show such things that had never been presented. It would lead to an endless perplexity if the precedent was adopted. He gave an instance in the State from whence he came, (Rhode Island.) There were two or three brigades of which neither officers nor men were paid. In the hurry and confusion of public business this was not brought forward at the proper time, and they had now dropped all thought of doing so.

Mr. W. LYMAN said that the subject resolved itself into two points: Whether Georgia had been paid, and whether she ought to be paid? As for the first, he thought that better evidence might be had from the Commissioners themselves than any yet given. As to the second, if it was proper that Georgia should be paid, he did not think this a proper time. Not being prepared on the subject, he should, if seconded, move that the Committee do rise. He wished the report not to be negatived but postponed. The motion was not seconded.

Mr. DAYTON was against the Committee rising. He denied that this certificate was of any consequence in establishing the claim. He would be for the Committee rising, if he did not think that Georgia had been already accounted with for it: this not being produced to the Board of Commissioners as was to be expected, it was not a final settlement certificate. If it was so, the fact ought to be proved, and it should have been funded. This was only a temporary certificate, like some which Mr. D. himself still had, since 1776, when he was a Paymaster. At a final settlement between a general and regimental Paymaster, they were not thought necessary to be delivered up. This was a paper of that kind.

Mr. BALDWIN said, by the report of the Committee of Claims, it had been confirmed, in his opinion, that the State of Georgia never had been satisfied.

Mr. SWIFT looked upon the conduct of Georgia unfavorably. He hinted that he thought the whole merely a scheme to get one hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars from the United States. Georgia never could consider Pierce's certificate as a final settlement certificate, but merely as a paper proper to be produced to the Commissioners. This the State did not choose to do. It was their duty to have done so. They had no reason to have called upon the Secretary for any purpose, about getting it funded. The very face of the paper showed that it was not of that kind. They chose to keep it back, when it really ought to have come forward, viz: to the Commissioners of Public Accounts. He was firmly of opinion that it had already been paid, and why the State had chosen formerly to keep it back, and now to bring it up, they best knew. If the act of limitation, by which the claim was debarred, should be opened, there would be an endless matter. That act was the palladium of our freedom.

Mr. NICHOLAS was as unwilling as any man to lay unnecessary burdens on the United States. He was, however, disposed to think favorably of this claim. He advanced a variety of reasons in defence of his opinion. He wished, at any rate, that the point might be more fully examined, to satisfy the State of Georgia that due attention had been paid to their demand.

Mr. BALDWIN wished to refer it back to the Committee of Claims. For this purpose he should move that the Committee of the Whole do rise.

If the Committee would be willing to take it back again, they would doubtless find it in a different form from what they had conceived. If he could conceive that there was good ground for the report, he should be the last to oppose it. He would not wish even the State he came from to receive money unjustly, to the injury of the General Government, but he really thought the Committee, in their investigation, had gone the wrong road. He wished the House to have better information on the subject, and not to be led to a wrong determination without due attention.

Mr. D. FOSTER said, all the facts that were in the power of the Committee of Claims to state, were now before the Committee of the Whole in the report; he saw no advantage whatever from recommitting it, and, therefore, should oppose it.

Mr. WILLIAMS would be willing it should be recommitteed, if it was probable the Committee could form a fresh report. If Georgia had not been paid this amount, he thought it but just they should. But whether they were justly freed from the power of the act of limitation, he could not say.

Mr. DAYTON said, it appeared, from observations made, that there was a credit passed on the books of the State of Georgia to the United States for this sum. Now, he observed, it was usual amongst merchants and tradesmen when payment was made of a debt on book, that a bond was delivered up or receipt given, as an evidence, which was always conclusive of the settlement of such account. Mr. D. said, there did not appear any such evidence to support the present claim. It had been said that the Clerk of the Board knew the settlement was never made; but, he said, neither the Clerk nor the Commissioners themselves, could give him satisfaction on the subject, particularly as he found it depended on the memory of that evidence: he might be a good man, and yet his memory fail of that accuracy which was right in such a case as this. He thought it very proper that good testimonials should be presented, or the claim was to all intents invalidated.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought that every objection he had heard to this claim, was upon a different ground than that which the Committee took. What had been said was, that Georgia got credit upon the original receipt of this certificate. Mr. N. thought this not improper, and he hoped gentlemen would not be against application to all the facts in evidence which could be procured. For his own part, he must think the claim fair.

After a considerable discussion, the Committee rose, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. BALDWIN hoped the Committee would not have leave to sit again, because the subject ought to go back to the Committee of Claims; which was also advocated by Mr. CORR.

It was observed by a member, that it would be improper to give trouble to the Committee of Claims, when they could obtain no new information; and the facts having been clearly stated, the House could judge on the subject.

The question was then put, "Shall the Committee of the Whole have leave to sit again?" and carried—ayes 44, noes 35.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE.

Mr. W. SMITH then called for the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of further revenues, when the following resolutions were read, as reported:

"Resolved, That there ought to be apportioned, according to the last census, on the several States, the sum of —, to be raised by the following direct taxes, viz:

"A tax ad valorem, under proper regulations and exceptions, on all lands, with their improvements, including town lots, with the buildings thereon.

"A tax on slaves, with certain exceptions."

Agreeably to this plan of a direct tax of one million four hundred and eighty-four thousand dollars, to be laid upon the United States, the apportionment of the several States is as follows:

To the State of Vermont	-	-	$28,000
New Hampshire	-	-	56,000
Massachusetts	-	-	196,000
Rhode Island	-	-	28,000
Connecticut	-	-	98,000
New York	-	-	140,000
New Jersey	-	-	70,000
Pennsylvania	-	-	182,000
Delaware	-	-	14,000
Maryland	-	-	112,000
Virginia	-	-	266,000
Kentucky	-	-	28,000
North Carolina	-	-	140,000
Tennessee	-	-	14,000
South Carolina	-	-	84,000
Georgia	-	-	28,000

Amounting to - 1,484,000

From which there being deducted for abatements, erroneous assessments, and charges of collections, fifteen per cent., or - 222,000

There will remain the estimated nett proceeds of the proposed tax, being - 1,262,000

Mr. W. SMITH said, two questions presented themselves on this occasion; the first, whether any, and what further revenue was wanted? and secondly, what means shall be used for raising it? With respect to the first, any gentleman who had taken a view of our engagements and revenue, would not hesitate to say, a further provision was necessary. In order to evince this, however, it might not be improper to take a view of our public contracts and revenue. They had before them, he said, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, which not only contained a state of our finances, but of the different revenue laws of the different States and other materials necessary to be known in order to form a system of direct taxation for the whole Union. Mr. S. proposed, therefore, to give as brief an abstract as possible of the state of our revenue, on the first of July last. He then entered upon the following statement:

- 1st. The Foreign Debt; consisting of loans obtained by the late and present Government, in Amsterdam and Antwerp, amounting to twenty-nine millions five hundred thousand guilders; equal, at forty cents per guilder, to - $11,800,000 00
- 2d. The six per cent. Domestic stock now in a course of reimbursement, 29,344,752 98
- 3d. The six per cent. Domestic stock upon which reimbursements are to commence in the year 1801 - 14,578,882 39
- 4th. The three per cent. Domestic stock, 19,597,545 93
- 5th. The five and a-half per cent. Domestic stock - 1,848,900 00
- 6th. The four and a-half per cent. Domestic stock - 176,000 00
- 7th. The unfunded registered debt, exclusive of arrearages of interest prior to the year 1791 - 179,953 16

JANUARY, 1797.]

Additional Revenue.

[H. of R.]

8th. The debts due to the Bank of the United States, and the Bank of New York - - - - - 6,200,000 00

The sums before enumerated are precisely ascertained by the records of the Treasury, and amounting to 83,726,034 46

There are however in circulation various descriptions of certificates, the amount and value of which are not exactly ascertained, which, with the balances of certain unliquidated accounts and arrearages of interest, may possibly rise to - - - - - 1,124,404 24

The entire amount of all those capitals upon which no expenditure is incurred, and for which provision is necessary, may therefore be estimated at 84,850,438 70

To reconcile this representation with reports heretofore made from the real amount of the Public Debt, it appears proper to represent that the following sums are indisputable offsets against the capitals before enumerated:

1st. Six per cent. stock bearing a present interest, already purchased or redeemed, and vested in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund - 1,170,232, 13

2d. Six per cent. stock on which interest will accrue after the year 1800, 930,753 91

3d. Three per cent. stock also purchased or redeemed - - - - - 610,757 94

4th. Stock of the Bank of the United States, sold by the United States, estimated at par - - - - - 2,000,000 00

5th. The sum reimbursed at the close of the year 1795, on the six per cent. stock, - - - - - 544,066 54

Amounting in the whole to $5,255,810 52

Payments annually required by Contracts.

1st. Foreign Debt.—The contracts respecting the Foreign Debt require annual reimbursements by unequal payments until 1809, when the last payment is to be made.

The whole sum, including principal and interest - - - - - $16,772,444 00

The average sum, annually requisite for the Foreign Debt, during the fourteen years, which is to continue, is - 1,197,888 81

This calculation, however, supposes the practicability of such a punctual provision for the payment of interest, and principal, as will entirely supersede the use of temporary credits in Europe; and it moreover supposes that remittances can be uniformly made at the par of exchange. As neither of these suppositions will be in fact realized, there is to be added to the foregoing sum the estimated expense of remittances above par, and for interest on temporary advance to the United States, to insure punctuality; this expense will not probably be less than five per centum on the annual payments, and being calculated on the average annual demand above stated, will at this rate amount to 59,537 30

Upon the principles herein assumed, the average sum to be provided until the year 1809, inclusive, for the extinguishment of the Dutch Debt, will be one million two hundred and fifty-seven thousand four hundred and twenty-six dollars and fourteen cents.

It is proper, however, to state, that the foregoing estimate is founded on a presumption that some systematical plan will be adopted for satisfying the existing contracts, by direct payments from the Treasury. In every degree in which recourse may be had to new loans, the expense of reimbursement will be finally increased by at least the charges of negotiation; these, upon such loans as may be hereafter obtained in Holland, cannot be estimated at less than six or seven per centum, upon the capitals which may be borrowed.

2d. The six per cent. stock now in a course of reimbursement, exclusive of the sum passed to the credit of the Sinking Fund, is twenty-eight millions one hundred and seventy-four thousand five hundred and twenty dollars, eighty-five cents, upon which the annuity of eight per centum amounts to - - - - - $2,253,961 66

The capital passed to the credit of the Sinking Fund, is one million one hundred and seventy thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars, thirteen cents, upon which the accruing interest of six per centum per annum, is - - - 70,213 92

This sum, last mentioned, will be annually required until the close of the year 1817. During the year 1818, the demand for the object will decline to about one million eight hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars, and will then cease by the extinguishment of the debt.

3d. The six per cent. stock on which reimbursements will commence in the year 1801, amounted, on the first of July, 1796, to thirteen millions six hundred and forty-eight thousand one hundred and twenty-eight dollars, forty-eight cents, exclusive of nine hundred and thirty thousand seven hundred and fifty-three dollars, ninety-one cents, passed to the credit of the Sinking Fund. The annuity on the first sum, at eight per centum, amounts to - - - - - $1,091,850 28

And on the latter sum, at six per centum, to - - - - - 55,845 13

Being together - - - - - $1,147,695 51

Which last sum will be required from the year 1801, to the year 1823, inclusive. During the year 1824, the charge will be reduced to about nine hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars;

H. OF R.]

Additional Revenue.

and after that period will wholly cease with the reimbursement of the debt.

4th. The funded three per cent. stock, exclusive of the credit to the Sinking Fund, amounts to eighteen millions nine hundred and eighty-six thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven dollars, ninety-nine cents; on which the annual interest is $569,603 63

The stock of the Sinking Fund is six hundred and ten thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven dollars, ninety-four cents: and the interest thereon 18,322 73

Amounting to $587,916 36

The duration of this annuity may be considered as indefinite, for though funds for the redemption of the capital stock are eventually appropriated by the act, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of the Public Credit, and for the redemption of the Public Debt"—yet, by a proviso to the twelfth section of the said act, the power of diverting the appropriation to other objects, is reserved to the Government.

5th. The interest on the stock bearing interest at five and a-half per centum per annum (being one million eight hundred and forty-eight thousand nine hundred dollars) will require one hundred and one thousand six hundred and eighty-nine dollars, fifty cents.

6th. The interest on the stock bearing interest at four and a-half per centum, being one hundred and seventy-six thousand dollars, will be annually seven thousand nine hundred and twenty dollars.

7th. The unfunded debt is of two descriptions, viz:

That which is registered, being $179,953 16
And that not registered, estimated at 1,124,404 24

Amounting to $1,304,347 40

For this debt no provision has been made by law, except a partial grant from year to year, on account of interest. So far as the debt has been liquidated, the public are bound by contract, to pay an interest of six per centum per annum. Similar engagements will be expressed in the certificates hereafter to be issued; to discharge which interest, there will be annually required the sum of seventy-eight thousand two hundred and sixty-one dollars, forty-one cents.

8th. The debts due to the Bank of the United States, and Bank of New York, amount to six millions two hundred thousand dollars; though a part of this sum was borrowed at five per centum per annum, yet as the existing contracts are expected to be satisfied from the proceeds of new loans at six per centum, the annuity chargeable upon the revenue, is calculated at this last rate, being three hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars.

The annuities before-recited comprise all the demands which will be made upon the Treasury in consequence of the present debt of the United States; and being reduced to aggregate sums and classified according to the epochas for which the said annuities are to continue, they will require a provision of revenue as follows:

1st. From the year 1796 to the end of 1800:

For Foreign Debt	-	$1,257,426 00
six per cent. stock	-	2,324,178 00
three per cent. stock	-	587,926 00
five and a-half per cent. stock	-	101,689 00

5. The Debts due to Banks, or the stocks which may be substituted thereof	6,200,000 00
Amounting in the whole, to	$29,126,802 90

If, however, the United States can establish a revenue equal to the scale of expenditure which will be necessary in the year 1801, the whole Debt may be extinguished by payment or purchase, on or before the end of the year 1824; as, also, a considerable additional Debt, if such should accrue from future contingencies.

The foregoing calculations being founded on existing contracts, are liable to but little uncertainty; it is necessary, however, to form an estimate of the probable expenses of those establishments which the United States must at all times maintain. On this subject there exists no data from past experience, which afforded a satisfactory ground for an opinion; it is believed, however, that it will be unsafe and deceptive to calculate the current expenses of Government, at less than the following estimate:

For the support of the Civil List	$486,000 00
For expenses of intercourse with foreign nations	100,000 00
For the Mint Establishment	40,000 00
For light-houses	25,000 00
For expenses of the Loan Offices	22,000 00
For miscellaneous objects and contingent expenses of Government	37,000 00
For the Military and Naval departments, including pensions	2,000,000 00

Amounting in the whole, annually, to $2,700,000 00

If it shall be found that the expenses of the Military and Naval departments cannot be reduced below the above estimate, which, though much to be desired, is far from certain, the foregoing calculation will fall short of the real expenses; it being morally certain that the expenses of Civil Government will hereafter considerably increase.

Assuming it, however, as a principle, that the expenses of the public establishments will amount to two millions seven hundred thousand dollars, and no more, it follows that, to preserve the United States from the necessity of recurring to future Loans, it is requisite to establish a revenue to continue until the close of the year 1800, of seven millions four hundred and twenty-nine thousand three hundred and ninety-eight dollars and ninety-nine cents. And, from the year 1801 to the year 1809, inclusive, a revenue of eight millions five hundred and seventy-seven thousand and ninety-four dollars and fifty cents.

It is a further consequence of the foregoing data, that though a revenue upon this last scale would be more than sufficient to discharge the whole Public Debt, on or before the year 1824, yet, that the absolute engagements of the United States will not require, after the year 1809, more than seven millions three hundred and nineteen thousand six hundred and sixty-eight dollars and thirty-six cents; which last sum is less than the annual expenditure required by existing contracts and arrangements.

Having thus presented a view of the probable expenditures of the United States, it remains to show how far the revenues, already established, afford an adequate resource; the particulars and amount of these revenues, are as follows:

Duties arising on imports and tonnage calculated upon the actual receipts during the year 1795	$5,588,961 26
Duties on domestic distilled spirits and on stills, on refined sugar, sales at auction, licenses to retail spirits and wines, and on carriages for the conveyance of persons, calculated upon the receipts of 1795	337,255 36
Revenue from the Post Office	35,000 00
Dividends on Bank stock, calculated with reference to certain sales, the proceeds of which will be applied to the payment of part of the Debt due the Bank of the United States	150,000 00
Interest on stock purchased and deemed, and vested in the Sinking Fund	886,636 65
Duties on patents and contingent receipts, (uncertain)	746 73
Estimated annual current revenue	$6,200,600 00

It results that the following sums must be provided, in addition to existing revenue, viz:

1. From the present time to the end of 1800	$1,228,798 00
2. From 1801 to the end of 1809	2,376,494 00
3. From 1810 to the end of 1823	1,119,068 00
	$4,724,360 00

To provide sums annually required till 1801, may be done without imposing inconvenient burdens.

To reimburse the whole Foreign Debt, by direct payments before 1824, may be practicable. It is, however probable, that occasional Loans will be advisable, with a view of postponing the final reimbursement of part until after 1818, when the present six per cent. debt will be discharged.

Mr. SMITH said, since Loans could not now be had upon any reasonable terms, there was no way of raising the money wanted, but by taxes upon the people. The question was, what sort of taxes should be resorted to? Members, he said, were divided between direct and indirect taxes; but all were agreed that an additional revenue of one million two hundred thousand dollars being wanted, some effectual steps were necessary to be taken. If indirect taxes had proved insufficient, it was necessary to have recourse to some other;

he knew of no other that would be so effectual as a direct tax on land.

With respect to raising further revenue from commerce, he believed it was not possible to do it to any considerable extent; and this source, he said, was, at best, but a precarious one. If, then, they had tried all other sources without effect, they should be obliged to have recourse to a land tax. And he would submit it to gentlemen whether it was not best to meet the difficulty at once. If, said he, the necessities of Government, the public safety, the credit of the country, require it, it is necessary and proper we should look the evil in the face.

Notwithstanding he delivered this opinion, Mr. S. said, he should be glad to hear the sentiments of gentlemen on the subject, who were in favor of other plans, though he was apprehensive they should be obliged to have recourse to the source he had mentioned.

Indeed, there was one view of the subject which would make such a system desirable, though our necessities did not immediately require it. At present, he said, almost the whole of our revenue arose from commerce, and was liable to be very much deranged by any European war, and to be wholly destroyed; if this country should engage in a war. It were to be wished, therefore, that there should be a plan created, which might, at any time, by a short notice, be carried into effect to an extent which should be equal to the necessities of Government. Nothing would answer this purpose so well as a tax on land. Suppose, he said, the plan was originated with two hundred thousand dollars, having the system open, they could at any time raise it to one or two millions; as, if certain descriptions of land were charged a quarter per cent., they might easily be advanced to one-half, three-quarters, or one per cent., without embarrassment.

Mr. S. said, this subject had been frequently under the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means, and had always been considered as a subject of great importance, and as attended with considerable difficulties. There had always been a division in that committee on this subject, certain of them wishing to raise the money by indirect, and others by direct taxation, but it had always been found that, when they turned from direct to indirect taxation, so many objections were brought against any plan which was proposed, that there was no possibility of proceeding. In the last session, several objects were proposed, but they were objected to, and abandoned; at length they had determined to resort to a system of direct taxation, and had accordingly given directions to the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare a plan for the purpose. This plan had been reported, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and before that committee chose to go further into the matter, they wished the House to determine upon the principle; afterwards, if a majority should be in favor of direct taxation, the committee would bring in such a bill as should appear to them to be least burdensome to the people. But, if gentlemen were of opinion the money wanted could be better raised in any other way, they would, of course, propose their plans; but he hoped they should not shift from one thing to another, without fixing on any thing, since the wants of Government must be supplied.

Mr. CORR hoped the resolution would be adopted; not that he wished to pledge himself to agree to any system of direct taxation which might be proposed. He looked upon the agreeing to the resolution as only one step. Whether, eventually, such a plan could be devised as the House should approve, was uncertain; but he should wish to look at the plan which gentlemen had in contemplation.

Mr. HARPER said, if they could look at the plan, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CORR] had supposed, without pledging themselves to adopt a system of direct taxation, he should also be glad to see it; but, he believed, to adopt the resolution before them, would be to decide upon the principle of direct taxation. Afterwards, all the question would be as to the modification of the system, and the manner in which it should be carried into effect. But, he believed, a majority of that House neither was nor would be prepared to say, this was the most eligible and convenient mode of raising revenue.

It was true that they all knew, they knew it last session, that the money wanted ($1,200,000 additional revenue) must be raised from the people by means of taxation. The question was only about the mode. The Committee of Ways and Means had given them a resolution of four lines, that direct taxation ought to be laid; but how, or under what modification, or how the difficulties which were acknowledged to exist, were to be got over, they were not told; but they were called upon to determine upon the principle, without any information on the subject. He wished the Committee of Ways and Means might be instructed to give them the data upon which they meant to found their plan; that they might be instructed to show them the means by which this plan was to be effected—how this direct tax was to be collected. They, doubtless, had considered this; but the Committee of the Whole had not considered it; nor had they the materials for going into the investigation. It was his desire that, before they committed themselves, they might know more about the matter than they then knew; that they should have the system before them, and that they might not decide upon the abstract principle, without having that system. He should, therefore, be against the resolution, and move for the Committee to rise, that the report might be recommitted, for the purpose of obtaining a skeleton, in which way they please, of the plan which had been contemplated. He hoped the Committee would be discharged.

Mr. SWANWICK hoped the Committee would not rise, until they had determined upon a question which was of the first importance to this country; a question which it had been well for us if it had been introduced long ago, but which, he trusted, was not now too late to be of essential service. At present produce was falling, and, of course, any tax upon the farmer would not be so well received as if their produce was upon the rise; but, he trusted, the wealth of the country must have become so considerable, from the high price which every agricultural production had long been at, as to enable them very well to support the necessary expenses of Government. These expenses, they knew, must be supplied from one of three sources: either from loans which have heretofore been made in Europe, at great expense of agency, brokerage, commission, &c., or from impost, or by internal revenue, or excise.

Additional Revenue.

Into what situation, he asked, had this loan-making business brought this country? They had created, what seemed to be wished on all hands to be avoided, a foreign influence over this country. It had made us dependent upon what it was not in our power to control—upon every accident which might happen at Amsterdam or Antwerp, and every part of the globe. So far as related to imposts, this source of revenue was exposed to the influence of war, and absolutely dependent upon any foreign Government which might please to annoy us. Was this, he asked, an enviable situation? He thought not. This dependence upon foreign nations was a great disadvantage in all negotiations. With respect to excise, he need not say how unproductive it had been. The article of snuff, instead of producing anything, had brought the revenue in debt; and the excise on another article, had called forth the military to enforce it. For his part he saw no way of avoiding these difficulties, but to come to that cardinal point, which they had now in view, of direct taxation. He should, therefore, be in favor of the resolution before them, because it fixed the principle.

It was necessary, Mr. S. said, to the importance and firmness of Government, to determine whether the land of the country be not equal to bear its share in the expenses of Government. This had hitherto been evaded; but, he trusted, this mass of property would no longer escape from paying its due proportion towards the public burdens. For, when it was known in foreign countries, that all our revenue was bottomed upon our commerce, it was holding out an invitation to them to play off hostilities upon us. Great Britain had taken the lead in annoying our trade, which had brought us to the British Treaty. This had produced great disadvantage to some, though some few might have had a trifling benefit. We were now brought into another situation by that instrument; the French were now laying hold of our commerce.

It was said that Great Britain drew very little support from her land, in comparison to what she drew from her commerce; but she had a fleet to defend her commerce, and therefore, if she drew a great deal from it, she was also at some expense in supporting it. Our trade was unprotected. It was true, we obtained seven million of dollars from it, without being at any expense in return. But there was no certainty of this; it was a mere phantom, it was gone, and without some plan like the present, there would be no security for supporting the expenses of our Government; nor could any negotiation ever be properly supported, until the yeomanry of our country should join in the support of our common interest. It was absolutely necessary to decide upon one of two principles, either to support commerce by a Navy, and thereby secure the revenue arising from it, or else call upon agriculture to bear its full share of the public burdens. He therefore wished the principle to be settled without regard to modification, because the more simple the light in which the object was placed the better. The modification would properly be an after-business; and, when members had agreed upon the necessity of adopting the principle of a direct tax, their opposition to any particular plans which might be offered would be moderated, so that the best system which could be devised would probably be adopted.

It had been recommended by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in half a dozen successive communications, that the National Debt should be reduced. This could not be done without the assistance of agriculture; for, whenever the duty on commerce was made extravagant, smuggling was introduced, and the duty, instead of being increased, was lessened. In Britain this had been notoriously the case.

They put a tax on tea, by which smuggling was brought to such an enormous height that they were, after every endeavor, obliged to abandon it.

This, Mr. S. said, was the most important question which was ever brought before that House. He trembled every day when he considered upon what a shadow the revenues of this Government rested—upon what every nation seemed to rob us of: for, added he, all are agreed in one point, however they may disagree in others, viz: to rob and ill-treat us. They were, indeed, invited to do this; for we have no barriers but Treaties, and they are worse than nothing.

Mr. S. said, we had no dependence upon our revenue; at any rate, it has not more than supported our present expenses. Suppose, added he, all the present nations at war, make peace, would there then be no danger of a defalcation of revenue? There could be no doubt of it. So that whether war or peace, no certain dependence could be placed upon our revenue.

Did it not, then, become Government to look to something more substantial than commerce for support? It certainly did. Let us fix upon the principle of a direct tax, and not be deterred at the threshold of the business. To say it was impossible to fix upon such a plan, so as to be generally satisfactory, would be to say we could not do what many other nations had done. It were to make an acknowledgment in the face of the world of our own imbecility.

He would again repeat that it would have been better for this country if the present plan had been adopted sooner. However, as we had lately declared ourselves the most prosperous, the most free and enlightened country in the world, this could not be an improper time for introducing it.

He was rather glad, however, that a degree of necessity had brought the present measure before them. Misfortunes sometimes prove the greatest of blessings. He trusted the present event would teach Government economy; for, since they found the difficulty which attended the raising of money, they would be careful how they lavished it away. He trusted this measure of taxing the farmer would also have the effect upon him to awaken a watchful attention to the operations of Government; it would also give us the means of paying our debt, which is a most honorable employment, and of showing to foreign countries that our revenues rest upon a foundation which they cannot shake. Viewing the matter thus, however unwilling he was in general to call upon the people for money, he hoped the principle before them would be adopted.

Mr. GILBERT said, the question was, whether they should raise the revenue wanted by direct or indirect taxes? Though he was opposed to direct taxes, he had no objection to the Committee's rising, that the report might be recommitted, in order that the Committee of Ways and Means might be instructed to report to the House a plan of direct taxation for the decision of the House. He acknowledged the necessity of something being done, but he was not ready to vote for direct taxation, until he saw something more of the business.

Mr. CHRISTIE was against the Committee's rising, because he thought it was necessary to determine upon the principle. He did not know whether he should agree to this principle or not. It was proposed that each State should be apportioned according to its last census. By this Maryland would be considerably aggrieved. Several other States were in the same situation. If the gentleman would therefore withdraw his motion for the Committee's rising, he would move to strike out the words "according to the last census." [The former motion of Mr. HARPER was withdrawn.]

Mr. S. SMITH hoped the words would not be struck out; for if they were struck out, the whole resolution would fall to the ground, as, if they were not to make a calculation upon the last census, they must either postpone the business until a new census was made, or go into the expense of making a new census for the occasion.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] had gone fully into the business, and shown to the satisfaction, he doubted not, of many in that House, the necessity of going into some effectual mode for securing a permanent revenue. He believed it would be found a subject of difficulty to carry into effect a direct tax throughout the Union, but as the Committee of Ways and Means had brought forward the proposition, he doubted not they had attended to these difficulties.

He was not afraid of the State of Maryland being overrated by taking the last census. It was not necessary to go into that subject, for he believed Maryland ought to have had another Representative on that floor. He thought they should not object to the plan before them on trifling ground, as they need never be able to apportion any system to farthings. Whether he should vote for the system proposed he knew not, but he wished to have the subject taken up, that we might have it in our power to say we are an independent nation, and that it may not be in the power of any other to cut off our supplies. Such a step was necessary, and he doubted not the people would be found willing to give their Government a proper support.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, if he thought his motion went to destroy the principle, he would withdraw it; but he believed the principle would be as well tried without them as with them. He thought it would be proper to have a new census taken. He wondered his colleague [Mr. S. SMITH] should think Maryland would not be overrated by the present census. He was confident they would. If those words were out of the resolution, he would vote for it, but not otherwise.

Mr. NICHOLAS had no objection to the words being struck out, because if they were not, they must be guided by the last census, except a new one was taken; and if the gentleman could not take the sense of the House upon the propriety of taking a new census, without striking out these words, he hoped they would be struck out, in order to give him an opportunity of trying that question.

The question for striking out was put and negatived.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, the subject was an important one, and from his prepossessions (gentlemen perhaps might be inclined to call it prejudice) against a system of direct taxation, he could not think the House would be readily brought to agree to such a system. He only rose, however, then, to notice what had fallen from the gentlemen from New York and South Carolina [Mr. GILBERT and Mr. HARPER] who had wished to have the detail upon which the principle before them was to be carried into effect. He thought they should first decide upon the principle, whether they would resort to a power, which had never yet been resorted to, of raising revenue; in fact, whether a plan of direct or indirect taxes should be pursued. The decision upon this question should have no allusion to the manner of effecting it; because, if the Committee of the Whole did not think it necessary at this time to go into a system of direct taxation at all, they would so determine, and a plan of indirect taxation ought immediately to be considered. He was therefore far from wishing the resolution to be sent back to the Committee of Ways and Means to have the business detailed: he would have the abstract principle first decided upon. Mr. D. hoped the sentiments of gentlemen would be fully given upon this subject; for his own part, if he heard no stronger arguments in favor of the plan than had been offered, he should certainly be opposed to it.

Mr. W. SMITH thought the gentleman last up had placed the subject on its proper ground. The principle ought certainly to be first decided upon. It was acknowledged on all hands that there was a deficiency of revenue; gentlemen who were opposed to this plan, should therefore substitute some other in its place, since revenue must be had. It was a good parliamentary rule, that when a member opposed an object proposed for revenue, he should propose a substitute. It was easy to object to a thing. He disliked direct taxation himself, but since there appeared no other way of raising sufficiently ample funds, he saw the necessity of fixing upon this. If gentlemen would propose any other mode of raising the money wanted, he should be glad to consider it. He thought, at any rate, they should then determine upon the principle, before any further steps were taken in preparing any plan; and, if it should appear to be the opinion of a majority of the House that, under no consideration whatever, a system of direct taxation should be adopted, there would be an end of the business, and they must immediately turn their attention to some other way of raising the money required; for his part, he was afraid if they passed over from direct to indirect taxes, they should not come to anything effectual.

JANUARY, 1797.]

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WILLIAMS was of opinion with the gentleman from New Jersey [the SPEAKER] that the principle should then be determined upon; because to send the resolution back in order to have a plan digested, if it should eventually be rejected, would be an unnecessary waste of time. He wished gentlemen from every State would make their observations upon the subject, in order that they might determine whether some better plan could not be adopted. He thought every means of indirect taxation should be exhausted, before direct taxes should be resorted to.

Mr. W. said he did not think with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] that the landed interest did not pay their proportion of the present taxes. The consumers, it was allowed, were the payers of taxes; and until that gentleman proved that farmers did not consume taxable articles, he must not say they did not bear their proportion of the public burdens.

It was well observed, that our present revenue system was liable to be deranged by other nations; but perhaps it might be possible to adopt some other system, which should be more certain, without having reference to direct taxes. He could wish mercantile gentlemen would forbear throwing out insinuations that the landed interest did not pay their quota of the public expense. He believed they were unfounded, and he was certain they could have no good effect.

For the present, he should wish the Committee to rise, and hoped gentlemen would come forward another day, with their observations on this subject, that they might see if they could not hit upon some plan of raising the necessary supplies, without going into the plan of direct taxation.

The Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

DIRECT TAXATION.

Mr. COIT said, he wished to lay a resolution upon the table, somewhat connected with the subject which had just been discussed. It was a resolution requiring the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures to prepare and report a bill on the subject of direct taxation on land and slaves, the abstract principle of which had only been under discussion.

The resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped that gentlemen who objected to the mode of taxation proposed would tomorrow come forward with a substitute.

FRIDAY, January 13.

DIRECT TAXES.

A motion being about to be put for going into a Committee of the Whole, on the subject of further revenue—

Mr. COIT wished the House to take up the resolution he had yesterday laid upon the table. The difference between this resolution and the one reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, was, that this called for the particulars of the plan, whilst that called for an agreement to the principle of direct taxation without any reference to a plan. This difficulty occurred. Many gentlemen objected to a direct tax, because they could not see their way through any plan of carrying it into effect. He himself did not feel this difficulty. He should vote for the resolution; because, if a plan was brought forward which he did not approve, he should vote against it. It appeared to him, however, that the House would have a more distinct view of the subject, if they had a plan before them.

Mr. SWANWICK said, the objection which he had to the motion was, that it would embarrass the question whether or not the House would agree to any system of direct taxation? Some gentlemen thought it impossible to devise a plan for this purpose. It could not be expected, therefore, that the Committee of Ways and Means should produce such an one as would be wholly unobjectionable. Indeed, when he heard it asserted to be impossible, he trembled for the existence of our Government; for it could not exist without revenue, and he could not see how that revenue could be raised but by a land tax. The propriety of laying additional burdens on commerce had been suggested, but (as he had already stated) this would not probably increase the revenue, as it would most probably promote a spirit of smuggling. Let us go into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, said Mr. S., and let gentlemen bring forward their different plans, and then the Committee will be able to determine which will be most likely to be effectual, and attended with the least inconvenience. There was but one sentiment as to the necessity of provision being made; and he was of opinion, if it was once determined to have a direct tax, such a plan might be produced as would prove acceptable, when gentlemen should be convinced that some plan of direct taxation must be adopted.

The SPEAKER said, the only motion in order would be, that the Committee of the Whole on the subject of finance be discharged, in order to refer the present resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means, to instruct them to report a plan, or to commit the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the subject of finance.

Mr. HARPER asked whether it would not be in order, when the House should be in a Committee of the Whole, to move the present resolution by way of amendment to that reported?

The SPEAKER said, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would determine that question.

Mr. COIT moved that the Committee of the Whole on the subject of finance might be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, for the purpose of referring his resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the Committee would be discharged. He wished to have the plan in question before them, because, if it was not necessary to lay a land tax at present, it might be necessary at some future day. As to what had been said, that Government could not be supported without a land tax, he believed other means might be hit upon to raise the money required without a land tax—not that he would commit himself so far as to say he might not eventually vote for a land tax; but he believed if a small additional duty were to be laid upon salt and rum, and some other articles, there would be no difficulty in the business.

The SPEAKER reminded Mr. WILLIAMS of the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he was stating his reasons why the system of direct taxation should not now be determined upon, because he thought there were certain articles upon which a heavier duty might be laid; though he wished, at the same time, to have the plan of a direct tax brought into view, to act upon when necessity should require it.

Mr. CRAIK was in favor of the Committee of the Whole being discharged, in order that the Committee of Ways and Means might be instructed to report a plan. He said he was in favor of this proposition, not so much from any objection he had to vote for the resolution as reported, but because if they were to have a plan reported, they should be more likely to bring the subject to an early conclusion. He did not think, with some other gentlemen, that, by voting for that resolution, he should be bound to vote for any plan which might be reported. He had no fears of this sort; he believed himself always at liberty to vote as he pleased, and to change his opinion on any subject when he saw proper. But as some gentlemen had expressed their objections on this ground, he thought it would be well to refer this resolution.

Mr. C. said, he believed when they considered their real situation, that they were not called upon to determine whether additional revenue should be raised or not, but that revenue must by some means be raised. He trusted gentlemen would turn their minds in earnest to the subject. He believed this to be the important business of the session; and when he looked at the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he could not hesitate a moment in concluding that there was a necessity for acting with energy. Seeing, therefore, that they had no alternative, it became their business to have the subject thoroughly discussed, and to take a view of both sources, viz: direct and indirect taxation, in order to determine upon which system they would act. A resolution, he said, had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means some days ago, calling upon them to report what further revenue could be raised by indirect taxes. It would be well if that committee would bring into view all the subjects upon which indirect taxes might be raised or increased, in order to enable them to determine betwixt the two systems. It might, perhaps, be advisable to have recourse both to direct and indirect taxation; for though indirect means might supply our present wants, after the year 1800 they would certainly fall short, and he was not for putting off till to-morrow what might be done to day. It was necessary the attention of the people should be driven to the subject, and that Government should not be drawn to anticipations and loans, and to give extravagant prices for our own money.

He believed gentlemen opposed to direct taxation were not so much so from principle as from an idea that it was impossible to adopt a system which would fall equally upon all parts of the Union. It was to be wished, therefore, that the plans could be seen and agreed upon, since some gentlemen were apprehensive that by giving their assent to the abstract proposition, they should pledge themselves to support a plan, however objectionable, when it should be reported. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be referred, and a plan reported, upon principles which may be unobjectionable; gentlemen may then come forward and add to the list, or make such alterations as may be deemed expedient; they might tell the House whether or not they considered it proper to resort to both systems. Mr. C. thought, that from the present want of revenue to answer current expenses, and the view of these wants increasing, both systems of taxation ought to be resorted to, to answer those demands.

Mr. W. SMITH said, it was to be regretted that the gentleman from Connecticut had brought forward this proposition, as it caused them to debate about form rather than substance. The proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means went to say direct taxes should be laid; this directed the committee to report a bill. He thought it best to decide, in the first instance, whether direct taxes were necessary or not. By bringing the subject before the Committee of the Whole, gentlemen would have an opportunity of proposing their substitutes in place of the plan proposed; and, by contrasting one with the other, they should be able to judge which would prove the best mode. But gentlemen say no, we wish to see what kind of a bill the committee will bring forward; if we do not like it, we will reject it. What would gentlemen do? After three or four days' debate it will be sent back to the committee; by the time they report, it will be about the end of February, and on the 3d of March the House will break up. Gentlemen ought to be open, and state the particular views of their constituents on this subject; they surely must know. He thought the best way would be to go fairly into the business, and determine whether they would adopt any system of direct taxation which could be planned, and so far pledge themselves as to determine they will agree to any practicable plan which may be produced, as revenue must be had.

Mr. S. said, there could only be two objections to a system of direct taxation: either that by the Constitution there is not a sufficient power in the Government to raise such a tax, or that it is inexpedient. If gentlemen thought there was not sufficient power in the Constitution to raise such a tax, it should be so determined; or, if it were thought that money could be raised in a more convenient mode, it was proper to discuss the principle, and come to a determination upon the subject. This, he said, was the rational way of proceeding; for if once the principle was determined upon that a direct tax was necessary, a number of objections would be softened down by the necessity which was seen to exist for adopting a plan of this kind.

It had been observed, that a resolution had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, instructing them to report on the subject of indirect taxation. He did not object to the reference at the time, but he had yesterday declared that that committee had repeatedly attempted in vain to hit upon subjects of indirect taxation for further revenue, and that they had therefore recommended a system of direct taxation.

The committee had done their duty. Gentlemen may now propose what they think a necessary substitute; there could be no advantage in recommitting it, but it ought to undergo a full discussion in Committee of the Whole.

He hoped the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut would not be adopted, and that they should go into a Committee of the Whole on the business.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, the question was now whether they should determine upon something, or put it off till another time? We want revenue, said Mr. N., and we must have it; and was it not better, he asked, to determine upon what principle they should act, than to call upon the Committee of Ways and Means to report a plan? It was well known, he said, nothing but necessity could have obliged any member to have proposed direct taxes. Unless they first determined upon the principle, they should never be able to proceed; because, however perfect the system might be, objections would doubtless be made to it, and these would be made a pretence for doing away the bill altogether. He would have them now go into an investigation of the subject; when the gentleman from New York will, of course, propose his tax on salt and rum, and other gentlemen will bring forward their substitutes, so that they should be able to see whether any other effectual mode could be determined upon in preference to the one proposed; if not, they would be obliged to unite in agreeing to a direct tax. But if they were called upon to decide upon a detailed plan before they had decided upon the principle, it would never pass.

Mr. BUCK said, he hoped the Committee would not be discharged. It seemed to be agreed, on all hands, when the Constitution was adopted, that direct taxes should not be gone into, except in cases of urgency and necessity. It seemed now to be agreed that additional revenue was essential. The subject had been before the Committee of Ways and Means, whose peculiar province it was to attend to all money transactions, and they had reported that the period had arrived when it became necessary to resort to direct taxation. Why, then, should they shrink from the inquiry? Since they had said this was the time, unless it were to be presumed they had erred, or members were ready to propose some other means which they think preferable to direct taxes, they ought to pursue the report made, and take up the business. Taxes, he said, were always disagreeable, and it was with reluctance the people consented to pay any, except they saw advantage arising from the payment of them greater than to counterbalance the evil of paying. He knew, also, that a direct tax would be received with reluctance. He himself would never vote for it, but upon the principle of necessity. He wished, therefore, the subject to be discussed, because, if there was any better way of raising the money required, he should vote for it; but if not, and there was an absolute necessity for revenue, then necessity would force him to vote for a direct tax. The reasons assigned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] for wishing the Committee to be discharged, viz: because he thought indirect taxes might be found to answer the purpose, induced him to wish the inquiry to be thoroughly gone into, and that they should not amuse themselves by referring the report back to the Committee of Ways and Means, until they had decided that the time had arrived for laying a direct tax.

Mr. GALLATIN said, that although, in appearance, the difference between the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CORT] and that reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, was only in form, and not in substance, yet he saw great danger in adopting this proposition. This danger would arise, provided there should be a majority in that House determined to vote against a system of direct taxation at all events. If there were such a majority, he said, it would be well to know it as soon as possible, that they might either determine upon some other plan of raising revenue, or determine to retrench the present expenses of Government.

Many gentlemen might vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut, who would eventually be against a system of direct taxes; whereas he wished at present to know whether there was a majority in favor or against that system; if the majority was against it, it would be well to have it rejected at once.

Mr. G. said, he did not think any gentleman would be pledged by voting for the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, to support any bill which might be brought in in consequence of it, it contrary to his ideas of right. To vote for the resolution was no more than to say they were willing to adopt the system, provided it could be satisfactorily carried into effect. He hoped, therefore, there would be no more objections on that ground. He also hoped that those who intended to vote against direct taxes would vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut, and go into a Committee of the Whole; when, if they have a majority with them, they will vote out the proposition altogether.

He would not then, he said, say anything on the subject of direct taxation, as it would not be in order. He hoped the Committee of the Whole would not be discharged.

Mr. CRAIK said, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. W. SMITH] called this a question of principle. He agreed it was so; but he thought the measure proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut would produce the effect so much wished for. He believed he should be found to go as far as any gentleman in adopting efficient measures for raising revenue; but he thought the mode of preceeding chalked out by the resolution now proposed the best. He did not consider it as improper to have recourse to direct taxes, whilst there were any sources of indirect taxation existing. There might be subjects of indirect taxation which it would be improper at present to resort to; but his objection to deciding upon the abstract principle was this, that many members had greater objections to the business on account of the difficulty which they supposed would attend the carrying of it into effect, than to the principle itself. And it was in vain to tell gentlemen they might vote against the bill, if they did not like it, because they knew it was in the power of a majority to carry the bill, however objectionable, into effect.

The question for discharging the Committee of the Whole was put and negatived. The question was about to be taken on going into a Committee of the Whole; when

Mr. HARPER said, he was not more disposed than other members of that House to throw any obstacles in the way of providing revenue; nor of unnecessarily postponing a business with a view of defeating it by indirect methods. But he believed there was always more danger to be apprehended from hasty than from slow legislation. Large bodies like theirs, he said, suffered more from precipitation than from delay. If this observation was true, as it respected ordinary Legislative business, it was much more so as it respected finance, and new objects of finance—measures which were to have an extensive operation on the prosperity and happiness of the country. He was one of those who thought that a certain portion of time devoted to this subject would have been well spent; as the House, however, had not been of the same sentiment, but had determined to come to a decision upon the abstract principle, he should do what gentlemen had been several times called upon to do, viz: submit to the view of the House a proposition by which all the revenue which Government stands in need of, without having recourse to the tax on land and slaves, proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, might with ease be raised.

Mr. H. then proposed the following resolutions to the House:

"Resolved, That the duty now paid on salt be increased to — cents per bushel;

That the duty on that class of wares and merchandise imported from foreign countries, which now pays 10 per cent. ad valorem, be augmented to — per cent.;

That the duty on such merchandise as pays 12 1-2 per cent. be augmented to — per cent.;

That the duty on such merchandise as pays 15 per cent. be augmented to — per cent.;

That the duty on Madeira wine be augmented — per cent. on the present duty;

That the duty on Sherry, Lisbon, and certain unenumerated wines be augmented — per cent. on the present duty;

That the duty on foreign spirits not distilled from grain be augmented — per cent. on the present duty;

That the duty on Bohea tea be augmented — per cent. on the present duty;

That the duty on brown sugar be augmented — per pound;

That the sum of — be raised by a duty on stamps;

That the sum of — be raised by a tax on windows, by apportionment, according to Constitutional rules, among the different States."

Mr. H. said, he should not at present pretend to enter into a discussion of the principles, as that would do when the Committee of the Whole took it up; he therefore moved that the resolutions be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was referred the report of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER said, no discussion of the merits could take place in the House.

Mr. GALLATIN inquired whether there was not a resolution referred to the Committee of Ways and Means to the same effect by a gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HENDERSON?]

Mr. W. SMITH read the resolution.

Mr. VENABLE suggested the propriety of referring this resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. W. SMITH wished rather that the resolution should be committed to the Committee of the Whole. The Committee of Ways and Means, he said, had already determined that sufficient revenue could not be raised from indirect sources. He wished the sense of the Committee of the Whole to be taken on that subject.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

DIRECT TAXES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject.

Mr. COOPER said, the resolution for direct taxes was of such a nature as to justify each member speaking his sentiments freely and fully on a subject so interesting to their common country.

JANUARY, 1797.]

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

Direct taxes, he said, had always been considered as only to be justified as a resort in times of necessity. This was his opinion: this he thought the opinion of the framers of the Constitution. This being the construction, it became a question whether we were now in that situation; whether we can support the expenses of Government; whether we can pay the interest and principal of our Debt; whether we can meet the Algerine contract; whether we can keep up our foreign intercourse; whether we can, in short, support the honor and character of the United States, without having recourse to this method of taxation? If we could do this, then this mode should be left unexplored till the worst of times.

This, he said, was the principle upon which the Committee ought to go, to which every obstacle should fall: he should therefore offer a few sentiments on the subject.

Mr. C. said, he had no expectation that a direct tax on land would meet with the general approbation of the citizens of the United States. It did not meet with his; but, perhaps interest, he said, might influence him, since it would bring the whole of his property under the law; it would bear heavy on him; he should, however, vote for the resolution. He should do so because he thought our commerce already sufficiently shackled, and because our citizens had had no experience in window taxes and stamp duties, and therefore would not relish them; and more especially, because, in times like the present, when all Europe was at war, it was more difficult to support our neutrality and honor as a nation, than in times of peace. They had a number of things which put them in mind in difficult times, and he thought they were sufficiently warranted to make resort to suitable provision.

This being the case, Mr. C. said, he was desirous to do all in his power to secure an ample substantial revenue, in order to enable us to meet our engagements with punctuality; because, it was, with Governments as with families, when want approached, they were apt to censure each other as a cause of the evil. This had always been the case. The only remedy, was to make provision beforehand; to keep oil in our lamp, in order to see our way on every side.

Mr. HARPER said they had been informed, further revenue was wanted. Every gentleman who had advocated a system of direct taxation had taken means to prove this, which was unnecessary. He admitted the fact in the amplest extent. But there was another position of gentlemen in which he by no means agreed, viz: that the source of indirect taxation would, if resorted to, be unproductive, and that it had long since been exhausted, consequently, that we must have recourse to a land tax to procure the necessary supplies. This statement he entirely dissented from. He was persuaded this country possessed ample sources of revenue, through established channels, to raise all the money they wanted. The question, then, was one of expediency, whether this or that mode of raising revenue shall be adopted? And here he would observe, that however the tax was laid, it must be paid by the people—the possessor of the soil and consumer must pay. The whole question was, Which way will be the most convenient to draw the sum wanted from them? Whether by a circuitous and indirect mode, or by a direct and positive method? In comparing these different modes of taxation, it would be necessary to take a view of the difference of circumstances which distinguished this country from others, of whose practice in this respect we had some knowledge.

He confessed there were great difficulties attending this subject. He was not ashamed to confess himself very unequal, not only to the task of indicating to the House what measures would be proper to be taken, but even of judging for himself on the subject. It was a subject which had engaged for a long time the best talents of this country, and there still existed a division of opinion about which was the best mode of raising revenue; but, when an individual was called upon to form a judgment, however difficult the task may be, he must take some course or other, and in his choice he could only be directed by his own understanding, improved and informed by the experience of others.

Since the subject was full of difficulties on all sides, they had only to choose between evils. He was of opinion that whatever objections might be brought against the system of indirect taxation, that the inconveniences of that system were far less than those which would be found in a system of direct taxation. With respect to a land tax, or tax on real property, there were circumstances in which he believed it the very best mode of raising revenue which could be adopted, viz: in a country where wealth and population were equally diffused throughout the whole Territory; where markets were, of course, every where convenient; where a farmer could easily exchange his labor for another man's labor, or where produce sold every where at nearly the same price. In such a country, he believed a land tax was a very good tax; there the ratio upon which such a tax might be equally laid, was readily attainable; but, in our country, he said, the situation of things was totally different.

It was well known that the great population and wealth of this country lay near the seacoast, and that, in proportion as it was receded from, the population became thin and the country comparatively poor by being far removed from a market for the produce of the soil. The exchange against a man removed three hundred miles from the coast was so great that much of what he sent to market was wasted by the expense of conveyance. Hence results, said he, the scarcity of money which exists in the interior of a country like ours, which renders the payment of a small sum inconvenient; and this difficulty cannot be removed by any regulation which can be introduced. A man on the Monongahela, called upon for twenty shillings, would find it lie heavier upon him than a farmer on the Delaware would find twenty pounds lie upon him, as he would experience more than twenty times the difficulty in procuring the money; for, from the scarcity of a circulating medium, in remote situations, it was almost impossible to convert the most valuable articles of produce into money, whilst persons living near a good market were able to sell the most trifling articles for a good price.

Direct Taxes.

These observations were so well verified in that part of the country with which he was best acquainted, that though the most equitable valuation had taken place, yet a tax which had been laid in consequence of that valuation, had been collected with the greatest difficulty.

It would be found, therefore, from these statements (for the truth of which he appealed to every gentleman who had thought upon the subject) that let direct taxes be laid in whatever manner they might, they would bear extremely hard in some cases, though they might be perfectly light in others. This he considered as one of the greatest objections to a land tax—an objection which did not exist in European countries, as they are full of inhabitants, and the farmer had everywhere a market for his produce.

Indirect taxes, on the contrary, Mr. H. said, were collected with facility, and were voluntarily paid. If a man found himself pinched for money, he might refrain from purchasing, at least for a time, of such articles as were taxed, and not immediately necessaries of life, or he would make a less quantity serve him; but a direct tax could not be avoided, however unable a man might be to pay it. Hence, he said, would arise executions and a variety of distress amongst that class of citizens who were unable to meet the demands of Government.

Another objection, not less strong to direct taxation, was the impossibility of apportioning such a tax equally. He said impossibility, and he was warranted in the expression. He was desirous of hearing how the Committee of Ways and Means meant to apportion and collect this tax; but this information was withheld, and they were called upon to agree to the principle without any plan of carrying it into effect. He said it was impossible, from two causes: first from markets being remote in some parts and convenient in others, and consequently land being of much less value in some parts than in others, and from the vast inequality which took place in proportion to population and to the improved or unimproved state of agriculture. So that some parts of the same district were of much more value than others, and even some farms more than others, from the superior skill and industry of their present possessors, or of those who heretofore possessed them. There was no part of the country, he said, where this remark would not be verified. Combine with this circumstance the contiguity and distance from markets, and the impossibility of an equal apportionment would appear evident. Nor was the distance from a market alone to be considered, but roads were an insurmountable objection in some parts of the country. How these difficulties were to be overcome, he was at a loss to see. He believed such a tax could not be laid with any degree of justice. It had been attempted in some States; in some it had been found impracticable, and in others attended with very great inconvenience. In the State which he represented, it had been attempted upon a principle which seemed to be generally approved; but it had been found that a man who possessed land of four times the value of his neighbor, paid no higher tax than he who possessed the poor land.

What, said Mr. H., must then be done? Would you resort to an assessment? If so, you embrace an immense expense. For an assessor to go through the United States, and class every farm according to its value, would not only be very expensive, but it would require a very long time to accomplish such a business; and the expense could not be stated at less than from twenty to forty per cent. the first year upon the sum raised. And to preserve any thing like a just valuation, it must frequently be repeated, as from emigration, population, fertility, and a variety of other causes, the value of property was continually changing, and thereby the expense would become very heavy. Besides, from the attachments and interests of the persons employed on such an occasion, there would be no certainty of obtaining a just valuation, it would appear incalculable.

After all, it would be impossible to come at the real value of land; the carelessness of your collectors will be found a great obstacle, their indolence will prompt them to hasten over their business without that attention necessary to such a material object. Will your assessors go through the woods, justly estimate the value of every farm, consider the relative worth as it respects situation, soil, and culture? No, sir, said Mr. H., they will care about nothing so much as pocketing the salary you allow them: hence, many would be assessed four times more, and others not half the value of their land. In small and thickly inhabited districts it may be more equalized; but when the assessor has to explore those parts, where, to assess five or six individuals, it would require four or five weeks, is an idea which would deter reasonable men from attempting such a scene. In other countries, where land tax was obtained, it was not so: there they are mostly under yearly rent; the rent will there estimate the value of the property, and afford the means to collect the tax. No difficulty could there arise in the apportionment, but in this country almost every man in the country lives on his own land.

Viewing all these objections, therefore, he believed it would be allowed—if it was not impossible, it was at least impracticable to any good effect to lay an equal land tax.

These objections, he remarked, could not be urged against indirect taxation; but there were other objections. They were told that the source of indirect taxation was so far exhausted, that to increase these taxes would risk the introduction of smuggling, by which the morals of individuals would be destroyed, and the revenue diminished. These, he allowed, if true, were serious objections; but he denied their truth. How did it appear that this source had been so much exhausted that no addition could be made without introducing smuggling? There was no statement to prove this; but he believed he should produce a statement which would prove the contrary. He believed the duties on several articles were rapidly increasing. This proved that the duty was paid with ease and convenience, and that it might be augmented without danger. But they were told, that whilst the revenue depended upon commerce, it was in the power of foreign nations greatly to embarrass it, and utterly to destroy it by a war with this country. The propriety was therefore urged of transferring the taxes from sources which might be so affected to internal sources.

Direct Taxes.

These objections, Mr. H. said, deserved to be very seriously weighed. He believed them to be infinitely the most solid which could be urged against this mode of taxation; and, if true in their whole extent, would afford real ground of objection. But, in the first place, it may be remarked, we are already in this predicament, as our resources depend upon duties arising from foreign articles imported; and we should be no more so by increasing those duties, since we were as effectually under that influence, while five millions were drawn from that source, as if double the sum was drawn from it. He would ask, if the danger was increased by increasing the duty? He believed not; but that the benefits would be increased, without increasing the danger or evil.

He believed, however, that this objection was so solid as to command attention, and to require us to shape our course accordingly. He believed it was advisable for them to turn their eyes from foreign to domestic sources of revenue, and commence a system, which may be increased as necessity may require, and upon which may be transferred a part at least of that duty which is at present drawn from foreign sources. This, he thought, was sound policy, and this would be found to be his intention.

There was another point of view in which the plan he should propose recommended itself. They all knew money was immediately wanted. They were not to project a revenue which would be wanted by and by—one million two hundred thousand dollars were wanted directly. This sum, he said, might immediately be drawn from established channels; but, how long a time, he asked, would it take to raise it by a direct tax? Those who were best acquainted with the subject would be able to say there was always great uncertainty in new sources of revenue, particularly when the object of taxation was entirely untried. Circumstances might hereafter justify a transfer of a part of this tax, but, at present, the system of taxes already organized should be resorted to, as in that there could be no deception; they would only have to ask for the money and it would be there.

He believed it would be unnecessary to extend any further his general observations on the introduction of this subject. He should now submit to the Committee a sketch of objects which he meant to propose in place of a direct tax on land. He did not mean this as a complete system; some of the articles might, perhaps, be properly enough struck out, and others introduced. He intended more to recommend the plan than any particular object. He would, however, point out the sources which had struck him as proper to be resorted to, and leave the Committee to determine upon the propriety of adopting or rejecting them.

1st. Salt, at present, paid twelve cents per bushel, and the clear increase of duty from 1793 to 1795 had been from $247,000 to $345,000. This increase, he said, proved that the present duty was no way burdensome, as the consumption had greatly increased. He therefore proposed an addition of twelve cents per bushel, which would make an increase of duty of at least $300,000. If it was thought this was too great an increase, a less might be adopted. It might be said this was taxing a necessary of life; but, he said, if salt was taxed he could use what he pleased of it; but the same remark would not hold good with respect to a tax on land. Three bushels of salt would serve a laboring man, his wife, and three or four children a year, or admitting it to be four bushels, this additional duty would only amount to half a dollar; and what portion of a land-tax would fall lighter than this? It would be said, salt was used for cattle also. The quantity used for this purpose, he believed, was small. A bushel of salt would be enough for thirty cattle in a year, but if it were two bushels, the additional duty would only be a quarter of a dollar, which would not be felt by a man who kept this number of cattle; and if his number was larger, and he was a dealer, those to whom he sold them would pay the duty. The same observation would hold good with respect to salt used in salting up provisions for sale.

2d. His next object was an augmentation of the tax on foreign merchandise, which at present paid ten per cent. ad valorem. This duty, he said, increased from 1793 to 1795, from $455,000 to $1,781,000. There had, indeed, been a small increase of duty between 1793 and 1794, which operated in 1794, but the increase of duty had not been by any means equal to this increased produce; and this being the case, it might be concluded the duty had been paid with convenience, and that it would bear an augmentation, and more particularly if it was recollected that the articles included in this class were mostly articles of luxury and expense, and consequently far objects of taxation, since the tax would fall upon the rich consumers. Perhaps, he said, there might be some articles of necessity in the list, which might be deducted, without making a material difference in his calculation. He would propose to augment this class of articles to fifteen per cent., which would produce $500,000.

Almost the whole of this class were articles of expense and luxury, few are articles of necessity. It is composed of bottles, wire, anchors, locks, blank-books, brushes, sticks, cottons, muslins, calicoes, satin, silks, corduroys, velveretts, &c. Will not these call on the rich, that are able to pay? If you only add 27½ per cent. it will produce twenty thousand dollars.

3d. The twelve-and-a-half per cent. duties ad valorem. They had, within the period above-mentioned, risen thus :

In 1793	-	-	-	$83,000
1794	-	-	-	241,000
1795	-	-	-	645,000
				$969,000

This duty having increased five-fold, (allowing for a small increase of duty, as in the former case,) it might very well be augmented, especially as the articles in this class were also articles of luxury and expense. Suppose two-and-a-half per cent. be added to this class, it would produce $100,000. The articles in this class are printed cottons, muslins, manufactured wood, &c.

4th. His next object was that class of foreign merchandise which at present paid fifteen per cent. The nett revenue of this class in 1793 was $81,000; in 1794, $362,000; in 1795, $885,000. This class of articles, he said, was exceedingly numerous, and comprised many articles of general consumption by all classes of the community, but also some of expense. Perhaps it would not be advisable to increase the duty very much on this class, particularly as many of the articles were such as were manufactured in this country, and to increase the duty too much, might encourage a monopoly amongst our manufacturers at home, which he would wish to avoid. He should think, however, twenty-five per cent. upon the present amount might very well be laid, which would produce $100,000.

Madeira wine was an article, the duty upon which might be increased, though it was already pretty high. In 1793 this duty had produced $117,000; in 1794, $152,000; in 1795, $190,000. The consumption, it appeared, had increased very considerably, and he thought it would at least bear ten per cent. upon the present duty, which would produce $15,000. He believed this might be done; but, if it should be doubtful, it might be dropped without inconvenience.

Sherry, Lisbon, and certain other enumerated wines, the duties upon which he believed had increased more than upon Madeira, he proposed an augmentation which should be equal to $15,000.

Foreign spirits, not distilled from grain was amongst the objects on which an augmentation might take place. This article produced, in 1793, $898,000; in 1794, $1,492,000; in 1795, $1,400,000. The drawback in 1795 had been greater than in the preceding year. He would augment this duty ten per cent. on the present amount, which would produce $100,000.

Bohea tea was an article of great consumption, which at present paid ten cents per pound.—In 1793 this article had produced $163,000; in 1794, $226,000; and in 1795, $222,000. He said he was not so certain with respect to the propriety of increasing the duty upon this article, as upon others. The smallness of its bulk made it a convenient article for smuggling, and it would not, therefore, be prudent to advance the duty too high upon it. He thought, however, 10 per cent. might be added to it, which would produce twenty thousand dollars.

Brown sugar, he said, now paid $1\frac{1}{2}$ cent per lb. It had produced in 1793, \$646,000; in 1794, \$510,000; in 1795, \$710,000. This duty of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cent. having been found a very light duty, being more so than the duty upon most foreign articles, he would propose to augment it one cent per lb., which would produce \$400,000, or half a cent would produce \$200,000.

These augmentations, added together, he said, would amount to $1,450,000.

This sum, he believed, might be very well raised by additional imposts, which was a greater sum than was wanted; $1,200,000 being the estimated sum required. The augmentations which he had proposed might therefore be greatly reduced. This additional revenue, he said, would be raised without an increase of expense of one cent in the pound, by a system of collection already established and understood, and might be produced without delay, uncertainty, or extra trouble.

He proposed also that $100,000 should be raised by a tax on stamps; and 150 or 200,000 dollars by a tax on windows.

He proposed these, he said, not so much with a view to immediate revenue, but as a means of transferring by degrees the revenue from foreign to a domestic source. He had no doubt that a tax on stamps might be made to produce $500,000, and a tax on windows $400,000, if wanted. This might also be done with great facility, and would be infinitely preferable to a land-tax, as it would fall equally upon all parts of the Union. He was not sure but a tax upon hearths might not be still better; and by these measures they would see how far they could go in drawing revenue from internal instead of foreign sources.

This, he said, must be gradual. The first thing necessary was to organize a tax, which might take several years to bring to perfection. In the mean time, they should get what was immediately wanted from the sources he had already pointed out; and, in case of future wants, they could have recourse to the stamp and window, or hearth-tax.

Mr. H concluded with saying, he was sensible the plan he had proposed was an imperfect one; but as gentlemen had been cautioned against objecting to the system of direct taxation, except they produced a substitute, he had produced this, which might be added to, or diminished from, as the Committee should see proper. He was convinced of the necessity of further revenue, and he believed that the patriotism of the people of this country would induce them to pay whatever tax they might be convinced was necessary.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the committee to whom it was referred to inquire whether any and what amendments were necessary in the act relative to

JANUARY, 1797.]

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

the Military Establishment, made a report, recommending sundry alterations, the principal of which was the repeal of that part of the act which relates to light dragoons, and to a Major General and his staff.

The report was ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATION.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom was referred the confidential communication received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES a few days ago, gave notice that he had a report to make on the subject. The House and galleries were accordingly cleared.

This business finished, the House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, January 16.

A bill was received from the Senate, for giving force and effect to the laws of the United States in the State of Tennessee; which was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the subject of appropriations; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARPER laid a resolution on the table, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to lay, at stated periods, certain statements of duties and drawbacks before the House.

Mr. AMES moved a resolution to the following effect, viz:

"That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire whether it would not be expedient, for the better security of navigation, to place a number of buoys within and near the harbor of Boston, and report by bill or otherwise."

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Frederic Hebner. It stated that the claim had been cleared off in 1784, and complained of the impropriety of applying to the House without proper examination beforehand.

Mr. MUHLENBERG said that the petition had been presented by him. The fact had proved to be, that the executors of the person to whom the balance was due never received one farthing. There was much reason to think that the money had been obtained by a third person, in virtue of a forged power of attorney; this, as he believed, would be proved in a Court of Justice. He did not mean to object to the report; he only stated this excuse for the petitioner.

The report, negating the petition, was agreed to.

RULES OF THE HOUSE,

Mr. MUHLENBERG, from the committee to whom it was referred to report whether any and what additional Standing Rules were necessary to be added to those already adopted, reported the following:

"That every member presenting a petition or memorial, shall state its contents, and if it appear in substance the same as has been already decided upon by the House, it shall not be received except new matter of fact appear therein."

Ordered to lie on the table.

CLAIMS OF GEORGIA.

Mr. W. SMITH said the Attorney General had been directed to make a report to Congress, in March, 1795, relative to a claim of the State of Georgia to certain lands, which had never been made to that House, but to the Senate only. He said the land in question was of great extent and value, and some measure ought to be taken on the subject. He therefore proposed that a message should be sent to the Attorney General for a copy of that report; which was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of further revenue; when

Mr. HENDERSON addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Chairman: I am very sensible that our present revenue system is not sufficiently productive to answer the exigencies of Government, and that it is necessary, during the present session, to adopt some measures to improve it. This, I believe, will be admitted by all, and the only question is, as to the mode by which it shall be accomplished.

Two modes of obtaining an increase of revenue are contemplated. The one, by extending the present system of indirect taxation as far as prudence will admit: the other, by having recourse to direct taxation.

Upon taking a comparative view of the two different modes, the advantages that appear to my mind to arise out of and flow from the first, have so much the preponderance, that I cannot give my assent to the adoption of the other, until the improvement of the system of individual taxation has been fairly tried, and shall prove insufficient to meet the necessary expenditures of Government.

Sir, I will take the liberty to enumerate a few of the advantages that the present system possesses, which cannot be attached to the new one. This system has been organized, for a considerable length of time, and the citizens have got accustomed to, and are generally well satisfied with it. It can be extended without any change in the system, or perhaps the appointment of one new officer. It will occasion the least possible expense in the collection. It is the most easy and agreeable mode of raising revenue from our citizens in the power of Government to adopt. They pay the tax voluntarily and imperceptibly; they have an option to consume much or little; and in proportion to their consumption will be their contribution to the revenue.

Sir, the revenue arising from this system has been in a state of progression ever since the system was got into operation, and I trust may be preserved in that state. It has, I believe, answered the most sanguine expectations of its promoters; and I have very little doubt on my mind but that it would have met all the common exigencies of Government, if there had not of late arisen some very extraordinary and heavy expenses, which greatly augmented our Public Debt.

Sir, with regard to the system of direct taxation, almost every member who has advocated the measure, acknowledges that it will be attended with considerable embarrassment, and I believe the opinion to be well-founded. Great innovations upon systems of taxation are generally embarrassing. It is to us unexplored ground. The drawing of revenue by coercion, from our citizens, appears to me one of the most delicate and difficult subjects that Government can engage in. Besides the danger of increasing the excitement of the public mind, and of alienating the affections of our citizens from the present Government, I think that the difficulty of laying a land tax, upon principles of equal justice, (a principle that ought always to be kept in view,) will be almost insuperable. This sentiment was so fully and ably discussed by the member from South Carolina, who was last up on the subject, that there is little room for any further remarks upon it. I will proceed to observe that this system will require an entire new organization, which cannot be carried into operation short of a very heavy expense, and the earliest probable time that it will afford aid to our revenue will be considerably remote. With regard to the expenses of the system, the Secretary of the Treasury appears to have been sensible that the collection of taxes in this way would be very expensive, as will appear by a statement in his report upon the system. In that report he apportions the sum of $1,484,000 to the several States; from which he deducts, for abatements, erroneous assessments, and charges of collection, fifteen per cent., amounting to $222 600, leaving the nett proceeds of the tax, $1,262 400; an expense vastly exceeding the expenses of collection under the present system—a view of which I will attempt to exhibit, as contained in the last statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the duties upon imports, tonnage, &c. The nett proceeds are stated at $7,959,409 70, and the expenses of collection are stated at $260 359 21, making between three-and-a-half and four per centum. The difference will be as 15 to 3, 34, or at most, to 4.

Sir, with regard to the expenses of collection, I would ask, if any member would want a moment's time to determine which is the preferable system? I apprehend not.

Sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was first up on this subject, regretted exceedingly that a system of direct taxation had not been adopted long since by Government. For my part, I differ very much in opinion from that gentleman upon this point, and I can say, that instead of regretting, I rejoice that such a system has not yet been adopted, and have full confidence that the measures of Government will not be paralyzed, as that gentleman seems to think, if it should be postponed. That gentleman is engaged in the commercial line; I am in the agricultural line; which, perhaps, may account for our great difference in opinion upon this point. However consonant it may be to the feelings and interests of the commercial part of our citizens to have the revenue raised in this way, sure I am that the gentleman, with all the force of eloquence and reasoning that he is possessed of, will never be able to convince the great body of the yeomanry of this country that it will be more for their interest to collect the revenue at the expense of 15 per cent. than at the expense of 3 or 4 per cent.

Sir, it appears that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has it in contemplation to throw the whole burden of Government upon the farmer. If I recollect right, his words were these: "The wealth of the country must have become so considerable, from the high price which every agricultural production had long been at, as to enable them very well to support the expenses of Government." With regard to which, I would observe that, under the present system, in my opinion, the farmer generally bears an equitable proportion of the expenses of Government. There may be some few exceptions, as it is impossible that any revenue system can be established that will operate equally in proportion to wealth upon every citizen, and it would be highly impolitic to lay the whole burden of the revenue upon any one particular class or description of citizens; but the surest policy is, to let both agricultural and commercial bear their parts, as they now do.

The gentleman further observed, "that, if peace was made between the nations at war, he had no doubt but there would be a defalcation of the revenue." He offered no reason to support his opinion; and, as I am of a different opinion, I will in a few words offer the reasons why I think our revenue, instead of meeting with any considerable shock from that event, (so ardently to be wished for by every humane mind—by every true American,) will be improved. Commerce depends chiefly upon wealth and population. If peace should take place, our wealth and population will progress very fast. I think we may reasonably calculate upon a larger ratio of wealth and population emigrating from all parts of Europe to America. In proportion to the increase thereof will be the demand for, and consumption of, imported articles. Our commerce will not only be continued with the old, but be extended to new markets, which will of course increase the quantity of imposts and tonnage; and, in proportion as they are increased, will our revenues be augmented.

The gentleman observed that, with respect to the excise, he need not say how unproductive it had been. The article of snuff, instead of producing anything, had brought the revenue in debt; and that the excise on another article had called forth the military to enforce it. Sir, if the gentleman had attended to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, speaking on this subject of internal revenue, he would not have made so unqualified an expression as to the produce of the excise. The Secretary of the Treasury informs that the product of the internal revenues for the present year will be considerably more than the year past; for the year past, they were stated at between $300,000 and $400,000. With regard to the article of snuff, it is obvious to every one that this arose from the advantage that was taken of the law; but the law being suspended, there can be no further loss; and I think that when it shall be amended, we may count upon a nett product hereafter from that article. With regard to the article that the gentleman alludes to, that the excise upon it had called forth the military to enforce it, I would only remark, that it is now becoming certainly productive and generally satisfactory: and as to the unhappy circumstance of the military being called forth, I believe that it was not owing to any inherent principle of the law, but much more to extraneous causes, which I shall not attempt to explain. The gentleman went on to observe that the augmentation of the duties would not prove an augmentation of our revenues. I believe that opinion to be incorrect; and I think if the gentleman had attended to the fiscal operations of our Government, he would not have advanced it. Sir, our duties have been repeatedly raised, and daily experience convinces us that our revenue has uniformly been in a state of progression. Sir, the gentleman endeavored to enforce his argument by referring to the recommendation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES upon the subject. For my part, I would ever wish to pay all due respect to the recommendations of the PRESIDENT, as I sincerely believe that they are founded in wisdom and patriotism. But, until the gentleman can change the phraseology of the PRESIDENT's recommendations upon the occasion, he cannot make the argument apply. The PRESIDENT has never, in any communication that I have met with, conveyed the idea of a land tax being necessary; and I contend that we are as much complying with his recommendation by raising the revenue wanted in the one mode as we would be in the other.

Direct Taxes.

[H. or R.]

Sir, as members are called upon for a substitute, and to specify such items of indirect taxation as they judge proper for that purpose, I will take the liberty to mention a few, in addition to the many that were enumerated by the gentleman from South Carolina, that appear to me as proper objects to embrace or to extend the duty on. And, first, with regard to such as have not yet been noticed by Government. Of this description, are all theatrical exhibitions, porter manufactured within the United States, clocks, and watches. It will be obvious, at first view, that these are articles of convenience or luxury, that are generally used by those who are the most able to bear the burden of Government, and may be used or omitted at pleasure. Sir, with regard to theatrical exhibitions, we need only to turn our eyes to the large and expensive buildings occupied for those purposes, to convince us that the sources of private revenue derived from their exhibitions must be very extensive; and, if so, that they will be a proper object to raise some public revenues from. With regard to porter, manufactured within the United States. I think there may some revenue be derived therefrom with as much propriety as from spirits distilled, and the manufacturer might be protected by an additional duty upon imported porter. With regard to clocks and watches, they are articles of convenience, chiefly used by those who would not be distressed by a small tax; and I am inclined to think, from the great number in use, that a considerable sum might be raised from them. With regard to articles that will bear an extension of duty, I agree in opinion with the gentleman from South Carolina, who gave us so full a detail upon the subject, as to the greater part of the imported articles, and should have been glad if he had included all kinds of teas, instead of confining his calculations to bohea only, and also beer, ale, and porter, among the class of liquors. With regard to the finer teas, I am of opinion that they will all bear an addition of duty, from this one consideration: that we use them upon better terms at present, under the duty they pay, than we formerly used the inferior kind. With regard to beer, ale, and porter, I would propose an additional tax, not only to aid the revenue, but to protect the manufacturer among ourselves. Of the duty paid upon these articles, I expect that foreigners would pay the greater part, as they generally give imported the preference. I am inclined to think, that, if the duty may be raised upon imported, it may also be raised upon spirits manufactured in the United States.

Sir, I would wish to make one or two observations upon the statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina, who gave us a detail of the expenses and the probable revenue of Government. I find in his statement of the probable revenues from existing laws, under the items of duties on imports and tonnage, the amount of $5,588,961, computed as the annual nett proceeds. I find in the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury, wherein he exhibits a general view of the amount of revenue upon imports and tonnage for the year 1795, the nett proceeds to be calculated at $7,959,409 70—making a difference of $2,370,448 70. I find, also, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the system of direct taxes, the following observations, viz: "What the product of the present year will be, cannot be yet known; although it is certain that it will exceed considerably that of the year 1795." The nett proceeds of the year 1795 being, as I have before mentioned, $7,959,409 70, and being informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that the amount of duties upon imports and tonnage this year will with certainty considerably exceed that sum, I am at a loss to determine upon what principle the gentleman has founded his calculation of $5,588,961 for the true amount of revenue, unless he should have taken it only from the actual receipts, which I should not suppose would be correct; because the difference between the receipts of cash in the Treasury and the amount of duties must create a debt due the Treasury in the hands of somebody that must be paid, and will prove in aid of the revenue. I make no doubt but that the gentleman who gave us the statement, from his knowledge of the subject, and usual correctness, can explain the reasons of the difference. I would further observe that, under the same head, the items relating to internal revenues are stated at sums considerably below the amount of the present year. The Secretary of the Treasury informs us that the product of the internal revenues for the present year will be considerably more than the year past. I think the gentleman has omitted in his statement one or two items that appear to me deserving of some notice—I mean the probable amount of sales of land under the act of May last, and the debt due from J. C. Symmes and his associates. I think we have a right, with some degree of certainty, to calculate upon some productive aid to our revenue from the sale of public lands. I am informed that there have already been sold above 100,000 acres, at from two to five dollars per acre; which, at an average of three-and-a-half dollars, will make $350,000; which I should suppose a considerable item in the revenue account. And as the law has been but a short time in operation, I think we have reason to expect considerable aid to our revenue from this source. With regard to the debt of Mr. Symmes, (if the contract is fulfilled on the part of Government, agreeably to the report of the Attorney General.) it will make a considerable item in the revenue account. According to my calculations, there will be better than $400,000 immediately to be paid, or placed upon interest, and paid in six half-yearly instalments.

Sir, the gentleman, in the course of his remarks, proposed the small sum of $200,000 to be raised by direct taxes. This sum, it is true, does not at first appear at all alarming; but I have heard, upon former occasions, the idea of an entering-wedge to a system suggested. This would operate as a complete one. Although small, yet the more dangerous; for (to pursue the comparison) persons with wedges, having great force to overcome, make use of slim or small ones first, as they are more easily introduced, and soon make way for larger ones. This, I expect, would be the effect of the proposed system, and probably, in time, would make way for the full accomplishment of the measure suggested by the member from Pennsylvania, which I before stated, to throw the whole burden upon the farmer.

Sir, these being my sentiments, I must vote against the resolution now offered.

Mr. VARNUM said, he considered it the indispensable duty of this House, and of each and every member of it, as much as it was in our power, to preserve inviolate the public faith, and to make all necessary provision for the payment of the just debts of the United States. But in doing this, we ought to have recourse to such objects of taxation, and such methods of collection, as we have reason to believe will be most agreeable to the people.

The Government, no doubt, said Mr. V., under an impression that they were doing right, have resorted to imposts and excises, as the proper mode of raising a revenue; and experience has evinced that this mode of taxation is a feasible one in the United States; it places very large sums of money in your Treasury annually; and it is paid by the people with a greater degree of cheerfulness in this way than it probably would be through the channel of taxation. Many of the objects from which our revenue is raised, by duties on imposts and excise, are articles of luxury and superfluity, and as they are generally considered to be such, those who make use of them do willingly pay the tax laid on them by the Government, and I presume will continue so to do, so long as the money shall be appropriated to purposes which are promotive of the good of the Union. Duties on those articles which may be more properly classed among the necessities of life, are paid by the consumer when he purchases the article, and are less felt by him than they would be if the whole duties of a year were to be paid in a gross sum.

By this mode of taxation, it is true, the poor and the industrious people, whose income and labor barely supplying them with the common necessities of life, do not pay any part of the tax or duty on wines, teas, silks, carriages, and a great variety of other matters; and why should they when their necessity entirely prevents their ever making use of them? Yet the duty is paid, and it comes from the proper source; the man in possession of the money remits it to the public, and the poor man is thereby enabled to supply his children with bread, to assuage their hunger, and buy clothing to guard them against the inclemency of the weather. Thousands of such people are within the United States. It is a maxim that will always hold good, that "money must be looked for where it is, and not where it is not."

Hence I conceive the present mode of collecting a revenue, under the Government of the United States, to be far preferable to a land tax. It is paid by the people with more facility, and realized by the Government with more certainty. Besides, the system is arranged and in a regular operation: all the officers are appointed who would be necessary if a much larger sum were to be raised in the same way; so that the expense of collecting any additional duties on imposts and excise, would be comparatively very small.

I am, therefore, clearly of the opinion that any additional sums which may at present be needed for defraying the expenses of the Government, or for the payment of their just debts, ought to be raised by duties on imposts and excises. That is a method of taxation with which we are acquainted, and which experience has taught us the operation of under this Government.

But such is the variegated interest of the United States, and such their diversified method of levying and collecting direct taxes, that no uniform system of direct taxation can be devised, which will apply to the custom of any two of the States; and unless you adopt the rules of some one of the States, your system will be diverse from any one which has ever been practised upon in any part of this Union. But if you adopt the method which has been prescribed by any one of the State Governments, and which may probably be very properly adopted, to suit the circumstances and conciliate the feelings of the people of such State; even in that case, you will have the prevailing opinion of the people in fifteen States out of sixteen directly opposed to your system. And

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

this opinion having been acquired from long experience of the operation of direct taxes, (which most of the States have of necessity constant resort to for the support of their State Governments, and for discharging the debts contracted in the late war with Great Britain,) and which, being founded on social circumstances, habits, and attachments, are very hard to be eradicated, will very much retard the operation of the system, if not render it entirely impracticable.

The Secretary's report on this subject brings into view three modes of levying direct taxes, with which the House are acquainted.

The first of these modes has for its object an apportionment on each State, on Constitutional principles, assigning a time for the money to be paid into the Treasury, on failure of any State to be assessed and collected by the authority of the United States, upon the same objects of taxation, and pursuant to the same rules by which the last taxes were assessed and collected in such State :

"1. That an act of Congress should be passed declaring the quotas of the different States, assigning a time for payment into the Treasury, and prescribing, in cases of delinquency, that the said quotas should be assessed and collected by authority of the United States, upon the same objects of taxation, and pursuant to the same rules by which the last taxes were assessed and collected by the respective States.

"2. That the act of Congress should direct that the proposed tax should be assessed and collected under authority of the United States, upon the same objects of taxation, and pursuant to the rules of the collection by which taxes are collected in States, respectively.

"3. That the act of Congress should define certain objects of taxation and principles of assessment, according to which the proposed tax should be assessed in all the States, to be collected pursuant to uniform regulations."

The report treats the first mode as entirely unworthy of confidence. It gives some countenance to the second mode; but finally concludes that it is ineligible. The third mode is recognised as the preferable one, and has been agreed to by the Committee of Ways and Means. But, sir, I must take the liberty of differing from them in opinion on the subject; the mode which they have agreed to is, in my mind, by far the most exceptionable of the three.

It destroys that equality of taxation, which ought to characterize every nation, and which by strict attention and industry, founded on the true principles of equal liberty, from many years experience, most of the States in the Union have, in a good measure, acquired the knowledge of and adopted.

It is calculated to saddle the industrious farmers of our country with an undue burden. From the industry, toil, and fatigue, of those whose lot it is to till the earth, all orders, faculties, and professions of men derive their support. How many thousands of people in the United States live from year to year without once feeling the fatigue of hard labor, and many of them swimming in luxury, from the effects of capitals artfully acquired, from the hard earnings of the unwary laborer?

And shall a system of direct taxation be adopted under the Government, which the people have formed upon the principle of equal liberty, which will oblige the industrious farmer to pay a land tax, and a tax on his building, which, in most instances, includes nineteen-twentieths of his property; and all the money holders, holders of all other kinds of property, and those who, from profession or emolument derived from the operation of our Government, are living in affluence, be exonerated from any part of the burden, except a small pittance for the houses they live in? No, sir; it appears to me, that a system like this never can be agreed to in this House. Again; setting aside the dependence of the community on the industry of the farmer and mechanic for food and raiment, are not these the men on whom the Government must principally rely for personal service in defence of the country in case of an invasion from a foreign enemy? If so, which I presume will not be controverted, are they not entitled to equal privileges with their fellow-citizens, according to the property they possess? Most assuredly they are; but very widely otherwise will be the case, if the system before you should be adopted. The time that must be spent in forming an estimate on the new principles through the United States, and the great number of new officers (at least 3,500 would be necessary) in assessing and collecting the tax, would add very essentially to the burden. If a direct tax should ever become necessary under this Government, I hope it will embrace all the objects of taxation which have been designated by the particular State Governments; and, notwithstanding the ingenious reasonings in the Secretary's report against the practicability of the second mode therein stated, I am unable to figure to myself any possible inconvenience which would arise from it on the ground of the objections. And why that system was not adhered to in the report I am at a loss to know, for the resolve directing the report to be made contemplated no other.

But I am, from my present opinion, induced to give the system first mentioned in the report the preference. The several States being convinced that the authority of the General Government would be exercised if the money was not furnished by the time prefixed, they would in all probability make the remittance; but if any State should fail of doing it, this Government would make the assessment on the inhabitants of the delinquent States, and would be under as good advantages for collecting it, as it would have been to have made the assessment on the inhabitants in the first instance; and the reasoning in the report does not apply to the case, for under the former Government the Congress had no power to assess money on individuals in any case, and therefore were under the necessity of depending on the will of the State Governments alone for a compliance with the requisitions; but under the present Government, the power of Congress to assess and collect such deficiency, is commensurate with their power to make the requisition.

This mode of laying direct taxes would require

H. of R.]

Direct Taxes.

no new officers, the money would be collected by the State officers with the State taxes, and would be attended with much less expense to the people than either of the other modes presented.

But there are almost insuperable objections to a direct tax under this Government, view it in what light you please; and I presume that the Government never will adopt one, until all the objects of indirect taxation are exhausted, and the demands on the Treasury make it indispensably necessary. Is that the case at this time? No, sir, I think it is not, but that very large additional sums may be drawn from that source if it were necessary.

Before we go fully into an investigation of the principles of a land tax, perhaps it would be expedient to inquire into the annual receipts and expenditures at the Treasury, and to satisfy ourselves whether there is, or is not a necessity of laying additional taxes of any kind: and, if on rational calculation, it should be found that the proceeds of existing taxes will be commensurate with the demands on the Treasury for the four succeeding years, your land tax will certainly be unnecessary. Being myself convinced of the fact, I will take the liberty of stating the principles on which my opinion is founded.

The annual expense of the Government, including all demands, is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury up to the year 1801,

The report estimates the duties on imports and tonnage, by the actual receipts into the Treasury, in 1795, at	5,588,961 26
From excises on the same principle, at	337,255 36
The revenue from the Post Office, at	35,000 00
Bank dividend, at	150,000 00
Interest on the redeemed stock	88,636 65
On patents, &c.	746 73
Amounting to	6,200,600 00
Which leaves an annual balance against the Treasury of	1,262 400 00

But, it is to be observed, that this statement is made from the money received into the Treasury in 1795, and is the product of the revenue in 1795. And by recurring to the revenue returns for 1795, we find the nett amount of duties on imposts and tonnage in that year, is $7,959,409 70.

Which gives a balance in favor of the Treasury, besides supplying the sum calculated to be raised by direct tax, of $496,409 70.

The amount of the revenue to be derived from excise, is also estimated from the actual receipts in the Treasury in 1795, and is indisputably much too low, for, in many parts of the United States, the excise law had just begun to operate in 1794, in which year a great part of the receipts of the Treasury in 1795 actually accrued. It is, I think, most proper to take this estimate from the most recent date of receipts, and from the 30th of September, 1795, to 1st October, 1796, the receipts on account of excise were

$469,579 31

Since that sum was collected from the people, an additional tax has been laid by way of excise, which will considerably increase that branch of revenue.

Post Office revenue	-	$35,000 00
Dividend of Bank products	-	150,000 00
Interest on redeemed stock	-	88,636 65
On patents	-	74 75

Whole amount of nett revenue $8 492,700 41

From the great increase of the revenue from 1795 to 1796, I think that this statement can be relied on, with a great degree of certainty, as a proper estimate of our annual revenue from existing taxes, which give an annual balance in favor of the Treasury of $1,029,700 41.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report on the subject of direct taxes, estimates the annual expense of the Military and Naval Departments and military pensioners, at $2,000,000.

The estimate, in detail, for those departments, for 1797, $1,508,890.

And I am of the opinion that the real annual expense of those departments will fall considerably short of this estimate taking it for four years, if proper economy is used, which will further increase the surplus money in your Treasury. The general staff of the Army are by the laws of the United States, to be continued no longer than the fourth day of March next, and therefore the items which apply to them in the estimate cannot be considered as an annual expense.

The pay of the general staff estimated up to the 4th of March next - $874 31

As the United States are in a state of peace, and their army have only garrison duty to do, the keeping up a corps of dragoons can be of no use whatever, and a considerable saving will be made by reducing the corps.

The dragoons' annual pay amounts to 9,480 00

General staff subsistence to the 4th March next, 2,190 rations at 20 cents per ration, is 578 00

Forage for the general staff 217 13

Cavalry forage 9,696 00

The equipments for the cavalry 2,135 66

Horses for the cavalry 13,950 00

The Secretary has estimated the expense of the Quartermaster's department at 250,000 dollars. I am led to believe that the state of the Army will admit of a reduction of that expense 100,000 00

A reduction of 50,000 Indian rations, it being half the number stated in the estimate 10,000 00

Expense of running the line of the Indian Territory 10,000 00

For building mills, &c., at Oneida 5,000 00

These items amount to $161,931 10

This sum, together with the surplus revenue in favor of the Treasury, make	-	-	1,682,741 51

This sum is the nett product of our annual revenues over the sums necessary to discharge all demands on the Treasury for the four succeeding years.

From this statement, which is taken from authentic documents, does it not clearly appear that it is entirely unnecessary, and even inexpedient to impose additional taxes of any denomination in the present session? While the existing taxes give you a nett income of more than a million and a half of dollars annually, over and above the annual demand which can, in the common course of occurrences, be made on the Treasury for the four succeeding years, can you with propriety lay additional burdens on the people? It has often been observed in the course of the debate on this subject, that all would agree in the necessity of additional taxes; but so far from an unanimous concurrence in this opinion, on a candid examination of the subject, with an usual reliance on the common course of events, will not every member of this House consider any additional taxes to be unnecessary?

Mr. SWANWICK said, that if the gentleman last up could make good his calculations, he should agree with him there would be no immediate necessity for new taxes; but even if this were the case (which he was far from being convinced of) he should wish a system of direct taxation to be commenced in order to have a certain source of revenue; any surplus arising from which would be well employed in discharging a part of our Public Debt.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HENDERSON] had said the PRESIDENT had never recommended direct taxes. He believed the PRESIDENT knew too well the privileges and duties of that House to interfere in anything which related to the origin of revenue; but he had, with great propriety, in his opinion, frequently urged the necessity of discharging the Public Debt, a Debt, which, if not got rid of, threatened the extinction of the Government itself. The Funding System had been the ruin of every country which had adopted it; because one generation put off to another what was its duty to have done for itself, viz: to pay its debts. A Debt of eighty millions called loudly for extinction.

If it was admitted, in order to reduce our Debt, and make provision for the future, fresh revenues were necessary, it became necessary for them to compare the merits of the two systems proposed to their view for raising this money. They must examine the objections against one, and against the other. The great objection urged against a direct tax, was the difficulty of obtaining money from farmers in remote parts, and of obtaining a just valuation of property, and the expense of collecting the tax. As far as these objections had any weight, Government should make efforts to surmount the difficulties. But, it was said, it would be a long time before this tax could be brought into operation; if so, it was necessary to make a beginning, since, without a beginning, they could never expect to come to the end.

But, was it not, he asked, acknowledging a principle dangerous to the existence of Government, to say it was impossible to collect a tax on land? [Mr. HARPER said he had never said or thought so.] Mr. S. said he believed some such thing had been said; the difficulties had been stated by different gentlemen as insurmountable, and it became necessary to remove these difficulties. Suppose a war was to take place, was that the time to commence a system of this kind? He believed not. Such a season would be the very worst for collecting taxes. And was this country so situated, that there was no possibility of being involved in war? No matter from what quarter, whether it was with France or with England, it was necessary to guard against such an event by making our revenues sure.

How could we meet any foreign nation upon equal terms in Treaty, when they could say to us, if you do so or so, we will destroy your commerce, and paralyze your revenue? In time of peace, this business should be attended to; if it were not, how would gentlemen accuse themselves if war should overtake them! They would certainly have much reason to do it.

With respect to a land tax, Mr. S. said it was certain, equal, and might be collected with little expense. For, notwithstanding what gentlemen had said, the expense incurred was only at the commencement, as when an assessment was once made, it would last for many years.

We know, said Mr. S., that a window tax, a hearth tax, a stamp tax, and an excise, cause murmurings and discontents wherever they are established; but in no country has a land tax been grievous, except, indeed, in France, where the extensive property of the clergy and nobles under the old Government was exempted from the tax. In England, there were also some objections to the tax, from its being made from what is called the Doomsday Book, a (very ancient record) by which means the tax falls unequally, as, since that time, lands have so greatly changed in value, that a new assessment is become necessary to make taxes equitable and unobjectionable.

But, he said, were there not some circumstances at present which marked the time as proper for laying a tax on land? Did not every one know that the very high price of produce must have put the farmer in a situation to contribute some portion of the expenses of the State? Would they be better able to pay when their produce should become lower? They certainly would not. He was not more desirous than others to call upon country gentlemen; he did it only from necessity. When he considered the danger of being left without revenue, he could not refrain from making the call, and he believed there would be found virtue enough among the farmers to bring them forward cheerfully to pay what the wants of Government required.

He saw no objection to a land tax that might not be removed. Whether the mode recommended by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. VARNUM] or any other, would be best, was not then the question, but would be decided at a proper time. It had been said that farmers paid their proportion of indirect taxes; if so, he said, they could not complain of a land tax, as that would not fall heavier upon them than any other tax would do. But gentlemen said an indirect tax could be evaded; he thought there was no excellence in that quality of a tax, but the contrary, since the greatest recommendation of a tax was, that it fell equal. All taxes on consumable articles bore very unequally. A large poor family consumed much more of them than a rich small one.

It had frequently been said that all duties upon goods imported, were paid by the consumers. He believed this was not so, and he fancied any one who looked into the vendue stores, and saw merchandise selling for the amount in currency, of what it cost in sterling, would run no risk in saying that the duty was not paid by the purchaser, whoever else might pay it.

Indirect taxes, he said, fell very heavy upon persons who lived upon the interest of money, or upon salaries; because, though they were continually taxed by advances of duties, their incomes remained the same. On that ground they had lately had many applications from their officers for advances of salary.

Such a system, Mr. S. said, was a proper part, but not a complete revenue system. In all Governments land tax and imposts were introduced as proper companions; but here all depended upon impost, which was liable at all times to be cut off. No gentleman had said anything in answer to that objection. Nothing could be said against the truth of that position. How very possible was it, that they might hear in the Spring, of the William Penn, the Adriana, and other ships, being taken, instead of coming into our port? And, if such a thing should happen, it would be hundreds of thousands of dollars lost to our revenue. Was it not necessary, then, to be provided against any misfortune which might happen? Or, would gentlemen have the Treasury to stop payment in case of such an event? And he would ask gentlemen at what rate they would insure the arrival of these vessels? He believed the price would be high.

The plan, therefore, of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HARPER] held out a vain dependance, when he rested it upon an advance of imposts. And what could be thought of a window tax? The most odious tax in Great Britain, and a tax that would be highly deprecated in this country. Indeed, he could remember the time, when it would not have been very safe for a person to have proposed a stamp tax, a hearth tax, or a window tax! An hearth tax and a window tax were the most slavish of taxes. What! said he, shall one man enter our houses and count and tax our hearths, and another come and peep and examine into our windows? God forbid. The injustice of such taxes was not greater than their hateful nature, since a rich man by no means paid his proportion of them. When such objects were brought forward as substitutes for a tax on land, it was a pretty strong presumption in its favor.

How did the gentleman intend to convey his stamps to all parts of the Union? How would such a tax affect the farmer who might have many miles to ride for a stamp before he could give a note or take a receipt? The objection formerly made to a stamp tax, it had been said, was because it was about to be enforced by a foreign Government; he did not think that was the whole objection. He believed the thing was objectionable on account of its inequality. In Britain, it was productive; in Philadelphia, and other large towns, it would also be productive; but could not be extended with convenience over the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. It would either be evaded or oppressive.

By an additional duty on salt, would not the poor man be affected in a much greater proportion than the rich? He certainly would, since some poor families used as much salt as a rich one; and would not such a tax tempt the farmer to give a less quantity to his cattle than was necessary for them? And were landed gentlemen certain that such a tax would be more acceptable to farmers than a land tax? He did not know whether the additional duty might not also encourage smuggling.

Gentlemen had said, that whenever peace should take place in Europe, great emigrations would take place to this country, and great wealth would be brought in. He believed, if anything would draw persons from foreign countries to this, it would be a prospect of enjoying liberty, under wise and equal laws. He believed it would not be the most effectual way of inviting Irishmen to this country, to tell them we had a hearth tax, or Englishmen, by speaking to them of a window tax, or the people of France by a salt tax! It was the greatest recommendation of a tax that it fell equally on property, and whatever tax did so, was a good tax.

He still asserted that if a land tax had been laid long ago, it would have been of infinite service to the country, as it would probably have prevented some ruinous financial systems from taking place. It was with public bodies as with individuals, the more easy they get money, the more liberally they spend it. It was, therefore, a happy circumstance for this country that they could no longer borrow money. When they were called upon for a loan of 300,000 dollars for the Federal city, if it had been to be raised from the land, it would not have been so easily granted. This land tax would operate as a new spring in favor of Government; it would awaken the attention of the farmer to its operations, to inquire of the why and the wherefore; in business of Treaties, when money was to be granted, the farmer would be in favor of the Treaties only in proportion as he chose to pay the tax on his land. It was easy to grant money, but when it came to be paid, then every gentleman wished to put it off from his own shoulders; one wished it to be raised from land; another from wine; another from hearths or windows; or anything so that it did not affect him or his constituents in any sensible degree. This was the reason he was glad they were brought to the necessity of providing money before they could dispose of it. They had this session had some noble plans on foot; they had heard something of a National University, of relieving the sufferers at Savannah, &c., but now there was a call for money, every one wished to put off the demand from himself upon his neighbor.

Mr. S. said he regretted the necessity of calling upon the farmer; but he believed it necessary. When gentlemen stated the poverty and industry of that class of citizens, he felt as much for them, and had as much zeal for their interest, as any man; nor did he wish invidious distinctions to be drawn between the merchant and farmer. The merchant was an agent of the farmer; but the agent was in the worst situation, because his property was the first to be destroyed. He read, in his newspaper at home, that the French, the English, and the Algerines, take our ships; but his corn and grass grow, and his dollars are safe. He could come down to Congress and talk very coolly about laying additional duties on commerce; but if his land was mentioned as a fit object of taxation, he immediately took the alarm. He thought landed gentlemen should be inclined rather to sympathize with the merchants in their embarrassments; and if they were not led by more generous motives to do this, even interest should lead them to it since they would be the last to be devoured.

Let all ranks, then, said Mr. S., in conclusion, unite in putting their shoulders to the wheel of Government; and, since commerce pays her five millions, let agriculture pay its something; this would show a real attachment to our country. He had heard much said about Federalism and friends of Government; he thought those would show themselves the truest Federalists and friends of Government, who stepped forward in aid of its necessities. He trusted gentlemen would suffer their immediate interest to give way, in order to have the finances of the country fixed upon a foundation which could not be moved. He concluded in these words: We shall never make our Government respected either in Paris or London, till we are able to say to them that our revenue, like our wealth, lies in our farms.

Mr. HARPER said, he should not have risen a second time, if he had not been prevented by the lateness of the hour, when he before addressed the Committee, from mentioning a few things which he thought necessary to be noticed. He should not, he said, trouble the Committee with a recapitulation of any thing he had before said; nor should he answer any objections which had been made to his plan. That would be more proper at another time, if any should be made, which he might think it necessary to attend to.

He had stated a variety of objects which would produce larger sums, more than was now called for. He had also shown that the duty had greatly increased; and that, notwithstanding the additional duty which had in the interim been laid, the increase of duty proved the augmentation of the consumption to have been very considerable. He said that the principal duties laid on foreign, are collected from the $7\frac{1}{2}$, 10, and 15 per cent. imposts. An augmentation, he said, had taken place in 1792 and 1794, by which most of the articles in the $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. class were transferred to the 10 per cent., that of the 10 to $12\frac{1}{2}$ and 15, and much of the 15 to 20. Yet the 10, $12\frac{1}{2}$, and 15 per cent. classes were very much augmented in their use between the years 1792 and 1795. The $7\frac{1}{2}$ were productive of large revenue. Mr. H. here went considerably into a statement before made, observing, that from the great increase of the quantity imported, it might fairly be presumed that it did not fall heavy, and, of course, would allow an additional augmentation, without injury to the people, or encouragement of smuggling; it was a proof, he said, that they had not arrived at the point to which they could safely go. He did not mean to present a perfect system, he knew it was liable to objections; but it was merely to bring into view a system of indirect taxes. If, in the article of salt, they choose not to put 12 cents per bushel, which he stated would produce three hundred and seventeen thousand dollars, they were to put only four cents, it would produce one hundred thousand dollars. Brown sugar, he said, was a superfluity and luxury in life, and, on what could a tax more properly be put? especially as it would insure a good revenue; if the tax on salt was to remain as at present, and a quarter cent a pound on brown sugar, a good revenue would remain. Strike out wine and bohea tea, stamps, and windows, or hearths, and nine hundred thousand dollars would remain as an augmentation.

Mr. H. said, the objections which had been urged against indirect taxes, proved too much; they proved that they should be taken off altogether from commerce, and laid wholly on land; for if the proposed tax was to be laid on land, there would still remain five millions dependent on commerce, which would not be less liable to destruction.

The duties which he proposed to lay, Mr. H. said, would be very easily hereafter transferred. A system of direct taxation might be organized, but in the nature of experiment; and, as it was uncertain, a great part of the revenue should not rest upon it; but, if at any time commerce was operated upon, a part of the duty might be transferred. They had been told, he said, that our revenue might be in danger from the French or English; but, he would ask if we had not been pillaged by the English, by the French, and by the Algerines? Yet, under all these circumstances, the revenue had increased. He believed a direct war could not have a worse effect; for, then, probably, their property would only be destroyed by one Power. Why, then, he said, were they told of the uncertainty of our revenue? Besides, they were in the situation, and how could they be got out of it?

It did not require the learning and ingenuity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to tell them the merchant did not pay the revenue. The people were the payers. The merchant got an advantage by the tax, on account of which he enhanced the price of his goods. Commerce received new vigor and spirit from this tax. He hoped, therefore, they should not resort to a tax so inconvenient and impracticable as a land tax, until they had examined the subject a little more, because he saw sources from which the money might be drawn in a manner more equally.

As to the necessity of additional revenue, no statements were necessary to prove that. The gentleman from Massachusetts had shown how they might deduct about one hundred thousand dollars; but what was this if it could be saved? The necessity was admitted on all hands, except by that gentleman.

Mr. H. said, if the plan which he had in view, should not have the effect, he would join hand and heart with those who wished direct taxes. He wished to see them large; he wished to pay the Debt, because it was a continual subject of anathema. He would go to two millions of dollars, if necessary, and some share of it might go towards the Public Debt; not that he thought it more heavy upon them, but because a subject of discontent, cavil, and invective.

Mr. GALLATIN said, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. VARNUM] had stated to them that there was no necessity for laying a revenue equal to what had been contemplated. The gentleman from South Carolina, just sat down, on the contrary, had told them there was a necessity to the greatest extent. Yet, he said, if they were to draw any deductions from his calculations, they would be that there was no want of further revenue—as the document upon which he had grounded his arguments, was a statement exhibiting the amounts of drawbacks paid upon the dutiable articles exported from the United States in 1793, 1794, and 1795, in which was stated, in one column, the amount of duties received, and in the next, the amount of the drawbacks paid; for instance, take the addition of 1795, viz: the amount received in 1794, and it will be found $8,588,382; if this were really so, instead of being about six millions, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, it was clear they needed not go into a calculation about raising fresh revenue.

The fact was, Mr. G. said, he believed the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] had not sufficiently attended to the statement in question. The amount of duties there stated, though duties receivable, were duties accredited, and not duties actually received upon goods imported. We know, also, said Mr. G., that the amount of revenue, as stated by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HENDERSON] was eight millions, but liable to great drawbacks, both on West India and English goods.

Mr. G. said, he did not mean to follow the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] into any of the details which he had stated respecting the revenue arising from imposts; for, though he believed him altogether mistaken in them, yet the principles were the same. The question was, whether the revenue wanted should be raised by advancing the duty on imposts, or by a direct tax?

It was necessary, however, before he proceeded any further, to notice what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. VARNUM] as far as related to the actual revenue and expenditure. He agreed with that gentleman that the revenue was stated too low, and the expenditure too high, by the Secretary of the Treasury, on two articles, viz: upon goods imported, and the Military Establishment. In his report on the subject of direct taxation, he had calculated the receipts of the revenue to the 31st December, 1795. The ground upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts went, was to calculate the revenue for 1796; and it was true that the receipts for that year had considerably increased the former; but the only question was, which was the best ground for a permanent calculation? It was difficult to determine; but, he believed, in general, there was no reason to believe that the highest calculation would be the real revenue when a peace took place in Europe.

The gentleman from South Carolina had even supposed a war could not affect our imposts: he would leave him in the happy idea: but, Mr. G. said, he was not afraid of war, he hoped most ardently for a state of peace, which he doubted not would take place, and when it did take place, the consequence would be a reduction of our revenue. The slightest inspection of the document he had mentioned would show that the high price of our exports, the quantity of European importations, and the great amount of West India productions, were the causes of the high receipts at the custom-house. And the moment a peace took place there would be a failure in the exports, we should be deprived of the West India carrying trade, and if our exports were less, our imposts must also be less. In consequence of the wealth brought into this country by the European war we had been enabled to consume an extraordinary quantity of these productions; but, the moment a peace took place, a certain defalcation in our revenue would be the consequence. To what amount this might be, no one could tell.

On this ground, Mr. G. said, it was more prudent to take the lowest than the highest calculation; and he thought the Secretary of the Treasury had done his duty as a public officer by so acting. He was right in taking 1795 instead of 1796; because taking the amount as a permanent revenue, it was the best ground. It was true, there was another item which the Secretary had stated, which he did not take for granted. He had put down the Military and Naval Establishment at two millions. He thought that sum might be reduced $600,000; for his own share, he had no objection to make it much lower still; when making a calculation of that kind, it must be made upon the then establishment, which was $1,500,000. He thought, therefore, that the Secretary of the Treasury might have calculated about $500,000 less, which would have reduced the sum wanted in additional revenue from $1,288,798 to $728,796.

Direct Taxes.

Mr. G. said, he would go further and say that, calculate the revenue as they pleased, it would be equal to our present current expenses, and it would be so until the year 1800; but, in 1801, additional revenue must be had. It was not for current expenses, but to pay the principal of a Debt loaned in Holland, and anticipations which had been obtained from the Banks. Experience had told them there were now no more Loans to be got. It was therefore necessary to provide for the instalments of the Foreign Debt which would then fall due, for which no provision was made.

If it were proper to increase the revenue at the present time, $800,000 were sufficient; still, if an increase was necessary, it was right to have an eye to what would hereafter be wanted. This brought them back to the question. How shall the money be raised—by indirect or direct taxes?

It would be well to observe, that gentlemen opposed to direct taxation, in recommending a system of indirect taxes, had confused their plans by direct taxes also. The stamp duty, he allowed, was an indirect tax; but a window tax was certainly not so. He would confine, however, his observations to indirect, as contrasted with direct, taxes.

If he had information before him that there would be no danger of embarrassing trade or increasing smuggling by doing so, he should have no objection to a moderate increase of the duty on goods imported. He believed the impost duty the best adapted to this country, but he must confess he had not information which would enable him to draw this conclusion. The gentleman from South Carolina had, however, not only determined upon the propriety of the addition, but also the sum it would raise. He himself had no documents for coming to these conclusions.

The most powerful objection which had been urged against direct taxes was the difficulty of collecting the money. He believed this difficulty existed at present also in sea-ports. This difficulty of collecting money in the country was not applicable to a direct tax only, but to all others; but, he said, in the present situation of our cities, he believed there was not more difficulty in collecting money in the country than in cities.

As to the manner in which such a tax could fall, it would, like others, fall upon the people. He did not mean to take notice of what had been said about the mode of assessment; that was a matter of detail not at present before them. This, he said, he knew, from the experience of his State, that the difficulties attending such a system would be infinitely less than had been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina. The expense of collecting a tax thus drawn from the people, was simply that of assessing and collecting; but, to an indirect tax, were to be added the profits which the merchant never failed to lay upon the tax, and this profit operated as an additional tax upon the people.

In Pennsylvania, he said, where yearly assessments were made, (and not once in three years, as was said by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report,) the expense was not more than $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If, upon a full examination of the subject, it was found impossible to raise the imposts, and if they rejected a tax upon land, he did not see what object they could apply to, except a tax on salt. This, he allowed, would be easily collected, and easily resorted to. Nearly 3,000,000 of bushels were imported annually, 500,000 of which, he supposed were employed in salting provisions. Lay what duty they would upon this article, it must be paid. There could be no doubt as to the productiveness of such a tax, but was there not some as to the propriety of it? And when they were told a tax upon land would fall upon farmers, he would ask, Upon whom a tax on salt would fall? It was consumed by men or by cattle. When it was consumed by men, it would fall upon them, in proportion to their numbers. If there was any difference, it would fall heaviest on the poorer classes—particularly upon the farmer, as much the largest quantity was consumed by him. So far as salt was consumed by men, the tax would operate as a poll-tax, according to numbers, and not to wealth. But, was a tax that would fall upon cattle to be encouraged in this country? Indeed, there was not much difference between the salt's being consumed by the farmer or by his stock; and the gentleman from South Carolina was not less mistaken about the quantity of salt given to cattle than about some other things. What would be the effect? It would either raise the price of cattle, or the quantity of salt now used would be diminished. If a reduction in quantity was to be the consequence, no effect could be more pernicious; and if it were not to have that effect, but to increase the price of cattle, would there be much justice or policy in adopting any measure which should have the effect to advance the price of butcher's meat, or to decrease the export of cattle? which was at present upon the increase—an export which had, within the last six years, been doubled.

Again: that tax, he said, would not only fall equally upon the people, but also upon different districts of country. He would say that if he were to choose between a tax on salt and one on land, he should certainly prefer the latter, since the inhabitants of his district would be four times more affected by one than the other; because, being very remote from market, their land is, of course, of comparatively small value; but they use more salt than persons living nearer the shore, and would consequently pay twice as much, according to their numbers, as persons nearer to the market, while, in a land tax, they would only pay one-half, in proportion to their number; because their land was of less value, in proportion to that of an equal number of persons living near the sea-ports.

Nor was this all: he looked upon a tax on salt of so unequal a nature, that there was scarcely any tax which he would not sooner agree to. You may, said he, lay burdens upon people to a certain amount, and they will be borne; but the moment you add to them, you upset the whole. In parts very remote from the sea, salt was at an enormous price. It might be said, the increase of a few cents could not be much; but it would—and if it were increased ever so little, it would—be impossible to pay it.

Having made these observations on salt, he would readily agree with gentlemen that a direct tax was not a very agreeable thing. He felt himself, and he knew his constituents would feel, that it was worse than no tax at all; but, he believed, except the impost on some articles could be advanced, they had no resource but in direct taxes.

If they find a tax on salt, or upon stamps (a most odious thing) cannot be laid, they must have recourse to a direct tax; and if it could be done with propriety, it should be done.

He would notice only one remark which fell from the gentleman from N. Jersey, [Mr. HENDERSON.] He mentioned three articles upon which additional impost might be laid, viz: clocks, watches, and tea. He said he ought to have credit for his ingenuity, since those were three articles which were more smuggled into the United States than any other; and the duty upon which, on that account, it had been contemplated to lower. He had also mentioned the sale of public land. He believed no great expectations could be had from that quarter, as no townships were expected at present to be sold. Besides, if money should arise from the sale of land, it could not go to pay the eight per cents.: they must be paid out of the revenue. On reference to the act, this would be seen.

Mr. G. concluded, by saying, he did not mean at present to enter more into the subject of direct taxation, as what he had heard against the system was of so trifling a nature as not to deserve particular notice.

At this point the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, January 17.

After disposing of some petitions—

Mr. MADISON moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Algerine subject, for which purpose he supposed, it would be necessary to clear the House and galleries. They were accordingly cleared, and this subject occupied the House for the remainder of the sitting.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

KIDNAPPING NEGROES.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was recommitted a report on the subject of kidnapping negroes and mulattoes, made another report on that subject, recommending a resolution to the following effect, viz:

Resolved, That it is not expedient for this House to interfere with any existing law of the States on this subject."

Mr. SWANWICK observed, that this report was contrary to his opinion on the business, but as the committee had been pretty unanimous in their opinion of the propriety of thus reporting, he should not object to its being concurred in.

Mr. HARTLEY thought the subject important, and such as ought to be decided upon immediately.

Mr. GALLATIN moved that the report should be committed to a Committee of the Whole, and Mr. SITGREAVES seconded the motion. It was accordingly committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the subject of further revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he could have wished that the motion for postponing this business had succeeded, in order that the House might have gone into a Committee of the Whole on the report respecting the Military Establishment, in order that it might have been ascertained whether certain deductions which were contemplated would not take place. He trusted they would, which together with certain deductions from the Naval Establishment, would considerably reduce the sum proposed to be raised by a direct tax. He thought, therefore, it had been better to have gone into the subject of appropriations before they came to a conclusion on the present business. For his own part, he said, whatever sum might be wanted, it was his opinion that it would be best to raise it by indirect taxes, since he could not consent to go into a system of direct taxation until indirect taxes should be exhausted. But he believed if the present revenue was not diminished by unforeseen difficulties, it would prove equal to all the demands which might come against it. This being the case, it was only necessary for them to organize a direct tax in order to have it ready to be resorted to in case of necessity; and, in that case, our citizens would meet it with cheerfulness. He was confident that our Government could be supported by direct taxes, and he wished to convince other Powers that this was the case. He despised cringing to any nation. Let them interrupt our commerce, yet, on our own ground, we can defend ourselves.

It appeared to him that a deduction might be made from the Naval Department of $218,120, which was the estimate for seamen, since the vessels were not built, nor would be for this year. In the report of the committee to whom it was referred to inquire whether any, and what, amendments were necessary in the act for the Military Establishment, it was to be recommended to strike out the dragoons and to add eight privates to the infantry; but he thought these would not be wanted in the Peace Establishment; there would, therefore, be a deduction of the dragoons. There might, also, be great deduction in the Com-missary's Department, so that in the Military and Naval Departments there might be a deduction of from six to eight hundred thousand dollars, probably more; and, if so, a small sum would only be wanting. But, if it should be supposed otherwise, then it would be necessary to cast about for the best means of raising the money. He believed the mode proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] for an increase to certain of the impost duties would be the best. A considerable augmentation might be made to the present revenue from foreign spirits imported. It would not, he supposed, be proper to augment the impost duty, because it might lead to smuggling, but an additional duty might be raised from it by way of excise.

The present system of excise on wine and spirits was unequal, and only one-fourth part so productive as it might be. And, indeed, if by an increase of duty only one-third of the quantity should be used the health and morals of the people would be less injured. At present it was notorious that many of the Europeans, coming into this country, and finding spirits at so low a price, fell into the immoderate use of them, and thereby rendered themselves incapable of being useful as artisans or farmers. Any tax, therefore, which would have a tendency to prevent this excess, would not only benefit the revenue, but preserve the morals of the people. Mr. W. had it from the best authority that, in the last war, one of the best British regiments, lying at Albany, though when they came there they were a sober and discreet set of men, by reason of their being able to get spirits at a very low price, they could not refrain from the use of them, and became mere sots.

The present mode of collecting the duty on foreign spirits was unequal; because five dollars were paid for a license to authorize a person to sell spirits, and the like sum for wine, and one who sold only thirty gallons in a year paid as much as he who sold fifty times as much. This license laid hard upon the lower class of people in the country; because, in the interior of the country, a retailer may not sell more than thirty gallons a year, which would mostly be used by sick persons, and consequently the tax fell very unequally; but if persons were to pay in proportion to the quantity sold, the produce, which at present was $58,000, might be increased to three or four times as much.

It has been supposed that an additional duty might be raised on salt; but, as it had been justly stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN,] it was necessary to act with caution in taxing that article, because it would fall very unequally. As far as it was used by man it would operate as a poll-tax; but, with respect to cattle, the further they were removed from the seacoast the more salt was necessary to be given to them. The farmer near the seacoast used no salt for his cattle, but those in the remote parts of the Union were obliged to use considerable quantities at a very high price. An additional duty on salt would, therefore, be more burdensome to farmers in general than would be a land tax. The only recommendation which a duty on this article would have is, that it would be certain; but, as it operated so unequally, this tax ought not to be gone into, or at least no great augmentation should be made. If a land tax was not agreed to, however, a small addition might be made to the present duty.

Admitting that the plan proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, of additional imposts be the best, the Committee of Ways and Means might be left to judge upon what articles an increase of duty would be most proper. He should wish it to be made chiefly upon articles of luxury and expense, but would leave any calculation upon the subject to the Committee of Ways and Means.

He understood $60,000 had been received for lands, sold agreeably to the act of last session; if that act had allowed the apportionment of the land in small lots, as was then suggested, much more of it would have been sold. As the opinion of the majority had, however, been found to be wrong, he trusted it would be remedied this session, that the sales might go on again, and that some very considerable support might be had from that quarter.

In levying taxes we ought to have two objects in view, viz: the strength and wealth of our nation; as to the strength of our nation, it was derived from the number of its inhabitants; its wealth from the surplus produced by agriculture. They should, therefore, be especially careful how they made infringements on agriculture.

History, Mr. W. said, informed them of the annihilation of nations by means of direct taxation. He referred gentlemen to the situation of the Roman Empire in its innocence, and asked them whether they had any direct taxes? No. Indirect taxes and taxes upon luxuries and spices from the Indies were their sources of revenue; but, as soon as they changed their system to direct taxation, it operated to their ruin; their children were sold as slaves, and the Empire fell from its splendor. Shall we then follow this system? He trusted not.

Mr. W. said, notwithstanding his objections to direct taxes being adopted at the present time, he had no objection to the organization of a plan which might be resorted to in case of any unforeseen embarrassments befalling our commerce.

They ought to consider, he said, that the Constitution of the United States guaranteed to each individual State a Republican form of Government. Some of those Governments were supported by direct taxes, and the reason was obvious, they had no other means of raising the money.

This being the case, and the Constitution of the United States having guaranteed that right, how, he asked, were those States who supported their Governments by direct taxes at present, to answer the demands of both claims upon their lands?

A tax on land, Mr. W. said, must be very unequal, because there was no way of reaching the moneyed men, who lived in great cities; and, though large holders of land, their land was in the hands of their tenants, who must pay the tax. There would not be less than fifty millions of property which would escape a tax of this kind. The tax would, therefore, be unequal; and he knew of no way of coming at moneyed men, unless, as in some of the States, men should be obliged to come forward and swear to the sums of money they had on interest. But this was multiplying oaths to no effect.

Besides, Mr. W. said, our country was so situated that there was great difficulty in getting a land tax with any certainty in the State of Delaware; Rhode Island, Connecticut, and great parts of New Jersey, it might be got at valuation; but in other parts it operated very unequally. Nor did he agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] that the land tax in England did not operate equally. The land tax there was laid by valuation. It was true that it was estimated in the Doomsday Book; but, though it was unequal at first, it had been remedied by time, because, when land was transferred from one hand to another, it was bought according to the high or low price at which it was taxed. If it was valued high, it sold proportionably low; and, if low, high in proportion; but, in a new country like ours, it was impossible to lay a land tax with any degree of accuracy. In European countries the commonalty did not hold land—it was in a few hands; but was this the case here, or was it wished to be so? Here the community at large held land. Every man, comparatively speaking, held his farm; or, if they found a difficulty in getting it, they went back into the country and assisted in clearing fresh land. Nor ought this desire of possessing land to be checked.

Another thing, he said, they ought not to lay a tax that one citizen should live upon another. Although the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] supposed it would not cost more than seven and a half per cent., he believed it would cost more than 30 per cent.; and, if so, the public officers live upon those people who pay the tax.

Mr. W. said, it was notorious that we had already too many officers. Let any gentleman take up "Neckar on the Finances of France," and it would be found that there were more officers in this Government than in France, in proportion to the number of its inhabitants, before the Revolution. He hoped, therefore, they would not be increased. Besides, in thus creating officers, the frugality and economy of a Republican Government was in a great degree destroyed.

But, it was said, by mercantile gentlemen, that the farmer did not pay his proportion of taxes. Very few observations, he thought, would prove this. The common farmer paid a tax according to his crop. If he had but an indifferent crop he bought but little merchandise; but if he had a good crop, he parted with his money freely. Sometimes, indeed, they got credit from the merchant, upon the prospect of a good crop, and, if they were disappointed, distress and ruin were sometimes the consequence.

It was well observed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] that the only difficulty there was in collecting taxes from farmers was owing to the want of circulating medium. The common farmer, he observed, had little to do with money—he lived mostly by bartering one thing for another. A common mechanic in town had more money through his hands than a farmer in the country.

But, said the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SWANWICK,] the farmers are becoming rich. Suppose they are, were not persons in cities also growing rich? Did lands in the country, he asked, rise equally with lots in the city? Did the rents of farmers increase with the houses in the city? He believed not; but the advantage was in favor of cities. He would ask, how many farms in the country let for a sum equal to that gentleman's hotel and circus over the way, viz: £500 a year? That gentleman had charged gentlemen with voting away money for the Federal city and other purposes with unconcern, because the money was raised from commerce. But, he would ask, whether the farmers voted for building frigates, and what his observations were when voting for a Naval Armament, a Treaty with Algiers, &c.? These were not for the interest of the farmer, and still there was no difficulty in raising money for these purposes. The next view that gentleman took was on the banks of the Hudson, to see the farmers there sit at their ease, while the poor merchant could not sleep for fear of his property at sea. If that gentleman was fond of a rural life, he should be glad if he would come and live beside him—it might add value to their country. He had no objection to his enjoying his pleasure in the way he liked best, and he hoped he would permit them to enjoy theirs, which he believed equal to any thing which could be found in all the luxuries of a city.

It had been said, that it could not be supposed that a farmer paid any part of the duty of goods sold by auction. If the merchant, he said, made bad calculations, and ordered more goods than he could dispose of, was the farmer to be injured because of this folly? The farmer sometimes miscalculated as well as the merchant, and was sometimes obliged to sell the whole of his produce and his farm too to pay his debt. But would gentlemen say that merchants had not gone on wrong principles, and, instead of making their remittances in proper time, had gone into land speculations, and some of them having gone into the carrying of contraband articles, had, from step to step, augmented our difficulties.

Merchants, he said, should follow their true interests, and then they would not be embarrassed and obliged to send their goods to vendue to make good their payments at the banks; but, if they would not attend to their business, could the farmer help it? For his own part, he viewed all these matters as tending to one point; things would, by-and-by, find their level. The merchant would find his true interest; the country was growing rich; luxury and dissipation, he believed, had outrun population; but he expected things would soon remedy themselves.

He was willing that the system of direct taxation should be brought forward and organized, that, at a proper time, it might be carried into effect.

He thought differently from the gentleman from Pennsylvania with respect to the effect of a land tax on emigration. The fertility and salubrity of the climate were such as to tempt people to come to this country, but a land tax would rather deter, than encourage emigration. Mr. W. wished to encourage commerce as far as was consistent; but not so as to injure agriculture. The wealth of this country, he said, arose from agriculture; it was from the surpluse of agriculture that all our importations, and, consequently, the imposts were paid for. Should they, then, check it? It was from agriculture and rural life that population was increased; from agriculture, the Militia, the bulwark of our nation, was supported; and whilst it furnished freight for our own vessels and those of foreign countries, (the fisheries excepted,) should they check it? He thought not. He hoped, therefore, they should do nothing more at present than organize the system. This being done, we can have recourse thereto, in case our commerce should be interrupted, or indirect taxation be found insufficient.

Mr. CRAIK said, he should not follow gentlemen through all the arguments used on this occasion, because he thought a greater part of them inapplicable. He believed the question before them was one of the most important which had been agitated in that House since the adoption of the present Government. And, however gentlemen had attempted, by the course of their arguments, to divert the attention of the Committee from it, he hoped they would not succeed. He trusted the ingenious calculations of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. VARNUM] intended to lead the Committee to believe that, instead of improving the revenue, they might look out for objects of expense, as the revenue was more than sufficient to defray the current expenses, would have little effect. And when told by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HENDERSON] that it would be a subject of great irritation; that it was an unpopular question; that the public was not ready for it; it was enough to alarm the House; but he trusted such insinuations would have no influence upon the decision of the question.

He thought the good sense and understanding of the House, exercised upon the materials before them, would point out the necessity of entering fully into the present business. There could be little doubt, he said, that revenue was really wanted. He believed, that the incorrect statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. VARNUM] had been sufficiently exposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN.] The only organized system, grounded upon an opinion that revenue was wanting, was that which had been introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] and he thought, from the principles contained in that plan, the question before them had a strong claim to attention. He believed that resolution went to establish the principle of necessity to go into the plan proposed by the present report.

The observations which had been made on the present question, went no more to the quantum of revenue, than to the principle itself. When they were told they were not to meet the present proposition, because it would be unpopular; because viewed as an engine of Government—an unwieldy machine in the hands of Government, not to be brought into operation—such expressions might create alarm; but it was necessary to see how they were founded.

Mr. CRAIK said, when he looked at the situation of the revenue, and saw the reliance which was placed on foreign resources, he was convinced of the necessity of adopting the present measure; and when he reflected on the motion for putting off the present question by means of extending the indirect taxes, he was disposed to apologize for the present system of revenue laws. He believed they owed their origin to existing circumstances. When the present Federal Government was erected, it was considered in the nature of an experiment; it went into operation with fear and hope; many were opposed to it; and it might be considered wise and politic at the time, that the people should have an opportunity afforded to examine the system, and that nothing should be proposed to them of an irritating nature, but that everything should be carried on in as easy a manner as possible. It was probably on this account that a system of direct taxes was not proposed to the people at an earlier period.

He believed that it was a measure of policy, which could not be questioned, that every Government ought to arrange its taxes, so that every man of property should pay his equal proportion of them. He believed that it was necessary for that purpose to have both a plan of direct and indirect taxation in operation at the same time, as when every man bore his proportion of the public expense, it drew tighter the bands of connexion between the people and the Government. Was there, he asked, a gentleman in that House, whose observations did not furnish him with instances, under the present system, of wealthy, independent farmers, selling, perhaps, from a thousand to fifteen hundred bushels of wheat a year, who were so insulated by their situation, their economy and frugality, as to make their own clothes, to eat their own produce, and to drink the juice of their own fruit, and who, therefore, pay nothing towards the expenses of Government, except a few cents duty upon the salt used? Was it, he asked, right and proper, that such a description of persons should be excused from bearing a portion of the public burdens? He thought it was not. This afforded one reason, amongst many, in favor of originating direct taxes. But there were others more weighty. Was there a man who looked at the situation of our country, and saw the precarious foundation on which its finances stood, who did not tremble for the consequences? It was not necessary, he said, to draw an imaginary picture, nor to excite alarm; it was not necessary to go into calculations of what was probable; to be respected abroad, it was necessary revenue should be firmly established. He believed it was the sinew of Government, the oil which was to keep the wheels of it in motion.

He was afraid this view of the subject had not sufficiently engaged the attention of gentlemen. When he read the accounts in the public prints of flagrant attacks made upon our commerce; when he not only saw depredations and spoliations committed, but actual hostilities threatened, he thought there was serious ground for alarm.

One of the strong objections to a direct tax was, that we could not expect immediate revenue from that source; but the force of this objection applied with equal strength to the adoption of any energetic measure. If it required time to mature this plan, it was necessary to begin it immediately, that it might be gradually prepared, and ready whenever necessity should impel them to have recourse to it; for it would be presumption, and the height of folly, to suppose we should always be exempt from what was the common lot of other nations. The propriety of the measure of increasing our revenue, had been agreed on all hands, however gentlemen differed about the mode of effecting it. It appeared to him essentially necessary to originate some plan of direct taxation to which they might resort. If it be admitted that such a plan is necessary, though not to be carried into immediate effect, the present question ought to be agreed to.

If he understood the gentlemen from New York, New Jersey, and South Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. HARPER,] all agreed, that further revenue was necessary, and two of the gentlemen were in favor of originating a plan of direct taxes. The question then resulted, to what object of direct taxation should they apply? They were an agricultural people, and the great capital of the country was in land. If a direct tax, then, must be laid, land was the proper object for it. He considered that the farmers, notwithstanding their want of ready money, when compared with the inhabitants of cities, as possessed of a great part of the wealth of the country, and that they ought, therefore, to pay their quota of the public taxes.

It might be necessary, Mr. C. said, to examine some of the objections which had been made to this system. And here, he would observe, that gentlemen ought not to expect anything like perfection in any scheme of taxation. Taxes were only a choice of evils; they were unpleasant, but they were necessary. It had been objected against a direct tax, that it was unequal, on account of a variety of population, wealth, and situation. Gentlemen had not been satisfied with supposing that a bad plan might be adopted; they had supposed the very worst to be entered into; that the assessors to be appointed would be the basest of men; but he trusted the committee, who was charged with this matter, would have the good sense to prepare such a plan as should be freed from many of the objections which had been brought against it.

Mr. C. differed in opinion from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] that this tax would bear hardest upon the farmers far removed from the sea-coast. He believed they would rather have the advantage than otherwise, from the low value put upon their lands. The expense of collection had been urged as an objection. He had been much surprised to hear gentlemen calculate that expense, one at fifteen and one at thirty per cent. He wondered that the general accuracy of those gentlemen should have suffered them to have wandered so much from the point on this occasion. He believed the estimate of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] was a high one at $\frac{7}{8}$ per cent. An objection of this kind was less applicable to land, than to taxes on any other species of property.

A tax on windows, or a hearth tax, had been proposed as a substitute, which would, in fact, be nothing more than a house tax. He thought that such a tax was liable to every objection that could be made against a tax on land, and to a great many others peculiar to themselves. Houses were an equivocal representation of property, and a tax on them would fall on some parts of the country much heavier than on others. Indeed, it was susceptible of so many obvious objections, that they were not necessary to be detailed.

Mr. C. said, he did not conceive it important to go into an inquiry how far it was prudent or politic to go into an extension of the imposts, as he had no authority on which to found his opinion; and he would caution gentlemen from being diverted from the question by an expectation of an increased revenue from thence. It had been proved very satisfactorily by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] that there was no certainty of an advance in the imposts. Upon a calculation of the duties paid upon goods from the East Indies, West Indies, and Europe, they amounted, at least, to sixteen per cent., and were gentlemen prepared to say that even this duty might not prove a temptation to merchants to become smugglers?

Many would turn their speculations on this subject, if they had such prospect of success as any considerable duty would give them; it had been the case. He said, merchants were not to be considered a distinct order of beings: they were, at present, the treasurers of our taxes; if the revenue became too heavy, they would be induced to rob the nation of it. However, he meant not to cast any reflections on gentlemen of that calling; he thought they were honest men, and deserving acknowledgments from the House; he wished to avoid throwing out a temptation.

The question was an abstract principle, and did not pledge gentlemen to this source of taxation only; if others could be found more eligible, they might be applied to.

It would be proper, in the first place, to draw upon that source for considerable revenue. But that Government may never want a resource, he would wish a system of direct taxation may be prepared, to which recourse may be had. He would be willing not to apply to it, if an increase of indirect tax would not be too burdensome, and he believed the gentleman who first introduced it would be of the same mind. He wished the House to decide whether the power was vested in them. The situation of our affairs, in his view, imperiously demanded an increase of revenue; and our prospects were, of still greater demands.

Direct Taxes.

He hoped, therefore, the Committee would find no difficulty in agreeing to the proposition before them.

Mr. W. LYMAN said, a land tax had always been considered as an impolitic tax. It would be well to inquire why this tax should have been so considered; whether the whole world had erred in this case, or there was some natural cause for the opinion? He thought there was good ground for the opinion. A tax on land was calling forth property before it was produced; for, until land was cultivated, it produced nothing. To call for a tax in this way had also a tendency to discourage the cultivation of land.

Mr. L. said, he admitted that the consumer paid indirect taxes; that they did not come from the merchant, but from the person who purchased the goods for consumption. Nor was it the persons who cultivated the ground who paid a direct tax on land, but those who bought the produce of the land from the market. The consumer paid the duty in this case as well as the other.

The question, then, he said, was merely as to the best mode. There was another consideration. If, said he, you call for a direct tax on land, you call upon a class of people, who, perhaps, have not money to discharge it. A man who possesses land, or who is the cultivator of it, may not have money, until he has sold his produce. To collect the tax in this way, was therefore tedious, circuitous, and uncertain. What was the case with respect to indirect taxes? In indirect taxes, or excise, the process, he said, was unerring and certain. They were so much so, that an eminent writer on the subject had said, it was "pay the debt to Government, or pay the debt to Nature." The tax must be paid, or the person must cease to exist.

When he contemplated the subject in this point of view, and if he were right, that direct taxes were paid by the consumer as well as indirect taxes, he could not be at a loss what vote to give on the present occasion.

In whatever point of view he considered direct taxes, they could not, in his opinion, be compared with indirect taxes. It was true, that some indirect taxes, and all taxes in a greater or less degree, were unpopular; but this never happened but when they were pushed too far. An impost or an excise may be so excessive as to be inconvenient; but this, he said, was not the nature of the tax.

This, he said, was not the case with a direct, or land tax. This, though ever so small, was paid unwillingly; a poll-tax was the same. And a man called upon to pay a poll-tax did not ultimately pay the tax; for a poor man who earned only just sufficient for his existence, would cease to exist, if he were not to make a proportionable advance on his labor.

In what situation was Government? It calls upon a man to pay a direct tax, who is perhaps unable to pay it. This mode, he said, was circuitous, unsafe, and not to be relied upon.

This reflection convinced him that this country had chosen indirect taxes as the best possible mode. He thought it had made a wise choice. He knew very well that a case might be stated in which a direct tax would be necessary. A case might be supposed in which every thing might be put in requisition. But that was not the present question. In case of an invasion, or a war, it might be necessary both to put property and persons in a state of requisition. He would not pretend to say, that, in such a situation, direct taxes, or any other, would not be proper; but, in no other situation, could he think such a tax should be called for.

Some gentlemen, opposed to the adoption of a direct tax at present, were of opinion that they should at least agree upon a plan of direct taxation which might be ready in case of emergency. But he did not think such a proceeding necessary, or that it would answer any good purpose. He believed it would never be necessary to go into the business, except in an extreme case. He therefore did not think it worth while; for, however well a plan might now be laid, it might be unfit to be acted upon when it was wanted. Whoever might compose the Legislature at such a time, they would doubtless be able to determine what was necessary. He was not for anticipating legislation in that way.

Besides these general observations, which were applicable to all countries, there was one which applied particularly to the United States. If a direct tax was laid, it must be according to the last census. In this way the tax would fall very unequally; for it would be found that the population in some parts of the United States exceeded that of other parts in proportion to the extent of the territory, and wealth, and productiveness of soil. Wherever commerce had extended to a considerable degree, the landed interest would be taxed on account of the population which those improvements may have produced. Population, was, perhaps, as sure a mean of judging as any other, of the ability to pay, of any district; but from the situation of the United States, it was not a good criterion at present.

Coming from the State he did, he should be obliged, if he did not generally object to the system of direct taxation, to object to it on that account. He did not think a direct tax would comport with the interest of a populous State. If gentlemen thought such a tax would fall heavy or unequal in thinly inhabited States, he must give up his argument; but he did not believe this could be the case.

He might have said that direct taxes were individually unequal, unless upon the principle that consumers pay the duty. It was not in human wisdom to lay a direct tax equal. But it was said, that money must be paid, that there was a deficiency in the revenue, and therefore this tax must be laid. Several gentlemen had proved that there might be considerable retrenchments made in the public expenditure; perhaps enough to make the receipts equal to the expenditures. They had not yet determined how far the Military and Naval Establishment might be curtailed, and several other articles of expense would admit of retrenchment. Besides, if that were not the case, and the sum in question must be raised, he thought there were certain articles of importation which would admit of a higher duty, and which would not only produce revenue, but operate as an encouragement of the manufactures of our own country.

It will be recollected that petitions had been received from hat and glass manufacturers, and various others, praying for an augmentation of duty on those articles, as they found the present duty not a sufficient protection to their manufactures. Indeed, the manufactures of the United States were almost wholly abandoned. Those of glass and woollens were abandoned; those of cotton, which had progressed to some extent, had, in a considerable degree, been abandoned, and some thought others were likely to be so. For his part, he thought if they had no other object in view than merely the protection of the manufactures of the United States, they should impose a higher duty on a number of articles. He had been informed from pretty good authority, that the importation of hats into this city alone had, last year, exceeded thirty thousand pounds sterling, and that porter had for the last two years exceeded any former importations. The importation of coal was also increasing. When it was considered that our own country furnished materials for these articles, policy and interest required that there should be a high duty upon them. These articles were so bulky as to run no risk of being smuggled. If this were not the case, he knew that a revenue calculation might prove the reverse of a mathematical calculation; for, in a mathematical calculation, two and two make four, but in this revenue four and four would not make two. But, when articles were sufficiently bulky, the duty might be increased to any height without danger of smuggling. Let the duty be what it would on porter, on coal, and almost on hats, there need be no fear of smuggling.

There was another article. He believed the duty on rum imported might be increased. It would have one of two good effects; it would either produce more revenue, or less would be consumed.

Mr. L. said, he should, therefore, vote against the principle, as it was not possible so to detail it as to comport with the interests of the country: besides, that it was not necessary to resort to this article of taxation, as the imposts and excise might be so regulated as to produce a revenue sufficient.

The article of salt had been mentioned as a proper article for an additional duty. He knew it was productive; but it could never be the interest of any country to tax salt; he thought it the most oppressive that could be laid: this was truly a Ministerial tax. He would not, therefore, be understood to say, that, in voting against a direct tax, he meant to vote for a tax on salt. He thought, indeed, that there were so many other articles which would admit of a higher duty, that there was no necessity for resorting to that. It would really be an extraordinary thing, if, after declaring this country free and prosperous beyond all calculation, it should be brought into such a situation, as that nothing could save it but direct taxation. He fondly hoped, said Mr. L., we were a free, enlightened, and flourishing country. He wished he could say that the Government had used our peculiar advantages to the best purpose; but every one viewing the proposition before them must be of a different opinion. We must either believe the United States are not prosperous, or that the natural causes of our prosperity had been defeated.

Mr. L. said, he did not mean to take up longer time of the Committee, the subject having already undergone a very copious discussion.

Mr. FINDLEY hoped as the tax, which was the subject of their discussion, had been so long in contemplation, that members would have been more ready to have met it. It was admitted the last session to be necessary, and the Secretary of the Treasury had been directed to report a plan. At that time they were convinced more revenue was wanted; that by anticipations, and other causes, we were in a situation to require a direct tax; but now they heard that the tax was impracticable, unwise, impolitic, and unjust.

He objected to its being impracticable; indeed, this had rather been suggested than proved, and he had been surprised to hear such a charge. To say that so important a thing as the laying of a tax on land was impracticable, was a most extraordinary assertion; but he trusted, as it had been found perfectly practicable in most of the States, it would be found perfectly practicable with us. It had been perfectly practicable, and most effectual, he said, in the State of Pennsylvania; and if so there, why not practicable in the present way?

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. W. LYMAN) had said that in some parts of the country the people were more numerous than in others; and that a direct tax would call upon them to pay according to their numbers. Were not the manufacturers, he said, who might pay this, exempted from the impost duty, which would be equal to the direct tax which they were called upon to pay? And, indeed, if they were called upon for a direct tax they would pay no tax at all. But, with respect to individual injury, it would be as just as any other tax: the principle was more just, because land would be taxed only in proportion to its value. No indirect tax would operate equally, but would be more unequal than this.

But it was said, this tax would fall upon the consumer only. He differed in opinion from the gentleman from Massachusetts in this respect. Wealth and industry, Mr. F. said, must pay taxes. Industry was the cause of wealth. A tax may be levied upon the poll, but it must be paid out of wealth.

But it was said, wealth could not be found: it could not be found, it was true, in all its avenues; but in those in which it was visible and exposed. Was there a greater mass of wealth than land? Certainly not. It was said that it discouraged cultivation; but it did no such thing.

Mr. F. said, Pennsylvania had always been in the habit of collecting direct taxes, while a Colony and since. This tax had the effect to prevent the land from being engrossed, and kept it in small tracts. Direct taxes were not imposed until indirect taxes had been tried to the greatest extent.

Mr. F. said, there were greater landed estates than any other; and why should they escape a tax? It could not be supposed that he could advocate this tax from any other motive than principle, since the whole of his property and that of his constituents was land; but, said he, we consider it as a just and equal tax. It is not unpopular; we think it preferable to an indirect tax. People in towns, he said, paid for every thing they eat, drink, or wear, and therefore paid most of the impost duty; they did not pay much of it, and therefore would not object to a small tax on their land.

Mr. F. said, he had observed a contest in that House between the agricultural and trading interests. He had thought it was too early a day to have introduced that kind of spirit. If they took a view of the country, or of the members in that House, they found one and the other almost altogether agricultural. It was certainly the most productive property in the Union, and why should it not pay its share of the public expense?

The prosperity of the commercial interests depended principally on agriculture, and a direct tax was necessary to equalize the taxes.

Salt had been mentioned for an additional duty. This was a most necessary article for the poor; sugar also, though it had been called a luxury; but he believed it was become from habit a necessary of life. Bohea tea was an article used by the poorer classes also. If this principle of taxing the poor prevailed in our taxes; if they were to take taxes where they could get them, he did not know where they should stop.

Was it not a little surprising, said Mr. F., to see the members of that House, whose estates were mostly in land, so desirous of avoiding a land tax? How would this look to the people? Would it not appear as if they were determined to put off the burden from their own shoulders?

For his part, he was so convinced, from moral and political ground, of the necessity and policy of the measure, that he should vote for the resolution.

A call for the question and for the Committee to rise was made.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to say a few words before the question was taken. He said the discussion had turned upon points not before the Committee, viz: the quantity of revenue wanted, which would be determined, if the principle was agreed upon, when the bill should be brought in, in filling up the blanks, as would also the modification of the business. The only questions before them, were, was revenue wanted? And whether, if wanted, direct or indirect sources should be applied to for the money?

All, except one gentleman, who had spoken upon the subject, acknowledged revenue to be wanted. With respect to the mode by which it should be raised, gentlemen opposed to direct taxes, had laid before them a number of suggestions; but the resolution of his colleague [Mr. HARPER] was the only plan which was regularly before them; he should therefore not notice any other; as gentlemen who were serious in any of their suggestions ought to bring them regularly before the Committee.

With respect to the proposition of his colleague, it might perhaps be possible to raise some little from an advance of duty on the articles he had mentioned; but the only thing of consequence in his list was salt, against taxing which the opposition seemed to be pretty general. With respect to a duty on stamps, he did not believe that would be a measure which would meet with the approbation of the Committee; and the window tax was only a land tax in another form, vastly more objectionable than the proposition before them. With respect to imposts, they were on an average 16 per cent. He believed that would be thought sufficiently high. Indeed, he had been informed that the duty on some articles was already so high, that it would be necessary to reduce it, in order to prevent their being smuggled; so that what might be raised by impost on one article, would only go to balance what might be taken off from another, and therefore no additional revenue could be expected from that source.

Mr. S. said he should mention a circumstance, which he had from good authority, which would prove that the present duty was not paid with that facility which they had heard of, viz: that in one city only of the United States three hundred writs had been issued against merchants, for the recovery of their bonded duties!

If this was a fact, (and he could not doubt it,) he did not think this was a proper time to increase the duty on imposts. With respect to direct taxes, he was a little surprised to hear the opposition which had been raised to them, since, in every State except two, a plan of this kind was adopted. How the idea of a direct tax being an impracticable measure came to be thrown out, he could not imagine. He was sorry it had been mentioned, since it might have an effect to weaken the confidence in Government. With respect to what had been said on the subject of modification, that would be matter for future consideration. The only questions were, (what he had already stated,) Was revenue wanted? If it was, whether they were ready to adopt the plan proposed by his colleague, or agree to a direct tax? He hoped, therefore, they should then come to a decision upon the question.

The calls for the question, and the Committee to rise, were again repeated.

Mr. HARPER said he felt an apology necessary for again troubling the Committee with a few remarks, but he promised they should be as few as possible. He thought it necessary to make a few in reply to certain things which had been advanced against the proposition which he had laid upon the table.

It was said that they were not able at present to make an accurate judgment upon the subject. He thought they were. Some parts of his plan, he said, had been placed in a light by no means consonant with the truth of the case. It was necessary, therefore, to correct some false views which had been given of the subject, and place them in their true light.

A member from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] yesterday stated that all the calculations which he had made on the subject of imposts were wholly imperfect and vain, because they were made on duties receivable instead of received at the custom-house, and that the amount of duties received was very far below his estimate. But the gentleman ought to have recollected that those estimates were not calculated upon any one year, but upon the average produce of several years; consequently, though the amount in one year might be less, the average would be the same, and the truth of his position that the duties were increasing would remain unaffected. Whether the amount of the receipts was eight or five millions, it made no difference as to his position.

If the drawback, he said, was taken for any one year, it would be erroneous, as the deductions for 1795 went to the year 1796, and so on; but when the average on several years was taken, it would be found right.

He had asserted that his statements would not be greatly affected either by war or peace; nor did he believe they would, to any considerable extent. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania had predicted a very great defalcation of the revenue in case of peace. He did not think it would be equal to the increase of population which would be likely to take place in consequence of such an event. It was said that, when a peace should take place, a great part of our carrying trade would be withdrawn, and less capital would be employed. But, he asked, if that capital would be unemployed? No. Agriculture, perhaps manufactures, roads, internal improvements, might employ that capital. And he did not know but this would be a more profitable employment of it than in foreign commerce. He believed that commerce had been overdone, and wealth employed in that way might be more profitably employed on other objects. Instead of being spread upon the ocean, if it were spread upon land, he believed it would turn to better account.

In case of war, (an event which they ought always to look upon as possible,) it was said the defalcation would be great: this, he did not believe. He deprecated war as the greatest of evils, and he hoped and trusted it would be very long before this country was involved in such a calamity. He hoped the events predicted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] would soon bless our sight; but though he believed war to be so great an evil, yet he did not think our revenues would be greatly injured by it. In order to see this, it might be observed, if our trade was a foreign trade, like that carried on by the Dutch or English, it would depend upon a state of peace. Those nations, in order to defend their commerce, were obliged to keep up large Navy Establishments, (perhaps at a greater expense than all the benefits derived from such a commerce would warrant;) but our commerce, said he, depends upon an exchange of the necessities of life, with which we abound, for the superfluous labor of other countries. It was therefore the interest of those countries to keep up this commerce; they depended upon it for bread to eat. Therefore, even in a state of war, they were under the necessity of winking at a commerce upon which their very existence almost depended. In the last war, perhaps there was as great an amount of duty paid as at present, in proportion to the population of the country. Therefore, however great the evil of a war might be, it would not, he said, destroy our commerce. And with respect to the plunder of our property by ships of war of different countries, it could not be greater than it had been.

It had been said that the objections to a land tax were equally strong against a window tax, a tax on stills, or other taxes of that kind; but this was a mistake. The difference was, that, in one case, they were apportioned by Government upon the people, and in the other, the people chose themselves what part of them they would pay. And even admitting (which he did not believe) that money was as plentiful in the country as in cities, still this objection would lie against direct taxes.

It had been said that the impost duties could not be raised, but no proof had been brought of this. His colleague had indeed adduced a fact which he meant as proof, that in one town three hundred writs had been issued for duty; but this did not prove that the duty was too high, but that the merchants had all of them overtraded their capitals—of which they had had proofs enough already. If the duty had only been one-half the present amount, the same thing might have happened.

Mr. H. then adverted to his plan, and defended it against the objections which had been urged against it. He observed that much had been said on the subject of smuggling. They should advert, he said, to the difference of situation betwixt this and foreign countries. What was the situation of Holland, Spain, and Great Britain, in this respect? They were divided from each other by rivers, or by narrow seas, which might be crossed in an open boat, which would carry over £30,000 worth of dutiable goods in a few hours. On this account, smuggling was carried to a great extent. But in this country, he said, the Atlantic must be crossed, or a great part of it, before an article could be smuggled.

He concluded with saying, that if there were no other source but a land tax to supply the deficient revenue, he would vote for it; but he believed a tax on windows or hearths, with the additions he had proposed to the imposts, would be far preferable. He should therefore be opposed to the present question.

The question was then taken for the Committee to rise, and carried—yeas 44, nays 35.

And the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 19.

A Letter was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the Report of the Secretary of War, on the subject of the Naval Establishment, and an estimate respecting the ports and harbors of the United States. What related to the Naval Establishment was referred to a committee on that subject, and what respected the ports and harbors was referred to a committee appointed to take their state into consideration.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. VENABLE, from the Committee of Elections, made a report, viz: that they had proceeded to examine the complaints made against the undue election of Mr. VARNUM, from the second middle district of Massachusetts; that no one of the petitioners, or their agents, had appeared this session to prosecute their complaints, nor transmitted any evidence on the subject; that the sitting member had produced evidence that the election in the town of Dracutt (the unfairness of which had been complained of) was conducted with fairness and propriety; and though there had been some irregularities committed in other places, they were mostly owing to the misconduct of the petitioners. The committee therefore report it as their opinion that JOSEPH BRADLEY VARNUM is duly elected, and that any attempt to deprive him of his seat appeared to be more the effect of malice than of any real ground of complaint against the unfairness of his election.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. D. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, made adverse reports on the petitions of William Clark, Peter Lee, Cutlip Nesler, and John Stevenson—who prayed to be placed on the pension list.

Mr. LIVINGSTON moved that the report should be printed. He said that, by the rules adopted, many miserable objects had been reduced to great distress. He wished it possible that some assistance could be given to them. To his certain knowledge, many poor people on the frontiers, who never had an opportunity of hearing about the statute of limitations, were thrown out.

The motion for printing was seconded.

The SPEAKER explained that the regular way would be to move for a Committee of the Whole House to take up the report.

Mr. MACON said that the best way for the gentleman to get at his object would be to move a simple resolution for rescinding the act of limitations.

After some further conversation, the reference to a Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The motion for printing was rejected—yeas 38, nays 39.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Attorney General, accompanying his report respecting the title to the land situated in the Southwestern part of the United States, claimed by certain companies under a law of the State of Georgia, passed in 1794, made in pursuance of a resolution of Congress in 1795; which was ordered to lie on the table.

SALES OF LANDS IN OHIO.

Mr. SPRIGG, jr., laid on the table a resolution, to the following effect:

“Resolved, That the committee appointed to inquire into the progress made in carrying into effect an act for the sale of land Northwest of the Ohio river, and above the mouth of Kentucky river, and also what alterations are necessary in the same, be further instructed to inquire what progress has been made in carrying into effect an act for regulating grants of land for military services, &c., and also if any and what alterations may be necessary in the same.”

RÉLATIONS WITH FRANCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, together with very luminous documents therein referred to; which, after some debate on the propriety of the measure, were ordered to be printed, without being read:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

At the opening of the present session of Congress, I mentioned that some circumstances of an unwelcome nature had lately occurred in relation to France; that our trade had suffered and was suffering extensive injuries in the West Indies, from the cruisers and agents of the French Republic; and that communications had been received from its Minister here which indicated danger of a further disturbance of our commerce by its authority, and that were, in other respects, far from agreeable: but that I reserved for a more special message a more particular communication on this interesting subject. This communication I now make.

The complaints of the French Minister embraced most of the transactions of our Government in relation to France, from an early period of the present war; which, therefore, it was necessary carefully to review. A collection has been formed of letters and papers relating to those transactions, which I now lay before you, with a letter to Mr. Pinckney, our Minister at Paris, containing an examination of the notes of the French Minister, and such information as I thought might be useful to Mr. Pinckney, in any further representations he might find necessary to be made to the French Government. The immediate object of his mission was to make to that Government such explanations of the principles and conduct of our own, as, by manifesting our good faith, might remove all jealousy and discontent, and maintain that harmony and good understanding with the French Republic which it has been my constant solicitude to preserve. A Government which required only a knowledge of the truth to justify its measures, could not but be anxious to have this fully and frankly displayed.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 19, 1797.

[The documents accompanying the above Message will be found in the Appendix.]

ADDITIONAL REVENUE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject of further revenues.

Mr. SWIFT said, he had all along been opposed to a system of direct taxation, believing it possible to raise the revenue wanted from indirect sources, and being determined never to have recourse to direct taxes, unless the situation of the country was such as to make it necessary to apply to that source.

He should still have continued his opposition to direct taxes, had it not been for information which he had received that the posture of foreign affairs was such as to threaten the cutting off of our sources of revenue arising from foreign commerce. It was necessary to go into a consideration of this matter. It was enough to say, that there was a probability of a part—a very considerable part, of our revenues arising from commerce being cutoff. Under these circumstances, it appears necessary to have recourse to such taxes as were not within the power of foreign nations to annoy; for this purpose, he believed it would be proper to enter upon a system of direct taxes. It was necessary, at least, to begin to make the arrangements; and, if not ultimately requisite to be adopted, it might be laid aside; but he believed the situation of the country was such as to make it proper for them to settle a plan for laying a direct tax. Upon this principle only had he changed his opinion, and intended to vote for the resolution; but he thought, before the resolution was agreed to, it should be amended. The resolution as it then stood, he said, went to the apportioning, "according to the last census, the following direct taxes." He did not believe it would be right to apportion a direct tax according to the last census; for when they attended to the increase of population in some States, and to the stationary situation of others, no one would say that such an apportionment would be right. In the States of Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, and New Jersey, there had been but little increase; in all the other States the increase had been greater. They ought, therefore, to have recourse to a different mode. If they were to attend to the situation of two States in particular, the injustice would appear clear. In the last census, Connecticut was estimated to contain 240,000 inhabitants and New York 340,000. Since that time, he said, the State of Connecticut had increased very little, but the State of New York was increased at least 500,000; so that Connecticut had not more than 250,000, whilst New York had double the number. In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Connecticut was apportioned $98,000 of the estimated tax, and New York $140,000; the latter being only about $40,000 more than the former, though it contained double the number of inhabitants. He would, therefore, move to strike out the words, "last census," and to insert "according to their numbers."

He believed that no gentleman would deny the justice of the amendment. Some objection, perhaps, might be made against it on the ground of expense; but he believed he should be able to remove these objections. Before the tax could be laid, he said, there must be a valuation of property, and when regulations were made for that purpose, they might also be made for taking an enumeration of the inhabitants, in which case the expense would only be trifling, and therefore no objection could be urged on that ground; and the justice of the measure was evident, since no gentleman could approve of any plan which should charge two States in the ratio of 140 to 100, when their true ratio was as two to one. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would be adopted; and, if so, he should have no objection to vote for the resolution.

Mr. PAGE wished the gentleman had refrained from moving any amendment in the present state of the business, because it went to circumscribe discussion on a subject which cannot be too well understood. There was this objection to the amendment, also, that it assumed, by implication, what was not the fact, for the measure of a direct tax was not yet agreed upon. A proposition had been submitted to the House upon the subject, but the decision had not yet taken place; and it was, in his mind, an evidence of its not having been sufficiently discussed, that the gentleman from Connecticut was opposed to the principle of a direct tax. He had considered the subject with much attention, and he presumed it would not be sufficient to convince any gentleman that it was, of all others, that species most consistent and congenial with the spirit of a free Republic. The amendment did not appear to promise any advantage in the way of accelerating the business; and, in point of utility, it was calculated rather for a future and remote time than the present; believing, therefore, that we must have recourse to some efficient and permanent means of revenue, and that we should do so in a manly way, he was for proceeding by sober investigation, and he had no doubts that the House would decide that the species of taxes which were calculated to inspirit industry and economy—to place the agriculturist and farmer above dependence on the merchant—to excite that spirit of vigilance and jealousy which is so essential to the Republican character, and to the preservation of his freedom, would be preferred. When the cultivator knows that he has a certain sum to pay at a given time to the support of the State, his industry and his mind feel a new stimulus; he may pay as much in an indirect way, by the purchase of goods subject to the taxation of the State, as the merchant; but he neither sees this, nor does he obtain the credit due him for this indirect contribution; when he pays it directly, he learns his own consequence in society, and he finds it a part of his duty to inquire how the public money is disposed of by the Government. He said so much to show the preference of one mode of taxation to another. The amendment, he hoped, would be withdrawn.

Mr. MADISON said, he thought the amendment a proper one; it went to generalize the proposition, by striking out the words proposed, and would render it appropriate to the time of the law going into effect. If the tax were to be apportioned according to the numbers, it must be according to the numbers as last legally ascertained by census. If no new census were taken before the act took place, then the last must be the guide; but if a new census, then that must be the guide. For these reasons, he was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. W. SMITH inquired if this question had not already been decided by a motion made by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CHRISTIE?]

The Chairman said, it was in the House and not in Committee of the Whole that the former question had been brought forward.

Mr. W. SMITH said, he hoped the proposition would not be agreed to, because it would defeat the whole business; and he would choose, if it were to be defeated, that it should be defeated directly and not indirectly. If it were the object of gentlemen to take a new census, it would effectually defeat the intention of the bill. He hoped, therefore, they should not waste their time in the present discussion, but determine the question whether or not the principle would be agreed to.

Mr. MADISON said, he did not know to whom the gentleman referred when he said there seemed to be an intention of defeating the bill; he could assure him it was not his intention. He wished to give the proposition the fullest discussion, that the real disposition of the House might be known. The amendment, he said, could not have the effect that the gentleman supposed. If it was the intention of the Legislature to have a new census, it might be taken in time; but he did not believe a new census would be taken; and, if not, the apportionment must be according to the last census, because there would be no other rule. But, if there should be another, who would say it ought not to be conformed to? If it could be really supposed that there was any intention to defeat the original proposition by this amendment, it certainly would not have his patronage.

Mr. SWIFT said, he did not mean to embarrass the measure, but to facilitate it. He believed the objection he wished to remove would make the resolution more agreeable to a great many members who would object to vote for it in its present form. When the Committee of Ways and Means brought in a bill, they would make such regulations as they thought proper; but if the resolution were to be agreed to in its present form, it would preclude all possibility of having a new census, if it should be found expedient.

Mr. HAVENS doubted whether the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut was strictly Constitutional. He read an extract from the 3d section of the 1st article of the Constitution, in these words: "The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct;" and the 4th clause of the 9th section of the same article, "No capitation, or other direct tax, shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken." By these words, he said, he understood that direct taxes could not be levied, except according to a census to regulate the representation, which must be taken once in ten years. Direct taxes and representation ought always to go together. Direct taxes should always be represented by the last census.

Mr. S. SMITH said, this question had been decided in the House, and he trusted it would again be rejected. He recollected, when the last census was taken, it was attended with considerable difficulty. Many of the inhabitants in the country were Germans, and they were suspicious that some bad purpose was intended by the measure. In taking a new census, for the purpose of a tax, they would hold out to the people a temptation to return their numbers less than they really were; whereas, when a census was taken for the purpose of ascertaining the number of Representatives to which they were entitled, the people were interested to make their number as large as possible. Nor would it be possible to get at the full numbers of the people, when they were interested in withholding them. Indeed, he should not be surprised, if a census should be taken for the purpose proposed, if it proved less than the former one. He gave his dissent to this proposition when it was before them in the House, and he saw no reason for changing his opinion. He thought it neither profitable nor proper.

Mr. CHRISTIE was glad the gentleman made the motion now, that it may undergo a discussion, and be brought into the House. He wished it to be adopted. He never could, nor ever would agree to the resolution for direct taxes, except a census be taken to regulate it on. He believed that when this was done the total estimate would return 148 members to that House. He knew the State he came from was not justly rated. He hoped the tax, if put into effect, would operate equally on all the States.

Mr. HOLLAND could hardly suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVENS] serious, when he doubted the constitutionality of taking a new census. Great alterations must certainly have taken place in seven years; and if a direct tax was to be laid, according to the last census, it must operate very unequally amongst the citizens. He thought the resolution indispensably connected with the subject. Many, he said, would vote for direct taxes if they could be made to bear equally, or nearly so, on all. If that could not be done, Mr. H. said, he should not vote for that system, and he believed the same of many other members.

Mr. SEWALL hoped the amendment would not prevail. He thought the words last census included the word number. If a direct tax be levied this session, it must be according to the last census. The amendment was merely a verbal one; for, if a new census were to be taken before the act went into execution, the apportionment must be regulated by it, whether the words were to be struck out or not; and if a new one were not taken, the apportionment must be made by the old census. If a census were to be taken, he said, it must be returned and approved by Congress, before any tax could be apportioned by it. If representation and taxation were connected together, he should have no objection to a new census being taken; but the term of the census not having expired, if it was now necessary to apportion a tax, it must be according to the last census. The amendment, however, being only verbal, it could have no effect on the resolution.

Direct Taxes.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, if he could put the same construction on this amendment with his colleague, [Mr. MADISON,] he should consider it of a very harmless nature, but from the very different views which the gentleman who proposed it had, he saw reason to believe it would have a very contrary tendency; it would cause delay, which would be injurious; protracting it would ruin the original proposition. No tax could be apportioned upon a census before it had gone into operation with respect to fixing the number of Representatives. He believed they had the power of taking a census, but he thought it must be taken for the double purpose of taxation and representation, and not for taxation alone.

Mr. GILBERT said, there could be no question more express, and which would admit of less doubt, than that representation and taxation must go together. The Constitution directed the census to be taken once in ten years, and when once taken it must remain to govern until another was taken; but whenever another census should be taken, the tax must be apportioned by that. A new census, he said, could not operate upon a tax now agreed upon. Whether a new census should be taken before the appointed time, was a different question, and was not at that time before them.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, if the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SWIFT] was sincere in his professions of not wishing to embarrass the proposition before them, he would withdraw his amendment; because, if it meant anything at all, it went at least to delay the business. It could not be denied that every direct tax must be apportioned according to the last census taken according to law, and if the gentleman's motion meant that the proposed tax should not be laid until a new census was taken, it would necessarily put off the business for several years. The gentleman seemed to think that a census could be taken for this purpose only; but, Mr. S. said, if he understood the Constitution on this subject, no direct tax could be apportioned but according to the census taken for the purpose of apportioning the representation. If a new census was taken, therefore, it must operate upon both. If this opinion was just, and he had no doubt of it, the motion went to the putting off a direct tax until a new census should be taken. If this was not embarrassing the business, he did not understand the meaning of the term. He believed the last census which was taken was not carried into effect till two years afterwards, and if a new one were taken, it would probably take as long a time to bring it into action, so that to carry the motion would be in effect to put off the business for four years.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] thought a new census would not be taken before the direct tax was laid; if so, the motion was useless. If a new census should be made before a direct tax could be carried into operation, it still would be apportioned according to the last census, or that which had previously taken place.

If there was anything in the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, it was mischief, because it would operate to put off the question. He hoped, therefore, that gentleman would withdraw his motion, and suffer them to meet this important question fully in the face.

Mr. COIT said, if direct taxes were to be laid, he was not prepared to say whether the old or a new census should be made use of; but if the carrying of the present motion would remove one of the objections which were against the measure, he could see no reason why it ought not to pass. The resolution expressly said the apportionment should be according to the last census; the present motion went to leave that undecided, to be determined upon hereafter, whether the old or a new census should regulate the apportionment; he hoped, therefore, it would be adopted.

Mr. MADISON said, if he had foreseen that the amendment proposed could have been supposed to embarrass the measure, he should not have seconded it; but he thought it could not have that effect. He would ask, if there was a gentleman in favor of the proposition, who would not have agreed to it, if the words proposed to be struck out had not been in it? And if not, why object to the amendment? He did not think it likely that a new census would be taken; but he did not think it was necessary to prejudice that question. It was an object of detail, and might properly be determined upon hereafter. Without it the proposition would be more general. It would have the same operation in one form as in the other, and no gentleman could complain of having his intention of moving for a new census prevented by a prejudgment of the question. He hoped no further debate would take place on it; he was fully prepared to give his vote.

Mr. GILBERT thought there was nothing in the motion that could change any member's mind on the subject of the main resolution; whether the term "last census" be expressed or not, it would apply the same. At whatever time the tax was put into effect, it must be according to the census last taken. The resolution would not pledge the House to take a new census. It was a debate more about words than anything else.

Mr. MURRAY thought the debate on the present question a very trifling one, as the abstract principle was necessarily kept out of sight. If the amendment was agreed to, the apportionment must be made according to the last census, as a new census could not be taken for two years to come, many States having already elected their Representatives; if the gentleman from Connecticut saw that the amendment would be useless, he trusted he would not insist upon its being decided upon.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH said, he thought they might get rid of all this debate very easily. He wished the question, whether they would lay direct taxes or not, to be simply taken. If a direct tax was determined upon, the details of the business could be settled afterwards. He would therefore propose, if in order, that the question should be put simply, "Shall we lay a direct tax?"

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HARTLEY said, he had attended much to the progress of the business; he hoped the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut would not prevail. It was allowed on all sides that additional revenue was wanted; they must now meet the question, whether it should come from direct taxes or not, and whether that should be levied according to the last enumeration, or that a new one be taken for that purpose; it was only a simple proposition, and it was fit it should be decided, and he hoped without much debate. It was proper some determinate principle should be fixed as a guide to the committee, who should prepare a bill on the subject. He thought there was much necessity for a land tax, and he hoped it would prevail; and he thought it could most properly be done upon the last census. He declared he had no objection to pay his portion towards it. He hoped they would hasten the decision, but he should be opposed to the motion, and therefore hoped the gentleman would withdraw it.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said that the words "according to the last census," which were proposed to be stricken out, appeared to him objectionable in every point of view. If they implied that the enumeration, made several years ago, should be the rule of apportionment, even though a new one should be taken before the direct taxes were apportioned—or, what seemed more probable, if it was intended in this indirect and covert way, to decide that no new census should be ordered with a view to a more equal apportionment of the burdens, there was in either case a glaring impropriety in retaining, and thus connecting them with the principle itself. The important question of direct taxes ought to have been presented to the deliberation of the Committee of the Whole, in terms the most general and abstract, stripped of every modification not necessarily connected with it; instead of which, there was blended in the same sentence, and they were to decide in the same breath, another question equally, nay, to some States, more important than the first. Whether they were to take the relative numbers in 1790 or those in 1797, as their guide in laying the tax upon each State, ought to undergo a full and separate consideration, and not by being wrapped up as it was in the other proposition, pass as the sense of the House, without any discussion.

Mr. D. said he should be satisfied with striking out those words, and inserting no other, but if any were to be introduced he should prefer those in the Constitution, viz: "according to their respective numbers." He was free to acknowledge that he should not vote for the proposition, even if the amendment which he advocated was carried, for he could never consent to resort to direct taxes upon lands and houses, until the less exceptionable, less unequal, and less oppressive means of raising revenue by indirect taxes were exhausted. If, however, a majority should think differently from him, and carry the resolution for the adoption of a system of direct taxation, he should then think it his duty to move for a new census to be taken previously to the apportionment. This ought not to be refused, if to equalize the public burdens was an object just and desirable. For if the last enumeration of inhabitants was to be adopted as the rule, every member upon that floor must be sensible that New Jersey would be rated and taxed very far above her just proportion, and that a farmer in his State must contribute at least fifty per cent. more than a farmer of the same possessions and property in either of the adjoining States.

Such, Mr. D. said, had been the course of emigration and such the shifting of population from one State to another, that a census taken seven years ago would furnish a very false estimate of the present state of wealth and population.—Whilst emigrations had been going on for years past from New Jersey in all directions, many of the other States had received vast accessions of numbers, which ought to be ascertained by a new enumeration, before they commenced their, as yet, unexercised power of direct taxation which professes to found its apportionment upon numbers only. He did not at all concur with the member from Virginia, who had said that the apportionment of Representatives must necessarily precede the apportionment of taxes under every new census; for they might say, with as much propriety, that the representation under the new, should not appropriate moneys raised under the old apportionment.

Mr. S. SWIFT said he did not think the present a debate about words, and not of substance, as had been asserted. His intention was to introduce the words "according to their numbers," instead of "according to the last census." He did not wish the House to decide that the apportionment should be made agreeably to the last census. He wished to leave the resolution open in that respect. If his amendment took place, it would not preclude the use of the last census; but if the resolution passed in its present form it excluded all idea of a new census. He, therefore, thought the amendment important, and he was sorry to hear gentlemen charge him with improper motives in bringing it forward.

Mr. S. referred to the words of the Constitution relative to the taking of a census, and laying direct taxes. From these words, he said, representation and taxation must go together; and that a census could not be taken for the purpose of the latter, without having effect upon the former also. Admitting that a census could not be taken for the purpose of a direct tax, it could be taken for both purposes; and he would much rather it should be so taken, than that the tax should be laid according to the last census. Nor did he think this would occasion much delay. It would appear, he said, as if some gentlemen thought that a direct tax could be collected as soon as determined upon. This could not be. They must pass a general law, directing the principle of valuation to be adopted. The business could not be accomplished before the next session, however great the want of money might be; and the mode he proposed would effect the business as soon as if the apportionment was at this time made. He thought this a sufficient reason for wishing his amendment to pass. No gentleman had said that it would be either fair or honest to make an apportionment according to the present census. The State which he represented, when compared with the State of New York, would be greatly injured; and ought they not, he asked, to have recourse to some means by which to prevent this injury? He thought they ought. If this amendment was adopted, and a new census agreed upon, he had before said, it would be in their power to collect a tax as soon as if the present census was made use of. Why, then, be affrighted with difficulties? Some gentlemen thought it impossible to obtain a correct census; others supposed, that if it were taken for the purpose of assessing a tax, it would not be more numerous than the last; but he believed it was in the power of Government to make laws equal to the equitable apportionment of the tax. But, if a new census was not taken, Connecticut would have to pay forty thousand dollars more than she ought to do, and this sum would be paid to the State of New York, since that State would pay so much less than its just proportion. Would the people of Connecticut, who were now paying large sums for the interest of a debt which that State refused or neglected to pay, be satisfied with this? He believed they would not. If, indeed, they meant to satisfy the people of the United States in this business, they must apportion the tax fairly and equally, which could not be done by the present census.

Mr. N. SMITH said, he should vote against the amendment proposed by his colleague; not because he approved of the apportionment being made according to the present census, but because the amendment would have no effect. The resolution, he said, after it was so amended, would stand upon the same ground as at present. To say, "that the tax should be apportioned according to numbers," was the same thing as saying, "it should be apportioned according to the last census," as the only way of determining the numbers was by the last census. The thing would, therefore, be the same, and they certainly ought not to vote to amend without some meaning.

The resolution before them, he said, contemplated the apportionment of a tax the present session; and if it passed, the tax must be apportioned this session, or not at all, and it must be according to the last census.

He agreed with his colleague, that it would be just that an enumeration should take place before the tax was assessed; but he believed this could not be effected by the amendment proposed. He thought there was no other way of effecting this, than by disposing of the present resolution, and by bringing in another. He agreed with that gentleman, that a valuation and census might be provided for at the same time, and he believed it would occasion no delay in the collection; but if this was the gentleman's idea, the present resolution could not answer the purpose, under any new modification.

Mr. W. SMITH was glad to find the gentleman from Connecticut had been explicit in declaring it to be his intention to have a new census taken. He was rather surprised to hear that declaration after what he had said at the time he introduced his motion; as he then told them that he was opposed to the tax, but that our necessities had convinced him of the propriety of going into it; yet he now proposed to delay the business till next year; and, further to relieve our necessities, he proposed an expense of $50,000 in taking a new census.

Mr. S. thought this was the time for trying this question, whether the tax should be apportioned according to the old or a new census; because, if gentlemen were determined to vote against a direct tax, except a new census was taken, it would be well to have that known. Nor could the Committee of Ways and Means proceed with the business, until they knew whether the apportionment was to be made upon the present census, or a new one must be taken. To bring in a bill upon such uncertainty would be doing nothing. It would be better that the question should now be decided. He wished it might be understood that, if a decision took place on the resolution as reported, the old census would be acted upon; but if the proposed amendment was agreed to, that a new one must be taken. If the latter should be the case, he should consider the business as totally defeated, and think it necessary immediately to go upon a system of indirect taxation. He hoped, therefore, a decision would be taken.

It would be remembered, Mr. S. said, that the law for taking the last census passed in 1790; that in 1791 an amendment was found necessary, and the census was not received till 1792. If so long a time was now to be taken before the tax proposed could be carried into effect, (which it is probable would be the case if a new census was determined upon,) every gentleman must be convinced it would not answer the purpose intended.

Mr. BALDWIN hoped it would be recollected that this question would occur every year. If a land tax is adopted as one of the permanent sources of revenue to supply the Treasury, it might be stated every year that there had been large removals from one State into another, extending, in some cases, to ten or twenty thousand inhabitants, and that therefore a census must be taken every year to make the tax equal. He thought the only question now properly before them was, whether the demands on the Government were not so great that the country must be publicly disgraced and their credit prostrated by not fulfilling its engagements, unless further revenues are provided, and that adequate revenues cannot be provided without resorting to a land tax. If the present state of our affairs force us to such a tax, the Constitution requires it should be according to the last census. In laying the tax, it may be a good reason to urge that the land tax should be as small as possible till another census can be taken, and, also, to urge taking measures to obtain a new census. As soon as a new census is taken, the tax, no doubt, in some instances, will be more equal; but these inequalities must take place between the different periods of taking the census; he thought it not a sufficient reason for putting off the question for two or three years, which must be its effect.

Direct Taxes.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped, since the question had been stirred up, it would be decided. It was not a principle in which they were at liberty to act or not. It appeared to him that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] was perfectly mistaken. If they were now to apportion a direct tax, they must determine it according to numbers; it was a decision they could not avoid. And notwithstanding that gentleman had flattered himself that he had discovered an intention of doing wrong to other parts of the Union, he believed it would be found that it had arisen more from that gentleman's willingness to have found him in that situation than any ground he had for the charge. It was his opinion that a census must be taken for the double purpose of representation and taxation, and that it could not be taken for the purpose of a tax without extending to the representation also. Therefore, if a new census was made, it would be five years before a direct tax could be laid; for the different States having elected their members upon the old census, a new one could not be acted upon until a new election took place; it would be three years before the new Legislature would meet, and it would be two years afterwards before the act for a direct tax would be completely in effect, unless, indeed, the gentleman from Connecticut thought a census could be taken for taxation only, which must have been the opinion of the gentleman from New Jersey also. Mr. N. said he knew it was impossible to do equal justice in every part of the Union in a business of this kind. All they could do was to come as near it as possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, this was one of the difficulties which must have been foreseen to attend a system of direct taxation. He hoped the amendment would not prevail. It was true, he said, there had been great emigrations into the State of New York; but the emigrants were mostly gone into the wilderness, and could not be expected to bear a part in any tax which might be laid on that State. For his own part, he believed, if the amendment was agreed to, it would defeat the whole business; and though he did not wish immediately to go into a system of direct taxation, (except, indeed, the plan should be such as he wholly approved,) he had a desire to see it organized. He still wished they had first gone into the business of appropriation, before they had been called upon to vote on this question.

A call for the question was made.

Mr. GALLATIN said, before the question was taken, he would state, that the amendment proposed would be a total defeat of the resolution for laying a direct tax. The gentlemen from Connecticut, he said, had been accustomed, in laying their State taxes, to have valuations of property made betwixt different towns, and they supposed no delay would be occasioned by the proposition before them. But it must be recollected that, in apportioning the tax amongst the different States, there was no occasion for such a valuation as they contemplated. It was proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury to be done by means of Commissioners instead of the Legislature, and he believed that would be the best way. If the resolution was, therefore, agreed to, the tax might be proceeded with; but if the amendment was passed, and a new census was to be taken, they must wait at least two years, as no valuation could take place until a Congress was elected according to the new census, which could not be done till the time of the Congress just chosen expired. They might, indeed, have an enumeration taken, and a tax assessed, on the 4th of March, 1799, which would be the day on which the powers of the new Congress would commence; but no tax could take place in the mean time.

There was not the least doubt, therefore, that if the amendment passed it would amount to a defeat of a direct tax for two years. The question was, then, whether they would agree so to put off the business or not?

Mr. G. said, he should have no objection to the taking of a new census before the expiration of ten years, if it was thought to be necessary; but he could not think of doing it before the proposed tax went into effect.

Mr. DAYTON did not agree with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] who had asserted that the words in the original resolution, and in the amendment, would have precisely the same operation, and really meant nothing. He believed they would operate, and were intended, to decide the question against the new census, which the members from Connecticut as well as from New Jersey must be equally desirous of providing for. The chairman of the committee who reported the resolution under debate had candidly acknowledged it to be his object and meaning, and other members had given a like construction to the words. Some notice was due to the remarks of the gentlemen from Virginia and Pennsylvania, who, though not entirely agreeing in their construction of the Constitution, had broached doctrines that were new, and not at all warranted by that instrument. The former had said that if a new census should be taken and returned at the first meeting of the next Congress, and a direct tax for the current year should be apportioned by them the same session, they must take for the rule of apportionment the old and not the new census, until the Representatives had been regulated, and taken seats under the last enumeration. Could it be possible, Mr. D. asked, that any man who had read these words—"direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers," could believe that injunction obeyed, if the enumeration last taken, and immediately before their eyes, should be rejected or disregarded, and one taken eight or ten years previously adopted in preference as the rule of numbers and wealth? The gentleman from Pennsylvania had not carried his doctrine quite so far, but had given it as his opinion that the return of a new enumeration to the next session would prohibit an apportionment of any direct tax in less than two years, when a new representation would take effect. The tendency of such a doctrine would be highly dangerous, as it would lock up for two years the only resources of Government, and it might be in time of war, when they would most need them, and have no other to resort to. Both those gentlemen seemed to have conceived and assumed for fact that direct taxes were to be apportioned according to representation, in which they were not justified by the Constitution. Representation and direct taxation were both, it is true, to be adjusted by one common standard, but not by each other; and, although in theory, or at first view, the distinction was not striking, yet in practice it would be found to be material and important.

The question was put and negatived, there being only 19 in favor of it.

The question was about to be put upon the original resolution, when

Mr. HAVENS wished the question divided.

Mr. POTTER said, he was against the resolution, because the tax would fall very unequally. Since the last census was taken, the situation of many of the States was very much altered as to population. In the State of Rhode Island, which was already oppressed by the direct taxes of the State, many of the inhabitants had removed into the State of New York, where they had less taxes to pay. The State of New York, and others, he said, had increased in population, and therefore a direct tax would operate very unequally on different States.

By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it appeared that the State of Rhode Island was to pay $28,000 a year, which would operate as a tax of double the sum on the land-holders, from the manner in which it would be collected, and from other property being excused from supporting its share of it. It would, therefore, fall particularly heavy on that State, when compared with others.

It had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] in two long speeches on the subject, that a direct tax was the most certain, equal, and easy in collection; the first convinced him that he knew nothing of the oppression of a direct tax. That gentleman was against having the system detailed, because it would be the means of raising objections to it; but, after gentlemen had voted for the abstract principle, they must vote for the bill.

Mr. P. believed sufficient revenue might be raised from indirect taxes. An additional tax had been proposed on salt and brown sugar. It was said these were articles consumed by the poorer classes; but if a man purchased salt or sugar, he was pleased with the purchase, and would pay double the tax in this way that he would pay by a direct tax. Nay, he believed a man felt five dollars paid in a direct way more than fifteen or twenty paid indirectly.

If, he said, they were to try to raise by indirect means, on the plan recommended by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] a part of the sum wanted till next session, it would be seen whether that method would not be successful. If it was then found that the revenues arising from thence were insufficient, there was not a person in the House who would not enter into direct taxes with more readiness. But until all indirect means were tried he should be unwilling to go to direct taxes.

Mr. SWANWICK said, he was sorry that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. POTTER] should have supposed he did not understand the principle of direct taxation, from not having felt it. He believed it had been mentioned by his colleagues that a direct tax had long been collected in his State, so that he had been constantly in the habit of feeling the weight of direct taxes, as he believed there were few places which paid more in this way than Philadelphia. If the gentleman had been in possession of landed property here, he would have felt the truth of this.

Much, Mr. S. observed, had been said on the subject of indirect taxes, and of the poor being in a great degree exempt from them. He believed this was not true. The duties arising from the luxuries of life were small in comparison to what was raised from articles of general consumption. If you want productive taxes, said Mr. S., you must come to salt, tea, and sugar, and articles of common use. The gentleman from South Carolina knew this, and had, therefore, introduced them into his list of articles which he supposed would bear additional duty. No one would doubt, therefore, that the poor paid a very heavy portion of those duties.

But, the gentleman said, let us go on a little longer and try the experiment. Mr. S. asked if it was not the moment, of all others, for them to look out for some other object of revenue besides commerce, when their imposts were wholly in jeopardy? For, whether they added to the duty on salt, sugar, or any other article recommended, what certainty could they have upon their calculations being realized, when they heard of their vessels being taken almost by hundreds?

Whenever commerce was mentioned, they always heard of merchants having over-traded themselves. And did not this very circumstance tell them that the revenue must hereafter experience a diminution, since, if they had over-traded themselves, they would in future do less?

Another gentleman had said that three hundred writs had been issued in one city to recover duties. But this, it was said, was no proof at all that a reduction of the revenue would ensue. It would at least be allowed that it proved an inability to pay, and bad debts would doubtless be the consequence, and that no certainty could be placed upon this species of revenue.

In what situation, then, said he, is this country placed? If the French continued to take our ships in the way they had lately heard of, we should not, he said, get revenue sufficient to pay the interest of our debt. So that gentlemen who opposed the present motion, if they were successful, would reduce the country to an alarming situation, indeed.

A curious way had been proposed of retrenching our expenses. Now we were threatened with foreign attacks, it was recommended that our Naval and Military Establishments should be reduced. This was extraordinary doctrine. He believed the gentleman who recommended this saving, might as well have gone on, and proposed an annihilation of the Government itself, and then there would be no need of revenue at all.

Our exigencies, said Mr. S., are such that those gentlemen who refuse to support the present proposition must take upon themselves the responsibility. With them, said he, be it; he did not choose to take it.

They had had some observations with respect to the constitutionality of certain points in reference to direct taxation; from reflecting upon which, he was of opinion that indirect taxes had not originally been contemplated by the Constitution. It contemplated a system of direct taxation, supported on the foundation of representation, by which States should pay according to their population. This sort of tax, he said, was well calculated to inspire caution in the expenditure of the public money.

Mr. S. said, he had been much gratified by the observation of his colleague from the interior of the country, that a land tax would be more gratifying to him and his constituents than an extension of indirect taxes. He hoped the resolution would be agreed to. Whatever might be its fate, however, he should feel satisfied in having done his duty in exerting himself in its behalf.

The call being loud for the Committee to rise, the question was put and negatived, there being only 13 for it.

Mr. HOLLAND had no doubt with respect to the Constitutional power to lay direct taxes. He would go further, and say, that it might have been better if Government had begun with them at its first institution; but he was doubtful whether the present was a proper time to commence the business. He was of opinion that indirect taxes might yet be extended so as to produce the revenue wanted.

Without examining into the principles of imposts and excise, it might be supposed that they fell upon the merchants; but, on examination, it would be found that they paid no more of them than in proportion to their consumption. The question was, whether the merchant or farmer consumed most; for it had been insinuated that the farmer scarcely paid any part of these duties.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. CRAIK] seemed to think there were farmers who paid little or nothing towards the expense of Government. He did not know any such. Farmers, he said, had mostly numerous families, and therefore consumed larger quantities of imported articles. The families of merchants were seldom so large; they consequently consumed less. Farmers, he said, were also saddled with an excise on their stills, from which merchants were exempt.

Merchants, he said, were in the habit of complaining, but Government had not been inattentive to their interests. He mentioned the allowance to them in favor of tonnage. He said he was convinced revenue was wanted, but he thought there was no necessity for going into direct taxes to raise it. As to paying off the debt, he doubted not, if they raised ever so much revenue, Government would find ways and means of spending it.

He justified the reduction of the Military and Naval Establishments. The Military Establishment, he said, was calculated for peace, and was of no other use than to garrison our forts; and, as the frigates were not built, there was no necessity for an establishment to man them; and, indeed, he thought it better that they were not finished, as, if they were out at sea, they would probably soon be added to the strength of an enemy. He wished we had less to do with foreign intercourse. He did not know what good foreign connexions were of to us, though Government had long been hunting them up. He thought the more we lived by ourselves the better.

He believed it would be best to pursue indirect taxes, if it were only with a view to keep the Public Debt out of sight, as a part of this debt has originally been the property of individuals, who would murmur very much if they were called upon to pay either towards reducing the principal, or discharging the interest of it.

The farmers already paid a tax on their stills, and if they were to pay a direct tax also, it would be like taxing both principal and interest. If a direct tax was laid, he hoped, therefore, the duty on stills would be repealed.

Mr. BUCK wished the decision on the question might be postponed, for the purpose of reading the communications just received from the PRESIDENT, as they might throw a light upon the situation of this country with respect to foreign countries, which might influence their decision, as the state of our commerce should be known before this business was proceeded far in; on this account, he hoped the Committee would rise, that every possible information of the state of our affairs may be known before a decision on the article of taxation took place.

Mr. J. SMITH hoped the Committee would not rise. He had made up his mind on the question, and he thought the arguments used on both sides must have operated as a decision to every gentleman; but if the gentleman had anything to offer on the question, Mr. S. would patiently hear him a little while; but he thought a speedy decision should be made. March was very near, and it ought to be remembered that, after the decision of the House there must be time allowed to the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill. From the debate which had taken place, spectators would suppose it a struggle between merchants and farmers on the question, "whence should the revenue come?" He hoped, in the main decision of the question, gentlemen would drop selfish motives, and vote for the public good, and that alone.

Mr. HARPER said, if the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. BUCK] had voted for the Committee to rise on any other than the reason offered, he should agree with him, but he thought that ground altogether insufficient. The communication only related to a chain of correspondence, the matter of which would no more tend to inform the House on this subject than it was at present. It was well known that revenue was wanted, and he hoped the manner of obtaining it would soon be decided, except gentlemen should want more time to think on it, which he was not willing to allow.

The question was now again put for the Committee's rising, and not carried.

Mr. CHRISTIE moved a division of the question. After a variety of observations from several members, the question was at length taken on the former part of the resolution, viz: that proposing a direct tax to be laid on land with improvements thereon, and carried by a considerable majority, there being 56 in its favor.

On the question upon the latter part of the resolution, viz: that a tax shall be laid upon slaves, with certain exceptions, being about to be put, Mr. CHRISTIE moved to add, "on all real and personal property within the United States." On suggestion of Mr. GILES, the words "and other property" were substituted in place of the above, and on the question being put upon it, it was negatived, there being only 18 in favor of it.

The latter part of the resolution was then put as it stood, and carried, 54 members voting for it. The Committee rose, and the question was at length put whether the House should take up the resolutions as amended, this day, and lost—ayes 37, noes 47.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 20.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that he wished to make a motion on the subject of the communication yesterday received from the PRESIDENT. It had been agreed that 300 copies should be printed; he believed this number would be too small, and would wish it extended to 500, and also that it should be printed under the direction of the Secretary of State, as he understood he meant to add some notes to different parts of it by way of elucidation.

This motion, which as far as it related to the number to be printed, was tried yesterday, occasioned a number of observations on the propriety of making the proposed addition, or of having it printed differently from the ordinary course of business. The Clerk informing the House that the communication was divided amongst several printers; that the printing paper would be ready by Monday se'night, and the others by Monday fortnight; that he had received a note from the Secretary of the Treasury, informing him that there were some mistakes in the transcribing of the papers, and requesting that the proof-sheets might be sent to his office, especially as he intended to add the original French of the French Minister's communication, Mr. W. SMITH withdrew the latter part of his motion, and the House agreed to 500 copies being printed, after many remarks.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE.

The House then took up the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole, on the subject of further revenue.

Mr. CORT wished for a division of the question, viz: that the proposition for a tax on land and that for slaves, should be put separately.

Mr. SWANWICK called for the yeas and nays. They were agreed to be taken.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought the resolution should not be divided, but that the propositions for a tax on land and a tax on slaves should go together, as he should object to vote for the tax on land except that on slaves accompanied it. He thought the gentleman had better try the question, by moving to strike out what respected slaves.

Mr. MADISON thought it would be best for the two propositions to go together; but if they did not, he did not think the embarrassments insuperable. If the question was divided, those who thought a tax on slaves necessary, must vote for the first part; and if the second was rejected, there would not be wanting an opportunity of voting against the tax on land. It was necessary to observe, that it had been found expedient to associate these two taxes together, in order to do justice, and to conform to the established usage of a very large tract of country, who were entitled to some degree of attention, and to whom a tax on land, without a tax on slaves, would be very objectionable.

Mr. CORT said, he could not gratify the gentleman from Virginia by varying his motion, as it would not answer the purpose he had in view.

Mr. NICHOLAS supposed, if the motion was persisted in, he was at liberty to move to insert slaves in the first part of the resolution. The gentleman certainly knew his own views best; or he thought it was possible to have settled the business he proposed.

Mr. W. SMITH saw no difficulty on the subject. Gentlemen would vote for the first part of the resolution, in hopes that the second would pass; but if it did not pass, they would have an opportunity of voting on the main question, and thereby defeat the whole.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT would vote for both together, but not separately.

Mr. GALLATIN inquired as to a point of order, whether, if the first part of the resolution was carried, and the second negatived, the question would not then be taken upon the resolution as amended?

The SPEAKER answered in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, it would save time if the question was taken upon the whole resolution together; for if several gentlemen voted against the first proposition, lest the last should not pass, the whole might in this way be defeated. He thought a vote might be safely taken upon the whole together, as no one would be bound by the vote in favor of the bill, if he should not approve of it.

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

For his own part, he wished to see the plan, though he did not know that he should vote for it.

Mr. NICHOLAS supposed there was not the difficulty mentioned by the gentleman from New York. Gentlemen would not risk the whole by voting against the first part of the resolution; since, if the second was not carried, they could afterwards reject the whole.

The question was then put, that the House agree to the first resolution, viz :

"Resolved, That there ought to be appropriated, according to the last census, on the several States, the sum of —, to be raised by the following direct taxes, viz :

"A tax ad valorem, under proper regulations and exceptions, on all lands, with their improvements, including town lots, with the buildings thereon :"

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 48, nays 39, as follows :

YEAS.—Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Richard Brent, Daniel Buck, Samuel J. Cabell, Joshua Coit, Isaac Coles, William Cooper, William Craik, George Dent, George Ege, William Findley, Albert Gallatin, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, Christopher Greenup, William B. The second part of the resolution, relative to slaves, was about to be put, when

Mr. GALLATIN said, before the question was taken on this division, he would just mention why this species of personal property was brought under view, whilst all other personal property was unnoticed.

It was very true, that stock upon a farm in the Northern and Eastern States paid nearly as great a proportion of the taxes of those States as the negroes did those of the Southern States, and therefore it might seem somewhat wrong to introduce negroes in the one case and not cattle in the other. The reason which induced the Committee of Ways and Means to adopt this mode was, that negroes are confined to certain spots of land in the Southern States, while horses and cattle extend nearly over a whole country. And a land tax, unaccompanied with a tax on slaves, would be very unpopular in those States, as it would throw too great a burden upon farmers who did not hold slaves, and fall too lightly upon those whose property chiefly consisted of slaves. There was this difference betwixt the two species of property : A farmer in the Northern or Eastern States would not think himself aggrieved by not paying a tax upon his farming stock ; but a farmer in the Southern States would think himself aggrieved if his land was taxed, whilst the slaves of the slaveholder were not taxed. It was on this account that this species of property was introduced.

Mr. MURRAY was not struck with the observations of the gentleman last up, so as to say he would ultimately vote for this species of tax ; at present, he should vote for a bill to be brought in ; but unless he found the bill could reconcile the principle more, and do greater justice in the case than he at present conceived, he should then oppose it.

He said, he considered slaves in the Southern States as laborers, and unless gentlemen could show him where laborers were taxed, he should not think it right to vote for that part of the bill. He was decidedly in favor of a land tax, but against the other part of the question. Mr. M. said, he merely mentioned this that he might not hereafter be charged with inconsistency, in case he should vote against the bill. He repeated, unless provision be made for taxing labor in other parts of the United States, he must vote against this part of the bill if brought in, because the tax would operate very unequally.

Mr. HARPER said, though he was entirely opposed to the tax proposed by the resolution, and should vote against the whole, yet he thought it right that a tax on slaves should be introduced with a tax on land ; for, as this direct tax was to be raised by apportionment through the States, whether the Southern States paid on slaves, or the Northern States on land, made no difference in effect ; each paid in its own way ; one mode was more convenient for the Northern, another for the Southern, and another for the Eastern—no injury was done by this to any other State.

Mr. G. JACKSON said, he was against all species of direct taxation, but particularly on this species ; and, if a tax on land was carried, he should bring forward a resolution to lay a tax upon all property vested in public securities. He wished for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were agreed to be taken.

Mr. NICHOLAS wondered to hear the observation of his colleague. He should vote for the question, though he and his constituents would be affected by it ; but, in the district which that gentleman represented, there were no slaves ; and it was therefore his constituents' interest to have a tax on slaves, in order to lighten that on land.

Mr. G. JACKSON said, it was not so much on account of the interest of himself or constituents that he opposed this tax, but he objected to it as a capitation tax.

Mr. MOORE said, the situation of the Southern States had been truly stated. In the Western parts, there were few slaves. He said, in the representation to that House, the labor of the negroes had been considered as five to three, with respect to white persons; therefore, the ability of the State to pay was considered in the same proportion. His colleague from the mountains [Mr. G. JACKSON] should consider that, if the holders of slaves were not to pay a portion of the tax imposed on the State of Virginia, it would fall very heavy upon his constituents, and those of his colleague, where few blacks were kept.

He hoped, therefore, it would pass.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH was aware that a tax on slaves would lighten the tax on land in the Southern States, and therefore he did not wonder at the Representatives from those States wishing it to take place; but, by so apportioning the tax, would not the land-holders in the Southern States pay less than the land-holders in parts of the Union where no slaves were kept? He believed they would. A person, for instance, in New Hampshire, holding the value of £1,000 in land, would pay a larger portion of the tax than a holder of land to the same extent in Virginia. He believed this would be unjust, and an objection to this mode of taxing the Southern States, as, though the tax would fall more equally on them, it would not be so with respect to other States.

Mr. GOODRICH said, this tax was introduced into the system for the accommodation of that part of the Union where slaves were numerous.

A disposition to render the plan as acceptable, in every part of the country, as it could be made, consistently with the interests of the whole, ought to prevail. But, before a tax on slaves was adopted, its operation on the Union, and its effects, as it respected different districts, should be considered.

A direct tax ought to fall as equally as possible everywhere; that on land and houses, with their improvements, which had been agreed to, would be laid by a valuation seldom repeated—perhaps, once in ten or fifteen years. The expense of its assessment and collection would be nearly equal throughout the United States; but, with respect to a tax on slaves, there would be required frequent enumerations—at least, an annual enumeration. This would be attended with considerable expense, to be defrayed, not by the particular districts, for whose benefit this species of tax was introduced, but by the United States.

There was another objection. A land tax was certain—it might, and undoubtedly would, be made a lien on the real estate on which it was laid. It would be liable to little, if any, loss. Not so with a tax on slaves. Such a tax, he apprehended, would be uncertain, exposing the revenue to considerable defalcations. If a provision could not be made to place the loss on the districts where it happened, by retaxing them it would operate unequally. He imagined a retaxation for defalcation, if it could be made, would be considered as unjust, and create discontent among the individuals who were subjected to it; and if that could not be done, the deficiency must fall on the Union, and would produce uneasiness from its partial effects. He did not know how the detail would be arranged. He had been of the number who were desirous to see the collection-law, before they decided on the resolution before them, so as to have possessed the whole subject. At present, he saw so many difficulties from incorporating this species of tax into the plan, he could not assent to it.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he did not understand the objections of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. J. SMITH.] He did not see how he could produce an equal value in land in every part of the Union. The tax, he said, would be apportioned according to the number of persons, and not according to the number of acres in any State.

If the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOODRICH] would rely upon his information, he might be assured, that an annual enumeration of slaves would not cost so much as an assessment of land made once in ten years. With respect to the tax being uncertain, he was totally mistaken. It was the most productive tax in the Southern States. If the tax was laid wholly upon land, it would be laid on a great part which would be unsaleable, and when a report came to be made of the collection, there would be found great deficiencies; but, with respect to slaves, there would be no failure, because they were a species of property which would always find a ready sale in the Southern market.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he had heard much on that floor with respect to equality of taxation. It was impossible, he said, to make taxes fall exactly equal; they will fall, in some cases, heavier than in others. He would state a case. When a tax on carriages was under consideration, they found the gentlemen from Connecticut voting without scruple, because that State paid only two or three hundred dollars annually, when Maryland paid five thousand dollars a year to that duty. There was no equality in this; yet those gentlemen winked at the disproportion. He hoped they would do so in the present case.

Mr. POTTER said, if this part of the resolution was agreed to, it was to apportion a tax on the personal property of the Southern States, which, no, doubt, they would be glad of; and if gentlemen from those States could point out any way by which the personal property of other States could be come at, he would agree to the present proposition; but he believed this could not be done; and, if not, he saw no reason why the personal property of those States should be made to bear a part of the proposed burden, whilst personal property in other States was suffered to go free. It was a hard case, he said, that a man who possessed three or four hundred dollars in land, should be made to pay a portion of the direct tax, whilst men of affluence, who possessed many thousands in public securities, or loaned on interest, should pay nothing.

The SPEAKER reminded the House, that the question was very much lost sight of; it was not whether a tax should be laid on carriages or personal property, but whether they would agree to the report of the Committee of the Whole, viz: "that a tax should be laid on slaves, with certain exceptions."

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HENDERSON said, he should vote against this proposition, because it was a direct tax, as he should vote against every question of that kind, until every source of indirect taxation was exhausted; and he thought this was not the case at present.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, he thought, also, that direct taxes should not be resorted to until indirect sources were exhausted; but, he believed, they were now exhausted, and that direct taxes were the only means left to them of raising money. As he lived in a country which was unfortunately cursed with negroes, he wished the present motion to pass, for the sake of making the tax bear, in some degree, equally in the Southern States; but, if he thought with his colleague [Mr. JACKSON] that a tax on slaves bore any affinity to a capitation tax, he should also oppose it; but he had no such idea.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he would just notice what had fallen from the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOODRICH] which was the only thing like argument which had been used against the present proposition. As to what had been said about the quantum of tax falling on different States, or what had been said by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. POTTER] with respect to the personal property of the Eastern States, he did not see how it applied to the present question. If the proposed tax was certain, and the expense of collection would not be greater than would attend the collection of the tax in other States, he did not see any objection to it.

The gentleman from Connecticut had said, that the expense of an annual enumeration of slaves would be great, and that it would fall upon the United States. He would inform that gentleman and the House, that when no assessment took place, but merely an enumeration, it would be attended with no expense on the collection of the tax. The distinction which he made was, when a valuation and an enumeration were both necessary, and when an enumeration alone was necessary. In the first instance, the value of the property was to be ascertained, and the tax laid accordingly; but where an enumeration was only wanted, (the tax per head, according to age, &c., having been settled,) no expense would be incurred.

Mr. G. said, he spoke from experience. In Pennsylvania there was a certain tax on personal property, the taking an account of which did not increase the expense. Every three years there was an assessment of personal property, amongst which was slaves; but the enumeration was managed in this way: the collector called twice upon persons—the first time he gave them notice to pay, and took an account of their property, which, consisting of few articles, and the value being already fixed, he could tell them at the time, the amount to be paid at his next call.

As to any degree of uncertainty apprehended from this tax, that might be removed by throwing the deficiency, if there should be any, upon the land. He thought, therefore, the objections which had been urged against this tax, would be completely obviated.

Mr. COIT allowed, that nothing was more clear than that the manner in which the Southern States paid their apportionment of the proposed burden, could make no difference to the Northern and Eastern States; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] allowed there was some weight in the objections, with respect to the assessment and collection of the tax.

If he understood that gentleman, he said that the making an enumeration of slaves would make no difference in the expense. He did not know how this could be. If two objects were to do, viz: to value and assess the land, and to enumerate and value the slave, it was new doctrine to him, if these two things would not cost more than if only one had been done; or, if this business would be done for nothing, it would be one of the first things the United States had had done upon those terms.

Upon the collection, there would also be an additional expense and a probability of loss; the more detail there was in the business, the greater liability to error and loss to the United States; and in proportion to this loss would these States pay less than others.

Mr. HARTLEY said, he should at present vote for the proposition; but should feel himself at liberty to vote differently on the bill, if he did not approve it. Difficulties arose in his mind as to the propriety of taxing personal property in one State and not in another, by which means a bounty seemed to be given on land in the Southern States to the amount of the difference of the taxes between the land in those States, and that, in other States, upon which purchasers would naturally calculate. This difficulty might probably be removed from his mind; and, therefore, in order to give the whole of the business a fair chance, he should wish the resolutions to go back to the Committee of Ways and Means, to bring in a bill.

Mr. PAGE did suppose that gentlemen coming from States which were in the habit of collecting direct taxes, would have endeavored to accommodate the business to the situation and circumstances of different States, so as to make the system the most convenient to each. He did suppose that, whenever it should have been determined to enter upon direct taxation, that sums would have been apportioned to each State, and that they would have been left to themselves to have raised the money in the way which they thought most convenient. Insurmountable objections, however, it seemed, had been found against this system, as appeared from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury; but it was unreasonable that the Northern States should complain that the Southern States would pay the tax with greater facility than them. They might, he said, as well complain against the richness of their soil, or the warmth of their climate.

With respect to the tax falling lighter on them than on other States, those who held slaves would find it lighter, but those who had none, would not. But he thought it extraordinary that, whilst they were upbraided with holding a species of property peculiar to their country, they should also be upbraided with wishing to pay a duty upon that property.

Mr. P. said, he did not see what difference it could make to other States, that they raised a part of the tax required of them from slaves. The Secretary of the Treasury had recommended this mode, the Committee of Ways and Means had reported accordingly; and they were ready to pay a tax for their slaves, in addition to the expense they were at for them already; for, it should be recollected, persons holding slaves, contribute largely to the duties collected from imposts, by the purchase of flannels and cloth, rum, molasses, &c., necessary for their food and clothing.

If a person living in a State where slavery did not exist, paid something more for his land, the difference was certainly not equal to the satisfaction he must enjoy in reflecting, that his State was free from that evil. His land, on that account, would be worth three times as much as land of the same quality in the Southern States. Why, then, do gentlemen complain? The Southern States themselves might have objected to this tax; they might have doubted the constitutionality of it; indeed, he did doubt it, but he had agreed to it; and he believed there was no better way of making the tax go down in those States, than by the present measure.

For his own part, Mr. P. said, he wished he lived where there was no slavery; and if he could find a climate he liked as well, he would change his situation on that account.

Mr. BRENT said, it was a very extraordinary thing that gentlemen who represented States where there were no slaves, should oppose a tax on that species of property, and that the Southern States where slavery existed, should be advocating that tax.

By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there appeared a deficiency of revenue, and in order to supply that deficiency, they had determined to have recourse to direct taxation; and, after the amount which each State ought to furnish, had been ascertained, he thought it should have been left to the different States to have raised the money from such funds as they judged best, provided they had been secure. This, he thought, would only have been liberal and proper. It had, however, been determined otherwise; but, from a knowledge that, by introducing land and slaves together, as objects of taxation, the tax would be more equally levied in the Southern States, if that plan had been adopted. And, surely, he said, it could have given no satisfaction to any other State, that, by laying a tax on land only, it should have operated in a very oppressive manner in some parts of the Southern States, and scarcely have been felt at all in other parts of those States; and yet, this would appear to be the opinion of the gentleman from New Hampshire; for, he said, if this law passed, a person possessing landed property in New Hampshire, of the value of £1,000, would pay more than a land-holder to that amount in the Southern States. And was this, he asked, a subject of regret? If the State of Virginia paid the amount required of her in a manner which bore most equally upon the whole of her citizens, ought that to displease the citizens of other States? He thought not. He was of opinion, that it would be a desirable thing that the tax should be found to fall equally on the citizens of every State.

Another objection, produced by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOODRICH] was, that a tax on this species of property would not be so secure as a tax on land. If that gentleman had been acquainted with the situation of the Southern States, he would have known that slaves formed the most certain fund of those States; for, whilst their wide and extensive waste lands would not command any price, slaves were always ready sale. Hence it arose, that the States were not able to raise a tax on land, whilst a tax on slaves had never failed to be productive.

With respect to the inconvenience or expense attending a tax on slaves, in Virginia, he said, no expense would be necessary; because it was the custom of that State to take, annually, a list of their slaves, which was regularly recorded in the archives of the State. If gentlemen were, therefore, so economical that they would not expend a few of the public pence to get a list of this property, let them recur to the document he had mentioned, which might be done without expense.

To those who know the situation of the Southern States, the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] must have been irresistibly impressive. Almost the whole of the lower part of the country possessed property of this kind, whilst the upper parts had scarcely any. If a tax was, therefore, imposed upon land only, the upper part of the country would be extremely aggravated, and would murmur, and they would murmur with justice.

Gentlemen from the Eastern States called upon the Representatives of the Southern States to point out a mode by which they might come at the personal property of their States. But, he would ask them, if, independent of land with its improvements, they possessed any other species of property which could not be eluded? He believed they could not point it out; why, then, call upon gentlemen from the Southern States to do, what they, who certainly knew best their own resources, were unable to do?

The gentlemen from the Southern States, he said, had discovered those objects which they thought best able to bear the burden; and if the Representatives of the other States were not satisfied with the tax on land, let them come forward and say what other property they have equally secure, upon which a tax may be laid.

It was a phenomenon, he would again say, that the Representatives of States where slavery existed, should be contending for a tax upon slaves, and that members from States where slavery was not tolerated, were opposing it. He could not help believing that the real object of gentlemen had not been avowed. It was something hidden and unseen.

Direct Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. KITTERA said, that the opposers of this part of the resolution were the opposers of a direct tax altogether. It was observable that those upon whom the tax would fall, did not complain. It was extraordinary that the complaints should come from another quarter. As to the objections of his colleague [Mr. HARTLEY] that part of the tax being laid on slaves in the Southern States, would affect the value of land, it would make no difference whether the tax was on land or slaves, as it affected land, its operation would be the same. It was therefore no solid objection against the resolution.

On the question, that the House do agree to the last part of the said resolution, in the words following, to wit: "A tax on slaves, with certain exceptions;" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 23, as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means do prepare and bring in a bill or bills, pursuant to the said resolution.

UNITED STATES LAWS IN TENNESSEE.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for giving effect to the laws of the United States in the State of Tennessee.

A considerable debate took place on the subject of the salary of the District Judge to be appointed under the act. The bill provides that he shall be paid 1,000 dollars a year. Mr. SWIFT moved to amend the bill by striking out $1,000, to insert in its place $800. This motion was supported by Messrs. WILLIAMS, HENDERSON, W. SMITH, W. LYMAN, and KITTERA, on the ground of 800 dollars being sufficient to afford a handsome maintenance in that country; that it was equal to the pay of any Judge in the Union, considering the duties he would have, and the cheapness of living; that if compared to the salaries allowed by that State to its officers, it was a high salary, as their District Judges were allowed only 68 dollars a circuit, and their Governor only 650 dollars a year; that if more was allowed, it would be doing an injury to the State, as it would tend to make their officers dissatisfied with their pay: that to pay a larger sum would bring a charge of extravagance upon the Government: that the District Judge of Vermont had only $800; and that if $1,000 were given to the Judge of Tennessee, it would not only lead him to expect an augmentation of salary, (which he had already applied for) but every Judge in the Union would expect to be advanced. This, it was said, was a serious consideration, since a Judge's salary could not be lowered, and to hold out an idea that they might be increased on application, would have the effect to make the Judges in some degree dependent on that House. The present want of money also cautioned them against extravagance.

On the other hand, Messrs. A. JACKSON, HOLLAND, BLOUNT, MACON, BUCK, THATCHER, and S. SMITH, were in favor of the salary being 1,000 dollars. In order to induce men of abilities to accept of such offices, they wished them to be liberally paid; that no Judge in the Union had a less sum, except the Judge of Vermont, whose salary they hoped would be increased; that though most of the necessities of life were tolerably low, yet every article imported was very high in that country, owing to their distance from the sea; that he would have four times a year to travel through the wilderness, which was always attended with danger, and which, if a war should at any time take place with the Indians, would be at the risk of his life: that the salaries of the State officers ought to be no rule in this case, since the State was poor, and they had generally been accepted from patriotic motives; it was added that they had not been in the habit of being guided by the practice of States, who were mostly too penurious in the pay of their officers; the members of Congress received double the pay of the members of any of the State Legislatures, and they heard of no complaint on that ground.

The question on the amendment was put and carried—39 to 35. The Committee then rose and obtained leave to sit again. Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, January 23.

THOMPSON J. SKINNER, from Massachusetts, in place of THEODORE SEDGWICK, appointed a Senator of the United States, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill in addition to an act for mitigating and remitting certain penalties incurred under the revenue laws, making it to extend to the acts relative to the registering of ships, and to vessels employed in the fishing and coasting trade. The bill was twice read and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. S. also reported a bill relative to the compensation of certain officers employed in collecting duties on imposts and tonnage, proposing to allow the Collectors of the several ports, instead of their present salaries, a certain per centum on the amount of duties collected, with sundry other regulations. It was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

Mr. GILMAN, from the Committee to whom was referred the business relative to the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, reported a bill, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

UNITED STATES LAWS IN TENNESSEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for extending the laws of the United States into the State of Tennessee, which having gone through without further amendment, the Committee rose, and reported the bill. The House then took it up, and having agreed to the amendment, ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the subject of the Military Establishment. The following report from the Committee was read:

Resolved, That, in their opinion, all such parts of the act which relate to the light dragoons, ought to be repealed. That a Major General, and his staff, are not longer necessary; they therefore recommend a repeal of the third section of the said act, together with all other parts thereof, which relate to the Major General and his staff; and they recommend the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That there shall be one Brigadier General, who may choose his Brigade Major and Inspector from the captains and subalterns in the line; to each of whom there shall be allowed the monthly pay of — dollars, in addition to his pay in the line, and two rations extraordinary per day; and whenever forage shall not be furnished by the public, to ten dollars per month in lieu thereof. That there shall be one Brigade Quartermaster, one Brigade Paymaster, and one Judge Advocate, who shall be taken from the commissioned officers of the line, and each of whom shall be entitled to receive two rations extra, per day, and — dollars per month, in addition to his pay in the line—and whenever forage shall not be furnished by the public, there shall be allowed to the Brigade Quartermaster, — dollars per month, and to the Brigade Paymaster and Judge Advocate, each — dollars per month, in lieu thereof.

Resolved, That so much of the 23d section of the said act, as may be construed to affect the Brigadier General and his staff, be, and is hereby repealed.

Resolved, That eight privates be added to each company of infantry.

Resolved, That from and after the — day of — next, the pay of the Lieutenants shall be thirty dollars, and that of the Ensigns, twenty-five dollars per month. That to the Brigadier, while Commander-in-Chief, there shall be allowed — rations per day extraordinary; and each officer commanding a separate post, shall be entitled to receive twice the number of rations to which he otherwise would be entitled.

Resolved, That the Majors be entitled to receive four rations per day, for their subsistence."

Mr. BALDWIN said, that the question ought to be taken, first, on the dismission of the dragoons in the first part of the report.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, that he wished the select committee would inform the Committee of the Whole whether this part of their report was the result of a conviction that cavalry would be unnecessary for the defence of the frontiers, or whether they meant to substitute two companies of militia horse in the place of the regular corps proposed to be dismissed. If the latter was the object, Mr. D. hesitated not to say that it ought not to be adopted. It was well ascertained that the militia cavalry were more expensive than the regulars; that the former were far more harassing to our citizens than the latter, and that, on account of their attention being necessarily divided between their families and their military duty, less real service could be expected or required from them. If, therefore, any horse were necessary, he was persuaded that those now in service should be retained as affording more effectual and more economical protection. The expenses of enlisting the dragoons and of purchasing the horses, had already been incurred. But if the select committee were satisfied that the employment of any horsemen was unnecessary, and a majority should concur with them, then Mr. D. said he should rejoice at the prospect of a saving of expense in this particular instance.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he did not know that the question relative to repealing of so much of the act as related to dragoons, was under consideration, or he should have thought it necessary, without being called upon, to have given the information inquired for; but he thought the question had been upon adding the word "Resolved" to the first article of the report. The select committee, in taking the subject of light dragoons into consideration, was of opinion, that there was no immediate necessity for horse on the Northwestern frontier; for, as all the supplies would now be transported by water, there would be no necessity for light dragoons to conduct them. They also took into consideration the Southern frontier, and were of opinion that no horse were necessary there, and therefore, that the two troops of horse might be dispensed with.

This, he said, was the ground of the report: but, since the report was made, he had had some conversation with the Secretary of War, who had politely shown him the correspondence which had taken place between him and the Governor of Georgia, by which it appeared that it had been necessary to keep up one or two troops of militia horse on that frontier: and he found that the Secretary of War, discovering that two companies of horse were not necessary on the Northwestern frontier, had sent one company, and intended sending the other, to the frontiers of Georgia, believing that Continental troops would be more useful than Militia, and also prevent the harassing too much the yeomanry of that country by that service.

He thought it necessary thus far to state the opinion of the Secretary of War. The estimate of the expense of the two companies of Militia, he found to be 26,505 dollars, whilst that of the regulars was only 22,212, making an equal number of militia horse more expensive than the Continental cavalry, by nearly 4,300 dollars. The Secretary of War seemed to think it was necessary either to keep up the military horse, or send cavalry to that frontier. The gentleman from Georgia would, perhaps, be able to say which would be the most pleasing or necessary.

These two companies of horse, it was true, Mr. S. said, cost as much as a regiment of infantry; and if the frontier was to be protected, it became a question whether a regiment of infantry would not be more effectual than two troops of horse.

Mr. DEARBORN said, if it should appear to the satisfaction of the Committee that two companies of horse were necessary on the frontiers of Georgia, no member would hesitate about retaining the two companies already in the establishment; but he was not convinced that any horse was necessary. He acknowledged he was not very well acquainted with that frontier, but he could see no good and substantial reason why, in time of peace, garrisons would not answer the purpose there as well as on the Northwestern frontier. If it were said the garrisons were so far apart as not to be a sufficient defence, he believed more infantry might be spared for that quarter, which would be vastly cheaper, and quite as useful as horse. He supposed these troops were wanted to prevent the people of Georgia from going into the Indian Territory, and the Indians from coming within the boundary of Georgia, and that horse were considered more effectual for this purpose; but he could not see what effect a small body of horse could have, more than infantry. If the white people, or Indians, could not be kept in obedience, without being watched from hour to hour, they might as well make a chain of defence from one end of the frontier to the other; but he saw no reason to induce him to keep up such a patrol on that frontier, any more than upon others. If any gentleman could show the necessity of these troops in time of peace, he should be for negating the report; but, until that was shown, he should remain of the opinion that it would be of no use to retain the cavalry.

Mr. VENABLE wished to know whether the purchase of horses was stated in the estimate? for he had remarked that there had been almost continually an annual purchase of horses.

The Clerk read from the estimate that nine thousand four hundred and fifty dollars were charged for the purchase of sixty-two horses, from which a deduction of five thousand seven hundred and ninety-two dollars was made for the value of the horses at the end of the year.

Mr. S. SMITH said the whole charges of two companies of dragoons was fifty-two thousand dollars a year.

Mr. BALDWIN said, it had been suggested the last session, when the subject was under discussion, (and, he was of that opinion,) that the cavalry was unnecessary; and it would be recollected that the House first determined upon having only one company, but afterwards they resolved upon two. From the intercourse which had taken place between the Secretary of War and the Governor of Georgia, it appeared that horse were preferred to infantry for guarding that frontier; and as only a few months had elapsed since the law was passed, he did not think it necessary now to make any alteration in it; for if they went again into the subject, they should probably come to the same thing again. In one part of the frontier, it appeared that cavalry was the best for defence; in another, infantry. He had therefore reconciled his mind to the measure, and saw no reason for the proposed repeal.

Mr. DAYTON rose to make reply to the member from Massachusetts. That gentleman had undertaken to instruct him in his duty, and seemed to have forgotten or neglected his own. Without advocating absolutely the retention in service of the two companies of cavalry, he had exercised a privilege which he enjoyed, in common with other members, to ask from the select committee whose peculiar duty it had been, and who had a better opportunity to procure it, some information as to the usefulness of the cavalry, and some explanation as to the effect of adopting this part of their report. He was desirous of having it understood before the vote was taken whether the cavalry were to be disbanded as too expensive, unprofitable, and unnecessary, or whether they were to be discharged in order to make way for the employment of an equal or greater number of militia horse? Which ever of those two objects had been the favorite one of the Committee, did not appear from the question under consideration, nor from any part of the report. Yet it was certainly important that there should be a perfect understanding as to the tendency of the measure before it was adopted. This inquiry would not be deemed fruitless or improper by those who recollected the arguments which were urged and actually prevailed in a former session in favor of a reduction of that corps from four to two troops. They were then told, and Mr. DAYTON owned that he himself believed it, that by that reduction they would save to the United States the expense of paying, subsisting, and equipping two troops of horse. Could it be said that the event had corresponded with their expectations, and that they had realized the saving which had been contemplated? On the contrary, he asked, if it was not true that the two troops of militia horse had been kept up to supply the deficiency, at an expense to the public of about eight thousand dollars more than would have been incurred if the reduction had not taken place. He had certain information that two militia troops had been continued in the pay and service of the United States from that time to this, and that even a third had been called out and employed a part of the time. It had been proved to the conviction of every member, by an estimate founded on actual expenditures, that a troop of militia would exceed in expense that of regular cavalry about four thousand three hundred dollars per year. Another source of extraordinary expense ought also to be taken into the calculation. The militia generally are called into service under circumstances that rendered it inconvenient to absent themselves long from their families, and therefore the real claims and pretexts they could set up for furloughs, and the facility with which they could procure them from officers who were not in habits of severe discipline, made it necessary to have three companies upon the musters, and of course in pay, in order to insure the actual service of two only. These inconveniences had already been experienced to their cost, and ought to operate as a lesson of caution in future. Congress had reduced on a former occasion their squadron of horse from four troops to two, yet two troops of militia had been kept up to supply their place at a greater expense. They had, it was true, in consequence of the reduction, reduced the appropriation for the Military Establishment about forty-four thousand dollars; but it was equally true that the militia that were substituted had swelled the expenditures under the general head of the defensive protection of the frontiers about fifty-two thousand dollars.

It was of little consequence to the people of the United States, under which head of expenditure the expenses were incurred, whether that of "Military Establishment," or "defensive protection of the frontiers" if no saving was produced by the transposition. That there had been no economy in the former instance of reduction, but, on the contrary, additional expenses, was clear, and they ought now to consider the question as deciding whether horse of any description were necessary; and if the reform and disbandment of those in service should be determined upon, they ought to carry the same determination into the appropriation bill, and reduce the charges under the head of the defensive protection of the frontiers in the same proportion. If they acted otherwise, they would be deceiving themselves, or rather they would be deceiving their constituents, by holding up to them an appearance of saving under one head of expenditure, and as certainly, though somewhat more disguisingly, squandering away the same or a greater sum, and for the same purpose, under another head, and that more general, and less capable of being checked.

Mr. NICHOLAS did not think the information before them was complete. He thought it extraordinary that the gentleman from Georgia should have thought the cavalry unnecessary six months ago, when it was said they were wanted on the Northwestern frontier, and now, when they were found to be unnecessary there, that he should think them necessary in another place. It was true that a regulation had been made at that time in the Military Establishment, but it was not less true that they had been deceived with respect to what was necessary. He wanted to know, not only whether cavalry was less expensive than militia horse, but whether either were necessary, and what they were to do? He had no information on the subject. They had been told that two or three Governors of Georgia had recommended cavalry to be sent there; but in the course of that time, they had been at war with the Creek Indians, and were now at peace.

It appeared to him as if they were never to reduce their expenses: whether we were at peace or war, no alteration was made in our establishments; for, if men were not wanted in one situation, they were sent to another, though no real necessity existed for them. He hoped they should receive further information on the subject, if there was any need of retaining the cavalry proposed to be dispensed with.

Mr. DEARBORN said, that he expected the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] instead of showing that cavalry would be cheaper than militia horse, would have shown that either one or the other was necessary; because, if any were necessary, he had allowed that regulars were preferable to militia; but instead of that, he had told them that two or three Governors had said that two or three companies of horse were necessary. He had no doubt the Governor of Georgia might say they were necessary now; he could not say how disinterested he was. He had no doubt but the people of the district of Maine, and in other situations, would have no objections to have two companies of horse kept up there at the public expense. How far this kind of evidence ought to have weight, the House would determine. For his part, except these horse could be shown to be necessary, from the situation of the country, independent of the opinion of any Governor, he should be for agreeing to the report before them; for, if these troops were to be sent there without necessity, in two or three years they would be told they had no occasion for them; but, so long as they agree to pay these horse, to do he did not know what, he did not expect to hear any objection from that quarter. Being at perfect peace on the Northwestern frontier, a large number of infantry may be spared from that quarter for the defence of the Georgia frontier, if necessary; but, except he heard stronger reasons for the measure than he had yet heard, he should oppose the retaining of horse in our establishment.

Mr. MILLEDGE said, it was well known that they had an extensive frontier of betwixt two hundred and three hundred miles, and that the Governors of Georgia had always been of opinion that horse were the best defence for that frontier; that they bordered on a numerous savage tribe of ten thousand or twelve thousand men; and who, in a state of peace, were always committing depredations upon them, so that it required troops to be constantly passing backward and forward to keep them in order. Dragoons, he said, had been constantly employed for that purpose, and it had been allowed that the expense of militia horse was greater than that of regulars; he hoped, therefore, the law would remain as at present, and that horse would be sent to defend that frontier.

Mr. WILLIAMS observed that, when the bill passed last session, it was said that these horse would be wanted to convey information from one garrison to another on the Northwestern frontier. This necessity no longer existed; and, of course, these troops may be dispensed with: but, it was said, they were wanted on the frontiers of Georgia, because the frontier was betwixt two hundred and three hundred miles in extent. But was this frontier more exposed to danger than the Northwestern frontier? He believed not. It was time, he said, that they endeavored to reduce the expenses of Government, wherever they would admit of it, and he believed this object of expense might well be spared.

During the last session, Mr. W. said, that they had laid before them the number of troops in service, and he expected to have had a similar account this session, not only of the troops in actual pay, but where stationed; for, though he had the highest opinion of the officers of their departments, he wished to form his own opinion on every subject upon which he was called upon to vote.

When this subject should have been fully discussed, he should wish the Committee to rise, for the purpose of obtaining further information on the subject.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the information which the gentleman last up wished for, had not been attended to by the select committee; but the new organization of the Army from legions to regiments, which had lately taken place, and the death of General Wayne, had prevented regular information on the subject from being obtained from the Secretary of War. Neither the number of men, nor their station could be accurately ascertained; nor was this essential, because where the troops are now, is not where they will shortly be. After the necessary garrisons were furnished, he believed there would remain out of the four regiments, six or eight companies.

If the Committee rose, Mr. SMITH believed no more information could be had on the subject.

It was asked, whether cavalry was necessary for the defence of the Southern frontier? The Secretary of War had said they were; and if the present cavalry were not retained, he supposed militia horse would be employed, the expense of which it had been seen would be greater than that of regulars.

Mr. HARTLEY said, he was upon the select committee, and very reluctantly agreed to this part of the report. The expense of the horse, it was true, was a very important consideration. Upon inquiry, it was found that dragoons were not necessary on the Northwestern frontier; but that might not be the case in the Southern. The people of Georgia, it seemed, considered dragoons as the most proper defence, and he thought they might be indulged with so small a number as two troops of horse, since it would be less expensive than employing the militia.

Mr. H. said, from a consideration of doing away the cavalry, it had been recommended to add eight men to each company of infantry; but, from the present state of things, he should think it his duty to oppose the repeal of that part of the act.

Mr. HOLLAND said, when this subject was formerly before them, a part of the House wished to have dispensed with the dragoons; but it was said they would be necessary for conveying information, &c. It now appeared, however, that they were not necessary, and that the minority on that occasion were right. But now, it was said, they were necessary for the protection of the frontiers of Georgia. He saw no reason for this, nor did he think that country was in greater danger from the Indians than the frontiers in other parts of the Union; indeed, it had somewhat the advantage of other parts, by the openness of the country.

It was the opinion of the Governor of Georgia, it seemed, that horse were necessary, and that cavalry would be cheaper and better than militia horse; but the necessity did not appear, and until it did, that House was not to be governed by the opinion of one or two gentlemen. It was necessary they should judge for themselves.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said this was a matter of moment. Dragoons were expensive, and they had no business with them. To keep up a battle array, in time of peace, was inconvenient. When they were desirous of decreasing their expenses, this was an object of importance. With respect to the frontier, he said, he looked to the frontier of every part of the Union with as much feeling as any man. He knew the difficulties experienced on all frontiers, he had long been acquainted with them; but when he considered that two companies of dragoons were called for to protect a frontier of three hundred miles, they were not competent to the business. If an emergency should take place, and those savages—those uninformed creatures—should make war upon the frontier inhabitants, the Governor would, of course, call forth a certain number of the people—the militia—according to the emergency; and this appeared to him a more rational defence than sending of two companies of dragoons to watch their motions. Reason, he said, was outraged by the idea. It would please him to keep up a large force, as we had many martial men of merit; but it would be deceiving of them, to give them a momentary employment, when they could engage their time better; as, when the situation of the country wanted them, they would be ready to come forward; but, in the mean time, they would do well to find some useful occupation.

Military Establishment.

Mr. GALLATIN said, whether they considered the increase of expense which had taken place in every branch of the Military Establishment, or whether they compared our present situation with the danger which threatened us when this establishment was fixed, or the present situation of our finances, they must approve of the report before them, as it related to a reduction of the Military Establishment. It must be remembered, he said, that this establishment was fixed in March, 1792, immediately after the defeat of General St. Clair. At that time the dragoons were added, and three additional troops of infantry; and, in order to show that the addition was made only for the emergency, there was a provision in the act to this effect: "Provided, that the same three troops shall be disbanded as soon as peace shall take place with the Indian tribes."

Last year, he said, it was thought that circumstances being changed, peace being established, it was necessary and proper to reduce the infantry and abolish the cavalry, but it was said they were wanted to take possession of the posts, &c. And now, when all those purposes were completed, the cavalry were wanted for the frontiers of Georgia; and, if that frontier were completely secured, he supposed some other reason would be found for retaining these troops in service.

If they were to indulge every State, Mr. G. said, which chose to make a requisition for troops, without inquiry, there might be no end of the expense. They might be called upon by Tennessee, Kentucky, and the Northwestern frontier, for regular troops, or for the support of militia, to an extent not to be calculated.

Mr. G. thought it was their duty to reduce the Army to the footing upon which it stood in 1792. He thought nothing had taken place to make it necessary to extend the establishment beyond that time; the possession of new posts, and our Treaty with Spain, having also given us security with respect to the Creeks. As to the protection of the frontiers, no person desired more than him, to afford them protection, but he had no idea that they should spend for that purpose whatever they were called upon for.

The frontiers of the United States, he said, had always been exposed to depredations from the Indians; but he considered those depredations as arising from the peculiar situation of the frontier inhabitants, and it was only when there was danger of an open war, that it was necessary for Government to interfere; till then, the exertions of the inhabitants themselves were sufficient. If they recurred to the year 1792, it would be found that the protection of the frontiers cost ninety-four thousand dollars; in 1791, fifty-two thousand dollars, when the danger was the greatest. He, therefore, thought there was nothing more necessary than the will of the United States to reduce the present establishment; but if the Legislature did not make the proper reductions, by agreeing to the present report, the expense would be incurred. He hoped the report would be agreed to, and that they should go still further in lowering the establishment.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the select committee were directed to report what alterations were necessary in the act; not to inquire with respect to regulations in the Military Department; not to report what was cheapest. From the report this conclusion would be drawn, that no cavalry was necessary, as that part of the act was recommended to be repealed. He imagined the gentleman from New Jersey would have drawn that conclusion, and spared his censure of the committee.

The question was put and carried—there being 64 in favor of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, we were either in a state of peace or of war; if we were in a state of peace, he did not see any reason why the establishment should be larger than in 1792. He therefore moved to add, after the word "repealed": "and that the four regiments of infantry be reduced to two." If at any time we should be disturbed on our frontiers, he considered that there was virtue enough in the yeomanry of the country to take care of the frontiers. Where our troops were, he said, he could not tell. It was supposed we had three thousand men, but they had no return to know what number they had. To keep up four regiments, when only two were necessary, was an expense thrown away. He should have wished to have seen an estimate; but, as none had been made, he wished the four regiments to be reduced to two.

Mr. S. SMITH hoped the motion would not prevail. He had not before him the number of troops or a calculation of what were necessary, but it appeared to him that the number of troops was not greater than would be necessary for the different posts. It would be recollected that there was a considerable scope of country from Tennessee to the Mississippi, not before in the possession of the United States. At this moment, he believed, it would be unsafe to lessen the number of troops. Indeed, he was surprised to hear the motion, as it was the first time he had heard such a thing intimated as a reduction of the infantry, and he was unprepared to meet the attack.

Military Establishment.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if the gentleman was not prepared, he would move that the Committee rise. If there was occasion, he said, he should always be willing to keep up a sufficient number of troops; but if the present number was unnecessary, he wished to reduce them, as he was unwilling to do anything which would lead one part of society to live upon the industry of another.

Mr. MURRAY said he was but little acquainted with military affairs, but it appeared to him natural and proper that a communication should have been had from the proper department, before a motion like the present had been made. It was true, they had the power of raising armies; but the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES had the direction of them when raised; and he thought it was very natural for them to have some reference to the Executive or War Department, and to have received such an official statement from thence as would have saved much inquiry and loose information.

There was another point of view in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] had placed the subject. He had said, we were either in a state of war or of peace. In making this assertion, the gentleman seemed to have an eye to European countries. There the language might be properly used; but, said he, we live in a country in which we cannot say it is either war or peace. There was a sort of intermediate state; and until that unhappy race of men who live in an uncivilized state, in our country, be extinguished, that will always be the case: a state which requires vigilance, even an armed vigilance, to guard against depredations. The frontiers, he said, must have stations adapted to their situations. He regretted, therefore, that the two troops of horse were ordered to be struck out. It was strange, he said, that at a moment that our number of forts was increased, our Military Establishment should be reduced.

If the motives of gentlemen were to be judged of, those who came from parts of the Union where there was no danger from Indians, were opposing measures intended to secure their fellow-citizens who were exposed to danger. In the Atlantic States, he said, we had no cause for alarm; but it was from the principle of wishing to defend every part of the Union that he should rather vote for an increase than a decrease of the Military Establishment.

He hoped gentlemen would turn their attention to that state which was neither a state of peace nor of war; for such must be the situation of frontier inhabitants, since the Indian tribes are not capable of preserving a lasting peace. He hoped the gentleman would retract his motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if the gentlemen last up had known from whence he came, and was at all acquainted with the geography of the country, he must have known that he lived in the very neighborhood of the Indians. The State of New York concluded a peace with those Indians only last Fall which had cost them a great deal of money. His house, he said, was within thirty miles of the place where the Treaty with the Indians was made, and no post was kept up between them, so that they were always open to incursions from them; but they trusted in the virtue of their militia, the bulwark of the nation. It was necessary to keep the posts occupied with military, but, in time of peace, there was no necessity for anything further.

With respect to any calculation of the Executive, or the Secretary of War, however highly he thought of them, he should wish to depend on his own opinion. The safety of the nation, he said, was committed to him in part, as well as to them; and he was accountable to his constituents for every farthing of public money which he consented should be spent.

The gentleman's observation, that we were neither in a state of peace nor war, was true, but it was also true that whenever any nation was disposed to break peace with us, we are ready to meet them with the yeomanry of the nation. It was our duty, he said, in time of peace, to retrench our expenses as much as possible, so that we may be the better prepared if an emergency should at any time arise.

The Chairman informed the House that the question was for the Committee to rise.

Mr. S. SMITH asked for what purpose the Committee should rise? No more information could be got than they had at present. He was inclined to hope, that when the gentleman from New York considered the subject, he would vote against his own motion. This, he said, was not unfrequently the case. Long speeches were often made in favor of a measure by a member, who afterwards voted against the doctrine which he advocated. The gentleman talked of the yeomanry of the country, but he believed the troops would be wanted for the posts, which were to be taken possession of, and they must take possession of them for the security of the country; and would the gentleman's two regiments, the nominal number of which was one thousand men, but which was seldom more than eight hundred and fifty, be sufficient for all the posts? He believed not. Let us, said he, proceed with the business; let us determine what the Military Establishment shall be, and not postpone the business from day to day.

Mr. HARTLEY wished the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEARBORN,] who was possessed of information on the subject, would state it to the Committee. Upon the best information he could get, he was certain the present establishment would not be too large. How the gentleman from New York came to make the present motion, without further information, he was at a loss to know. They had heretofore charged another House with sacrificing the interests of the country, but he thought they should not fail to do so, if they did not vote a sufficient number of troops to occupy the posts we had lately got possession of. Instead of four regiments being too much, the select committee had recommended eight men to be added to each company. He hoped the motion would therefore be disagreed to.

Mr. VARNUM did not think it necessary for the Committee to rise, but it appeared necessary that they should be in possession of the calculations of the select committee, of the number of garrisons and of the men necessary for each. Except they had some information of this kind, they could not form a just opinion on the subject. It must be the desire, he said, of every gentleman, that the Military Establishment should be reduced as low as possible; but without the information he had mentioned, it would not be possible to have a correct idea on the subject.

Mr. READ observed, that gentlemen said we were at peace with the Indian tribes. Be it so, said he, and let the most effectual measures be taken to preserve the peace. The Indians, he said, had a very favorable opinion of Continental troops; they considered them as their safeguard. Perhaps they were a little jealous of the militia. It was a measure of policy to keep up the Continental troops. They might prevent the Indians from injuring the frontier inhabitants, or they them. He did not think it would be prudent to reduce the Military Establishment.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he saw by the report of the committee, that they proposed to add eight men to a company; the motion of the gentleman from New York brought the discussion fairly before them, and they could determine whether eight men should be added to each company, or whether the four regiments should be reduced to two.

The select committee, he said, had brought forward no estimates. The chairman of that committee [Mr. S. SMITH] had said, that it was not possible to obtain information of the number of men to pay, or where they were at this time; but, if this information could not be obtained, he was sure that it was possible that the number of posts might be told, and the number of troops required for each. When they had such information before them, they would be able, he said, to determine whether the Military Establishment ought to be reduced or increased.

In order to obtain this information, he wished the Committee to rise; but if the select committee thought none could be obtained—that the Secretary of War cannot, or will not, for some reason not to be communicated, give any particulars on the subject, if he had no further information, he should vote for the motion of the gentleman from New York. And if the gentlemen of the committee have no more, and can get no more information, it would be best to go on to a conclusion of the business.

The motion for the Committee to rise was put and negatived—55 to 29.

Mr. DEARBORN said, it was not in the power, he believed, of the Secretary of War, to give just information as to the number of posts to be garrisoned, or the number of men to be placed in each. It appeared that a very general discretion had been given to the Commander-in-Chief. He had made such arrangements as he thought proper; but having died on his way, there had not been the information transmitted to the War Office which otherwise would have been there.

The select committee, for their own satisfaction, with such assistance as they could get, had made a calculation of the number of posts, and the men which would be requisite for each. The posts in their contemplation were Oswego, Niagara, Presqu' Isle, Detroit, Miami, Michilimackinac, a post near Lake Erie, a post not far from the mouth of the Illinois, at the Natchez, a post a little below the river Ohio, frontier of Tennessee, frontier of Georgia; Fort Washington, on the river Ohio; a small post near Fort Pitt, at Pittsburgh; and the fortifications and harbors of the seacoast.

The estimate of the garrisons necessary for these posts was mere matter of opinion, and every gentleman could form his own. It was his opinion that the number requisite for all these places would be about the number of the present establishment, the cavalry excepted. At the Natchez he believed there would be occasion for a very considerable garrison, as there were a number of citizens there, lately subjects of Spain, who could, at a short notice, raise a militia of eight hundred men.

Mr. D. said, although he had been in favor of a small number of men and for a small number of garrisons, yet he was inclined to believe that the number of troops remaining, after the cavalry was deducted, would not be greater than our present circumstances required. He was of opinion, however, that if the established corps be kept full and the posts established, and more opportunity was had of knowing what was necessary, perhaps there might be a possibility of reducing the number with propriety; but he could not say at present there would be too great a number, and should, therefore, be against reducing them.

It would be important for gentlemen to agree what number of men was necessary for each garrison, and consequently what number for the Military Establishment at large. He supposed, from the calculation of last year, the present number was considerably under three thousand. On the 1st of July last there were a few over three thousand; but, after the terms of men whose terms expired a few months afterwards, and from desertions and other circumstances, they did not, he supposed, exceed two thousand. But since the new organization took place a number of men and officers had not joined their corps, and until that took place no accurate accounts could be had. The saving of the expense of two regiments he acknowledged would be a considerable object, if it could be done with propriety; but he did not think it would be proper at this time to reduce them.

Mr. GALLATIN said, from what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, there could be no doubt but the present number of troops would be useful, and that it would be inconvenient to reduce them; but, upon the same ground, the number of troops might even be increased beyond the present establishment, when it was considered the number of posts which had come into our hands, and consequently the number of men required for them. Nor would he wish to reduce the Military Establishment, but for other reasons. He did not think, in the present situation of our foreign affairs, it would be at all prudent to reduce the artillery.

There was another consideration, however, that would induce him to vote for the present motion, or something like it: it was the reluctance which was shown in that House to raise the necessary revenue for the expenses of Government. Notwithstanding our situation had been fully stated, it was with immense difficulty any measure could be got through the House which was intended to raise revenue; they had even a right to conclude that the measure which was lately carried through the House for direct taxes, would not be agreed to when the detail of the bill should be brought in. He thought, therefore, they should confine themselves, not to what was useful, but to what was absolutely necessary.

No resolution had hitherto been brought forward to diminish the expense of any department. He would ask, in what department the expense could be diminished? The public engagements must be kept. The Civil List might, perhaps, give a saving of $20,000. They were called upon to increase instead of diminishing the expenses. There were other demands this year. There were only two objects, he believed, in which retrenchments could be made, which were the Military and Naval Establishments.

Mr. G. said, he had no doubt two thousand men would garrison our posts, &c., better than one thousand, but he thought one thousand might serve in our present circumstances. Amongst others, he did not think it necessary to have a post at Illinois or Michilimackinac, or to have a large one at the Natchez. As to the number of men necessary at the different posts, it was, as it had been stated, mere matter of opinion. They knew of no force required against the Indians, and a small body was, therefore, only necessary to be kept in garrison. With respect to other nations, he did not believe the British had any force on the frontiers. He, therefore, thought there was no occasion for a greater number than in 1792, which was 2,250 men; the number now was 3,160, which made a difference of 910, the number now moved to be struck out. However, he did believe that if they were to make the reduction it would be best done by degrees; and perhaps the best way would be not to make further enlistments when the time of men expired. But, if there was any doubt on the propriety of reducing the number of men, there could be no impolicy in striking out a number of officers.

From these considerations he believed it would be most prudent to make the proposed reduction, though, had it not been for the depressed state of our revenues, he should rather have been for increasing than for diminishing the present establishment.

Mr. DAYTON was much surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, after acknowledging that it would be useful to keep up the present establishment, and after admitting that a reduction of two regiments would be inconvenient to the service, should avow his support of the motion. That astonishment was not lessened upon hearing the reason that had been assigned for it, viz: a manifest reluctance on the part of the House to increase the revenues. If that member had represented accurately the disposition of the House as to revenue, he would have said, not that there was a reluctance to increase it, but more truly that there was a reluctance to increase it in the mode proposed and advocated by that gentleman, a tax on lands. Mr. D. said, that he himself, for one, had admitted the necessity of a further augmentation, but in common with many other members, he had expressed his unwillingness to resort to direct taxation, until the less exceptionable means of raising money by indirect taxes had been tried and exhausted. As to the motion which went to reduce the infantry from 2,000 to 1,000 men, he could not believe there was any probability of its succeeding, as both the public service and the general economy forbade it. The member from Massachusetts had enumerated many posts, and some very considerable, where it would be requisite to support garrisons, and others might be added to the list. The frontier of Georgia, Oswego, Fort Schuyler, West Point, the fortifications along the seacoast, and the different arsenals and magazines of arms, ammunition, &c., would equally require garrisons of soldiers.

Their present number of two thousand infantry and nine hundred artillerymen and engineers, would not be found more than sufficient for the service, especially when it was considered that the casualties of desertion and sickness which prevailed to a certain extent in every army, must also be guarded against, by increasing the establishment beyond the numbers which upon strict calculation might be adjudged to be necessary. Escorts also were indispensable in all cases of transportation from one part of their wilderness to another, and more especially when owing to want of water-communication, or an unexpected lowness of the streams, or to the obstructions from ice, they were compelled to transport their supplies by land. The reasoning which he adduced when the reduction of the cavalry was in question, would here apply with greater strength, because the necessity of keeping up some regiments of infantry was admitted by all. To discharge the regular troops, and to be obliged, as heretofore, to supply their place with militia, would be found to be profusion rather than economy.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] had used the only solid argument for reducing the Military Establishment, viz: the unwillingness of the House to provide revenue. It was a solid argument. But, he said, it was necessary for them to provide for all the wants of the country; it was necessary to afford protection to our frontier, and, after they had provided that protection, he trusted that House would not be so lost to its duty as to fail in providing revenue.

From the Civil List, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had observed there could be little reduction; no saving but from the Military Establishment; but this might be made without any reduction. The Major and his Staff, which were proposed to be struck out, would be a saving of upwards of $11,600; the light dragoons were $51,000 or $52,000; the rations, calculated at 20 cents, might now be obtained at 17 cents, which would lessen the charge $42,000; the Quartermaster's department was now $250,000, but now it might be reduced to $100,000; but, if estimated at $150,000, there would be a saving of $100,000; the carting, at $50,000, would not now be one-half. The Naval Department for the present year was calculated upon twelve months, when it was scarcely possible, from the state of the frigates, that they would be fit for more than four months' service.

The whole of these items made a sum of $403,000; to which he believed might be added a saving in the Civil List of $62,000. The Mint Establishment he did not think necessary, though it might flatter our vanity, and $25,000 might be saved from that source. The savings he had mentioned in the Military Establishment might be much more, because any loss on account of the contract would fall upon the contractors and not upon Government. But he trusted they should not make deductions in the establishment which might put the Government itself into jeopardy. With respect to the suggestion of striking out officers, he would rather have skeletons of regiments, which might be at any time filled up; for he believed more men were lost for want of proper officers than by the sword.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] that though a greater number of men might be necessary, yet it was necessary they should be lessened on account of the unwillingness of that House to provide revenue, had not been invalidated by what had fallen from the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DAYTON]; for, though that gentleman had strongly opposed direct taxes, he had offered no substitute for them. Indeed, none had been offered except that proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] and he seemed to have grown lukewarm in its support. And was it to be expected, he said, that when permission to bring in a bill on the subject had only been obtained by a majority of ten votes, when the passage of the plan for a direct tax had been so difficult in that stage of it, was it not to be supposed that there was great hazard of its passing? And, if so, was it not incumbent upon the House, lest additional revenue should not be provided, to make every saving in their power? He believed it was. He did not wish to put Government in jeopardy, but he thought they were called upon to save every shilling in their power. He hoped they should go further with respect to the Navy, than had been proposed by the gentleman from Maryland. He had contemplated four months' service of the frigates; but he hoped they should have none at all, since it would be found that more money was now wanted to complete the frigates than was proposed at first, as necessary for the building of them. He hoped, therefore, they would not at present be proceeded with.

Mr. CRAIK said, he had not intended to have spoken on the present occasion; but when he heard arguments against fixing a Military Establishment necessary for our security, founded on a supposed unwillingness in the House to grant revenue, he could not be silent. He believed the opinion entertained of it at House with respect to revenue could not be extended to the people. He was confident they were willing to afford a sufficient revenue for every necessary purpose of Government, and he trusted that House would also be found to be so too. Indeed, he did not think there was ground for the disgraceful opinion which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] had formed with respect to the reluctance of the House to grant revenue.

They had discussed the means of raising revenue, and seemed only to differ in opinion about the mode of doing it. The people who sent them there were able and willing to pay whatever should be found to be necessary, and he hoped the want of revenue would not be urged as a reason for not doing what they were convinced it was necessary to do.

If this principle was adopted, he said, it might be extended to every measure brought forward this session. He hoped, therefore, it would not be countenanced. If the Military Establishment was necessary our interest required it should be made sufficient, and it would be an injury to the Union not to make it so. He trusted they should do it, and he was not afraid that the money would not be found. He did not believe this country to be in a state of bankruptcy, but that it was equal and willing to pay every necessary expense of its Government.

Mr. DAYTON said, that if there was a single trait of candor in the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia and applied to him, then he was ignorant of the real meaning of the word, and he knew not what language and what conduct merited a different appellation. It was more than uncandid, it was cruel to upbraid him with not having done what he had no opportunity, consistently with the rules of the House, to have done. Every member, Mr. D. said, who had held a seat there only for a few hours, must know that being in the chair he had it not in his power to offer any propositions to the House to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the subject of further revenues, as had been their regular course of proceeding. In Committee of the Whole, where alone he could make any motion, it would be recollected that no opening had been afforded him; for the first resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in favor of a land tax was under discussion, and it would have been a violation of their rules of order to have offered any other as a substitute. It would be remembered, also, that the moment that proposition was decided, the Committee of the Whole rose and reported, thus postponing to a future day the consideration of any other resources. It was also possible, Mr. D. said, that if there had been an opportunity to present any system of his own, it might have been useless and unnecessary until that offered by the gentleman from South Carolina had been discussed and decided. Why, he asked, should he be charged with silence or forbearance in such pointed terms by the gentleman from Virginia, when it was well known to every member, that they were enjoined upon him by the duties of his station, and the rules of decorum?

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, he paid great respect to the opinions of every gentleman in that House; but he must think for himself on the present occasion. Was this people, he asked, to be supported by a few regular troops? No: whilst the yeomanry, and the people in general, delighted in the Government, they would always be ready to rise as one man in support of it. Let the people have peace, and acquire property, said he, and they will defend themselves. The late insurrection, beyond the mountains, had proved this; and this would continue to be the case whilst they were well governed. What need was there then to rely upon regular troops?

At a time when they were about to tax the people, it was necessary to reduce this article of expense.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, if he had been convinced the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] had not had an opportunity of bringing forward any proposition as a substitute for the direct tax, which he had opposed, he certainly should not have charged him with having failed to do it. But he thought it was possible for him to have done it; if he was mistaken in point of form, he must stand corrected. He did not mean any thing uncandid with respect to that gentleman.

Mr. SWANWICK did not conceive that the question of revenue had any thing to do in the present business. The question was, whether they should have four or two regiments of infantry? Not being a military man, he did not feel himself very competent to decide on the present question. Whatever disposition, however, might have been shown on a former occasion, of an unwillingness to raise revenue, he trusted they should grant liberally and cheerfully what was necessary for the defence of our frontiers; and when they came to be upon the subject of raising revenue, he trusted they should be impelled by the same necessity—the necessity of doing what they were convinced was right—to grant what appeared to be necessary. He thought there was no way of raising this revenue but by direct taxes; other gentlemen thought differently; but raised, additional revenue must be; for, if they made these grants, and there was not money in the Treasury to pay the expense, they could only be carried into effect so far as the funds would go; and gentlemen would therefore take this consequence upon themselves when revenue came under consideration. The question now was, whether they should have four regiments or two? He thought the latter number was too small. He had heard of the power of the militia; but he did not know whether it was prudent to make frequent calls upon the militia, and by that means put the country to unnecessary expense. If it were not, it was proper there should be a permanent force to prevent the necessity of such calls.

Whenever the subject of taxation came up, Mr. S. said, he trusted they should determine upon some permanent source of revenue; for if gentlemen adopted such as were not so, they would have to be responsible for the consequences.

Mr. GALLATIN said, his colleague [Mr. SWANWICK] had, in one respect, put the question on its true ground, though in another point he was mistaken, viz: where he said, that if the House voted for a certain number of men, and their funds should fall short, the money could be applied no further than it would go, and their object would be defeated. On the contrary, Mr. G. said, if they voted a greater number of men than the revenue was found equal to pay, the same thing would be done which had been done heretofore—anticipations would be obtained. But the question was upon its true ground when he said, that if they voted a number of men, they stood pledged to increase the revenue in order to meet the expense. He did not think the gentleman from New Jersey was correct in his remarks upon what he had said.

Mr. G. said, when he was up before he had observed, that there was a reluctance to raise additional revenue, there having been a bare majority in favor of direct taxes, and he believed there was as great a reluctance with respect to indirect taxes. They differed so much about the mode of raising revenue, that it would be difficult to raise revenue at all. The plan which that gentleman chose to call his plan, was founded upon a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which had been made in pursuance of an order of that House, on the subject of direct taxation. It was true he was in favor of the plan, but it was not his.

Finally, if they voted for continuing the present military force, they pledge themselves to furnish additional revenue, and except they agree to assist them in carrying into effect the plan which had been adopted, he believed no other would prove effectual.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, when he made the present motion, there was no information before the House. He wished, therefore, to have reduced the establishment to what it was in the year 1792, except he could hear some reason for making it greater. Previous to his motion, the gentleman from Massachusetts had not informed them what posts the committee had in contemplation to garrison. He confessed, the account he had since given seemed to show that more than one regiment was necessary; but, notwithstanding the observations of that gentleman, he was of opinion that the four regiments might be reduced to two, and the same number of men now employed might be put into those regiments, by which means all the force would be retained, and the expense lessened. He asked, if the posts to be kept up required all the officers in the present establishment, and whether 2,500 men required so many officers to command them? He believed not; and that a considerable saving would be made by putting all the men into two regiments.

When he made the motion, he said, it was principally with a view of getting information what number of troops was necessary, and where they were to be stationed. If, he said, there was supposed to be danger from our situation with respect to Europe, it was not necessary to increase troops which were intended to be employed only on the frontier. Surely not. If danger was apprehended from that quarter, they ought to turn their eyes to the sea-coast, and increase our artillery and engineers. Those gentlemen who thought a Navy necessary, might put to that object what was saved in the present. This, he said, would be much more prudent; since, standing on our own ground, we could defend ourselves against the whole world.

The question for reducing the four regiments of infantry to two was put and negatived, there being only 25 in favor of it.

The Committee then rose, and had leave to sit again.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

Mr. W. SMITH, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred a resolution of the 10th instant on dutiable articles imported, made the following report:

"The Committee of Ways and Means having taken into consideration the resolution of the House of the tenth instant, and a Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject therein contained, are of opinion:

"That the only articles, on which it will be expedient to impose an additional impost duty, are the following, viz: brown sugar, bohea tea, and cotton goods, not printed, stained, or colored: They accordingly submit the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That there be paid an additional duty of one half cent per pound on brown sugar, imported into the United States.

"Resolved, That there be laid an additional duty of two cents per pound on all bohea teas imported into the United States.

"Resolved, That there be laid an additional duty of two and a half per cent, ad valorem, on all cotton goods not printed, stained, or colored, imported into the United States."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 19, 1797.

SIR: I have now the honor to communicate my opinion on the subject referred to the Committee of Ways and Means by the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th of January, 1797.

If it shall be determined to increase the duties on importations, the following appear to be most safe and productive objects of revenue:

1st. SALT.—The existing duty is twelve cents upon each bushel of fifty-six pounds, and is much lower than what is imposed in many countries. There is no article of which the consumption is more uniform, nor of which an evasion of the duties would be more difficult: the natural value being inconsiderable, the importation requires and employs but little capital. Owing to the bulky nature of most of our articles of export, compared with those imported, and to the use of salt in lieu of ballast, it is introduced with a moderate charge for freight. All these circumstances render salt a fit object of revenue—as illicit importations are not to be apprehended—the extent to which the duty is to be carried, can be best determined by the committee. One cent on each fifty-six pounds of salt, will produce nearly thirty thousand dollars.

It will, however, be proper to readjust the bounties on the exportation of salted fish and provisions, and the allowances to vessels employed in the cod fisheries, to any augmentation of the duties on this article.

2d. BROWN SUGAR.—The duties on sugars will hereafter require revision; the rates, now imposed, are as follow: on brown sugar one and one half cent per pound; clayed sugar, three and one-half cents; lump sugar and refined, other than loaf sugar, six and one half cents; loaf refined sugar, nine cents. The duties are already so high, that most of the sugars, other than brown, which are imported, are also exported; the revenue is not therefore benefited by the importations. On the contrary, the public are exposed to the risk of collection, and responsible for the drawback. Illicit importations cannot be easily practised in respect to so bulky an article as sugar, and it is not likely that they have been practised, except in a small degree with respect to loaf refined sugar, the duty on which appears to be more than necessary to protect the business of domestic refiners.

To induce the consumption of any considerable quantities of clayed sugars, a reduction of the duty is necessary: and it is probable that some reduction would be favorable to the interest of the refiners; on this point, my information is however too imperfect to justify a positive opinion.

The present duty on brown sugar is less in proportion to the value of the article than that on most other West India productions. The average importations of brown sugar into the United States, during the years 1790, 1791, and 1792, were about twenty-two millions of pounds weight, which, therefore, may be considered as the quantity usually consumed in this country in each year. Since 1792, the quantities imported have been increasing. In the term of a year, prior to October 1st, 1795, the quantity imported exceeded sixty millions of pounds weight. During the greater part of the year 1796, sugar and coffee were the most beneficial, and in point of value, equal to any articles exported from the United States; considering the great quantities of these articles which have been imported, exceeding what were required for domestic consumption, their prices must have been determined by the state of foreign demand. These prices cannot therefore be stationary, and their vibrations have a tendency to embarrass commerce. These circumstances, and the risk to which the revenue is exposed on the importation, and also on the exportation of these articles, strongly admonish against excessive duties, and even dissuade from the imposition of such a duty, as under other circumstances might be safe and proper; nevertheless, an additional duty of one half cent per pound, on brown sugar, appears to be as eligible as any which can be suggested.

3d. TEAS.—The duties are at present as follow: on bohea tea, ten cents per pound; on souchong and other black teas, eighteen cents; on hyson, imperial, gunpowder, or Gomee tea, forty cents; and on other green teas, twenty-four cents. It has been stated, as the opinion of the Treasury, that the revenue would be probably benefited by a reduction of the higher and an increase of the lower rates of duty. An addition of two cents per pound to the duty on bohea tea, may be expected to produce twenty-five, or thirty thousand dollars.

Additional Duties—Military Establishment.

4th. COTTON MANUFACTURES NOT PRINTED, STAINED OR COLORED.—These are in very general use, and are commonly imported in valuable vessels, and by established merchants; they are for the most part bulky in proportion to their value, and with velvets and velvets, are subject only to the duty of ten per centum ad valorem. It may possibly be safe to place these articles in the class of merchandise, subject to the duty of twelve and a-half per centum ad valorem; but in this case, it is conceived, that adequate provision ought to be made for the protection of the business of printing cotton goods, which has been commenced in this country.

A variety of modifications of the existing duties might be proposed, but as their principal object would be the improvement of the system of collection, by means of a new classification of the articles, without intending thereby to produce any considerable augmentation of the revenue, they are at this time omitted. Materials for a report on this subject are preparing, but it cannot be completed during the present session.

With respect to a general augmentation of the duties on imports, I conceive it to be my duty to observe, that the average rate already imposed, exceeds sixteen per centum ad valorem; that the last advance of the duties was made at a time when the commerce of the United States was far from being in a natural state; that the temptations to illicit trade will increase in proportion to any reduction of the general rate of mercantile profit; and that a considerable reduction of this general rate, is to be expected whenever the present war in Europe shall terminate. On these grounds, I conclude, that present experience affords no certain data for an opinion respecting the permanent operation of the existing duties.

The domestic manufactures best established, are those of leather, iron, flax, potters' wares, including bricks, ardent spirits, malt liquors, cider, paper of all kinds, hats, stuff and silk shoes, refined sugars, spermaceti and tallow candles, copper, brass, and tin wares, carriages, cabinet wares, snuff, gunpowder, and salt.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

OLIVER WOLCOTT, JUN.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. WILLIAM SMITH,
Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The report was ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

TUESDAY, January 24.

The bill for enforcing the laws of the United States in the State of Tennessee, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. R. SPRIGG, jun., moved that the resolution which he laid on the table some days ago, relative to the act for regulating grants of lands for military services, &c., be referred to the committee to whom was referred a former resolution relative to the sale of lands Northwest of the river Ohio. It was so referred.

SALARIES OF LOAN OFFICERS.

Mr. HENDERSON offered a resolution to the following purpose, viz:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House, a list of the number of subscribing creditors to the United States, upon the books of the Loan officers, in each respective State in the Union where Loan offices have been established."

Mr. H. observed, that the reasons why he offered this resolution, were, that applications had of late been made, by several of the Commissioners of Loans of the United States, for an increase of salary, and he thought it was proper before a decision took place upon those applications, that the House should be possessed of the best information relative to the duties of the officers that could be obtained. He was of opinion, that when the salaries of the Commissioners of Loans were first established, Congress could have had no other rule by which to apportion them than the size and population of the States, or the sums expected to be loaned therein. He thought it could easily be made appear, that neither of these principles would produce an equitable apportionment of the salaries; the Commissioners in the larger States would have much the highest salaries, when, it is very probable, they might have the least share of business to transact, and on the other hand, the Commissioners of the smaller States would have the least salary, with perhaps the greatest proportion of duty. The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any and what amendments may be necessary to the act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. S. SMITH proposed an alteration in the introduction of the report, merely as to form, so as to make it have the proper phraseology of a resolution; which was agreed to. And being read—

Mr. CORT said, he rose only for the purpose of inquiry. He was satisfied there was no occasion for a Major General; nor did he know that there was any necessity for a Brigadier General. He wished to be informed on that subject.

Mr. VARNUM did not see the necessity of a Brigadier General. As the Army would be dispersed along the frontier in small detachments, he did not see the use of an officer of that grade.

Mr. DEARBORN said, this subject had undergone discussion last Winter. It was then urged, not only that a Brigadier General was necessary, but also a Major General, and was ultimately so carried. It appeared to him, indeed, that at least one general officer was necessary; and he should suppose, for the same reason which his colleague had urged against the measure, viz: the dispersedness of the situation of the troops; for, when their divided situation was considered, and that, in time of peace, there was less reason to expect a strict attention to discipline and economy, there would scarcely be a possibility of keeping them in order, without an officer of respectable rank, who would have it in his power to overlook the whole, to know the state of each garrison, and to make strict returns with respect to military regulations; and, without such a provision, everything relative to the Army would get into disorder. Instead of this officer being an expense to the United States, he believed he would, in the end, prove a great saving to them by taking care that no abuses existed in the service. It was said that the Majors could do the duty as well as a general officer; but was it not reasonable and natural to expect bickerings amongst officers of the same grade; and that there would not be the same promptness in obeying the orders of one of this rank, as there would be in obeying the commands of a superior officer? Persons acquainted with military affairs knew the necessity there was for subordination in an army. He thought it not necessary to say much on the subject; but he thought the well-being of the troops required that a Brigadier General should be retained in the service.

Mr. HARTLEY said, he was one of those who were in favor of retaining the Major General last session; but, from a principle of economy, the select committee had recommended a repeal of that part of the act which related to the Major General and his staff, by which means several thousand dollars would be saved; but, after they had dismissed the Major General, he was surprised to hear it proposed that the Brigadier should be struck out also. He had wished the Major General to have been retained; since, if there should be occasion to call out the Militia at any time, a Major General of Militia would not be subject to the command of a Brigadier General of the Army; and except some provision was made in the Militia bill, this circumstance would occasion disorder, if ever such a situation should happen. He hoped, therefore, for the reasons given by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEARBORN,] a Brigadier's staff would be retained.

Mr. DAYTON.—That as they had dispensed with the office of a Major General, as no longer necessary, it appeared to him advisable to agree to this part of the report of the committee which recommended the retaining of a Brigadier General in service. In addition to the reasons which had been urged by the members of that committee, and by other gentlemen who had preceded him, there were two which had not, he believed, been mentioned, and which might be thought to deserve consideration. If a Brigadier General should not be provided for, the command of the Army would of course devolve upon one of the Lieutenant Colonels commanding regiments. Such an event would rather tend to excite jealousy than to promote harmony throughout the different corps. The attachment of an officer for his own regiment was natural, and could not be suppressed or concealed, even when his seniority of rank entitled him to exercise a more enlarged command. If in such a situation he should be more prudent and cautious than men so circumstanced usually are, he could not, however, escape the suspicion and charge of his favoring his own to the disadvantage and injury of the other regiments. Those who might think themselves thus aggrieved, would make a common cause of their complaints against their temporary commander, and thus the Army would be embroiled. A commander, it was known, must necessarily have considerable latitude of discretion allowed to him, and no little share of patronage. He would generally direct what officers should be stationed at particular posts in higher or inferior commands. He could give preference to one corps over another, by ordering the distribution of clothing or pay, especially where a difference in quality or deficiency in quantity and sum, made it impossible for all to be equally served. In an officer attached to no corps exclusively, such things could be seen, and borne, with much less dissatisfaction and murmuring than in one who had a more intimate connexion and interest with a particular part. But that was not all; for, in the paying of the Army, the agency of a Brigadier General attached to no corps was essentially necessary. The regimental pay-abstracts were founded upon the company pay-rolls, and were required to be signed by the commanding officers of the regiments. The Commander-in-Chief, after having compared and checked those abstracts with the muster-rolls and official returns, was to issue an order for the payment of the money.

It would be truly absurd to have the same officer, in quality of Commander-in-Chief, checking and passing upon his own returns for pay as Colonel of a regiment. There would neither be economy nor security in the expenditures of public moneys under such arrangements.

Mr. BALDWIN said, he recollected when this subject was under consideration, some member said it was indisputably necessary that the Army should have a Brigadier General; it did not then appear so to him. Since the war was over, and even suppose it continued, he thought it being entirely an interior one, they might do away the form which had been of regiments, and convert the whole force into a legionary form, and by degrees an army form also; and let the form be a detachment of companies strung along the frontier. He thought there could be no advantage by even an army form; for the vast extent of two thousand miles frontier to guard with few men as possible, would render this distribution necessary. The force, he said, was twenty-six companies, and he supposed there were no more than twenty-six posts to occupy them; these would be distributed from the Southern frontier to the lakes, and some on the sea-coasts; then, while they remained so extensive, what use could there be of a Brigadier General? Where could he so well correspond from, and conduct affairs, as the Seat of Government? And here Mr. B. thought he would be almost useless. Here we have the War Department, the Commissary of Stores, and the Accountant General, each of which, if clothed with military commissions, could effect any business that officer would have to do, and he did not see the necessity of a Brigadier General having the settlement of the business mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DEARBORN] as his being clothed with a military commission would not make him more fit to take cognizance

Military Establishment.

of what related to the troops, than the above stationed officers; nor did he see how he could visit the different posts in the manner proposed by that gentleman. If a part of these troops were distributed on the lakes, and another part on the Southern frontier, he could not tell where the Brigadier General could have his office. It could not be at any of the posts, and therefore he supposed it must be at the Seat of Government.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he was on the committee of conference last session with the Senate, on the subject of the Major General. It was the opinion of the House of Representatives, that there should be a Brigadier only, because the number of troops, being four regiments of infantry, was a Brigadier's command. It was urged, on the part of the Senate, that the Major General was necessary for the purpose of taking possession of the posts, and it was therefore finally agreed that he should be retained until March next. At that time it was undetermined whether the Brigadier or Major General should go out of the service at that time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARTLEY] thought it necessary to keep up the Major General, because, if called out with the Militia, he would have the superior command of a Major General of Militia; but to strike out both the Major General and Brigadier General, would be to leave the Army without a head; and so far from such a measure being a measure of economy, it would prove destructive of economy. There was a great saving, Mr. S. said, by an officer commanding the whole; if it were otherwise, the Army would be disappointed.

If the gentleman from Connecticut, who made the motion, had been a military man, this motion, he thought, would not have been made; as a military man, Mr. S. declared, that such a measure would be attended with the most ruinous consequences.

Mr. COIT said he made no motion, but merely inquired for information.

Mr. HARTLEY said, the gentleman did not know the consequence of such a regulation; he did not know who would have the command. The present Brigadier General, he said, was a man of abilities and respectability, and it would be economy to keep him in the service.

The question for repealing that part of the act which relates to the Major General and his staff was put and carried—ayes 43, noes 32.

The two next resolutions were put and agreed to; and that for adding eight privates to each company being under consideration,

Mr. WILLIAMS thought this would be improper at the present time, as there was a proposition for lessening the number. This, he said, would augment it two hundred and fifty-six men. Each company now was composed of fifty-two privates, four corporals, four sergeants, and two officers; which made sixty-two: as he saw no need to make a larger augmentation, he thought this proposal wrong, and therefore hoped it would not be agreed to.

Mr. S. SMITH said, this was a question discussed in the select committee. It was argued, that if these men were added to the fifty-two, the complement of which each company is composed, they would be enough to answer all casualties by death, desertion, &c., so as always to keep up the full number. The expense of pay, clothing, &c., he had estimated at thirty-eight thousand dollars. The saving by striking off the cavalry was fifty-two thousand dollars, certain expenses of wagons, &c., not included in this estimate, tents and camp equipage, would be sixty thousand dollars. The addition of these eight men to a company would give two hundred and fifty-six men, in place of one hundred and four, at much less price. These would give an additional strength, at less expense than horse. Yesterday, Mr. S. said, he stated that the expense of two companies of horse was equal to a regiment of infantry, by which he meant the privates of a regiment, viz: four hundred and sixteen men. If he was understood differently, he wished this to be taken as a correction.

Mr. HARTLEY said, there was some difficulty with respect to this clause of the report. Some gentlemen thought the number of men sufficient already. He was of a different opinion; and as the horse were struck out, he thought the additional men necessary. He believed, without this addition, there would not be a sufficiency of troops to garrison the posts; and he had founded his opinion upon information from good authority. He should therefore vote in favor of the report.

Mr. DEARBORN said, the committee was not unanimous upon this clause of the report. He believed it unnecessary that these men should be added, and that the four regiments of artillery were fully equal to all the objects for which they were wanted: he would sooner vote for the reduction of a regiment than for this addition. He had endeavored to satisfy himself of the number of garrisons necessary to be kept up, and the men required for each. As to the casualties which it was said always happened amongst men, they could not be avoided; nor was it necessary to calculate within four or five men for a post; as, for instance, if fifty men were thought to be necessary for a post, if four or five died out of that number, it could not be supposed that those who remained would not be able to defend it. He should therefore be opposed to the resolution.

The question was put on the resolution, for adding eight men to a company, and negatived without a division.

The next resolution, advancing the pay of the officers, was agreed to without any opposition.

On the last resolution, for allowing Majors four rations per day,

Mr. S. SMITH said, that the subsistence of the Majors had, by mistake, been omitted in the act passed last session, and they had therefore introduced it here.

This was agreed to.

It was moved that the Committee rise; when Mr. HOLLAND said, before the Committee rose, he wished to add an amendment to the first section, after the word "repealed," "and that the four regiments of infantry be reduced to three."

It was desirable, he said, to reduce the establishment as much as possible. The Committee had determined not to reduce the infantry from four to two regiments; but though they did not think it right to make so great a deduction, he trusted they would agree to reduce them from four to three.

The question was put and negatived—ayes 37, noes 38.

The Committee then rose, and reported the resolutions, and the House took them up; when

Mr. GALLATIN proposed to amend the report, by introducing the amendment just negatived in the Committee of the Whole, viz: for reducing the infantry from four to three regiments, and desired the yeas and nays to be taken upon it. The yeas and nays were agreed to be taken.

Mr. HARTLEY said, they were some how or other in the habit of disorganizing. Last year the whole complexion of our Military Establishment was changed, and now it was to undergo another change. Last year the men and officers were appointed to each other; he hoped they should not become habitual disorganizers by adopting the present motion.

Mr. BUCK hoped it could not be said that he was a favorer of disorganization; but he did not see at present any necessity for keeping up the whole of the Military Establishment. Could the number of garrisons and of troops necessary for them be ascertained, he would cheerfully vote for the number wanted; but until that information was before them, being in time of peace, and not wishing to keep up more troops than were necessary, he should vote for the proposed reduction.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was of the opinion, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HARTLEY] that they were about to reduce disorganization to a system; and, unless they economized a little better, the whole Government would be disorganized. He was for economizing, in order to prevent that disorganization. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would prevail.

Mr. W. LYMAN said, if this were a time of profound peace, perhaps this question would carry a different aspect; but this country could not be said to be in a state of profound peace; for, though we were not in hostility, there were several nations in hostility to us. Was this, then, a time for reducing the Military Establishment? He thought not. It was very uncertain whether we should continue in a state of peace or not. Under this impression, and aided by the information which the select committee had given, he believed it was necessary to retain the whole of the establishment. The committee had stated the posts and the number of men required, and gave it as their opinion that the whole four regiments would be required. He was satisfied, and he believed the committee had retrenched the expense of the establishment as much as possible.

If it were profound peace, (as he had already said,) and there were no distant expectations of hostility from any quarter, he would agree to the amendment proposed. But, in the present state of things, he should vote for retaining the four regiments, as he believed it would prove a misfortune to the country, if the regiment proposed was done away.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if they were for a moment to suppose, for the sake of argument, that there was danger of a war from European nations, he would inquire how they should guard against it? Would it be by garrisoning the frontier? No, he believed not; and, therefore, from the arguments of the gentleman himself, he ought to reduce the number of infantry and increase that of the artillery. This, Mr. W. said, was his intention when he proposed to reduce the four regiments to two; for, if there was any danger it was on the sea-coast; therefore, to reduce the infantry and increase the artillery would be real economy.

Mr. PAGE said, if he had thought the amendment really economical, he might have voted for it; but as he believed it was quite the reverse, as the reduction of troops at the time that the number of posts were increased, and some posts were to be advanced far beyond any hitherto occupied, and out of the reach of reinforcements or succor, must necessarily endanger the loss of some posts, which would, without counting the loss of men, be found, in loss of stores, ammunition, and arms, an expensive circumstance. It had been said that the Indians could not take a fortified post, however weakly garrisoned; but this was a great mistake, for they took from the British in one day, under their leader, Pontiac, immediately after the war between Great Britain and France, every post they held, except Detroit and Fort Pitt. As to the state of peace we were in, said Mr. P., although he believed the Indians might at present recollect the circumstances which induced them to make peace with the United States, he said he did not rely on its continuance, so as to think it politic or economical to reduce the number of our troops, and to expose the remainder in distant posts, out of the reach of relief. Indeed, said he, I think it cruel to expose a small garrison in some of the intended posts, as the savages would attack them whenever caprice or avarice should prompt them. From motives of economy, said he, I opposed the first motions for raising an Army and holding posts on our frontiers, and then observed, that if we raised one regiment, we should soon be called on for another, and that if we began to establish posts, there would be no end to establishments; but having now established certain posts, he said he believed it would be politic and economical to take care of them and their garrisons.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH said, it did not appear that any garrison held last year had been abandoned this, and it was well known they had now a number of fresh garrisons on the Southern frontier; he therefore could see no propriety in reducing the four regiments to three.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, no one respected military characters more than him; but he thought, nevertheless, it would be a valuable thing to reduce the infantry from four to three regiments, which would make them more complete. It was his sincere wish that every private should be well accommodated and well paid. He surely wished that, and he could say that he wept after the hearse of any brave man who fell in the defence of his country, and would mingle tears with his relatives and friends. He knew we had many brave military characters. This he rejoiced in. And it would be remembered that it would be an easy matter to increase the troops, if it were at any time necessary, perhaps more easily than to reduce them; he was, therefore, for making the proposed reduction. In this case, he said, the best troops would be retained; and if any emergency should at any time arise, the brave yeomanry would come forward in aid of the military corps; and therefore, at this time, when our revenue was embarrassed, if the four regiments could be reduced to three, it would be a valuable purpose done for the people whom they served—it would but be their duty.

Military Establishment.

Mr. SWANWICK said, some gentlemen had, on this occasion, spoken of the danger of war; but if there was any danger of this kind, our infantry would not serve us. And yet, whilst gentlemen were ready to increase this department of our force, they were willing to do away the frigates. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] indeed, very different from his usual conduct, had said that he would carry the amount of the retrenchments in the Army to the Navy. On this occasion, he said, he joined in opinion with that gentleman; he thought they had already spent too much on land and too little at sea; and, therefore, in hopes that that gentleman and others would vote with him for the frigates when they should come under view, and because he thought it would answer them a much better purpose to have a number of sailors than so many troops, he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. S. SMITH hoped this motion would not obtain. The question had already been tried in Committee of the Whole, to reduce the infantry to two or three regiments, and both had failed; he trusted they would again fail. When the select committee had estimated that the four regiments would be necessary, and that the surplus would only be four companies, which it would be right to place in a proper situation to serve as a corps de reserve, which might be applied to in case of attack, he thought these attempts to reduce the number was extraordinary. He did not know whether it was the intention of gentlemen to strike out the officers of a regiment only; if this was their meaning, the saving would be very trifling indeed. He was apprehensive this idea of economy would carry them too far; for his part, he was not for the name of economy, when he was convinced it would not produce the effect. He found men, heretofore liberal in granting money, since direct taxes had been under discussion, were become very sparing. He was afraid, however, their fear of direct taxes would carry them too far.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, if he had discovered any difference of opinion among military gentlemen on this subject; if he had heard that any of the posts which had been proposed to be garrisoned were unnecessary, or that the contemplated number of men for each was too great, he should have been at a loss how to have voted; but when he had only heard, in support of the amendment, that our finances needed economy, he felt no embarrassment in giving it his direct negative. If the principle upon which the amendment was supported was true, it should be carried farther; if we were in profound peace, and economy were to be pursued, why not disband the whole establishment? For, if they admitted an Army of any kind to be necessary, they would certainly admit that it ought to be sufficiently large for the purposes for which it was wanted. They had, he said, appointed a committee on the subject, who had informed them of the garrisons necessary, and of the troops proper to be placed in them, by which it appeared that the whole four regiments would be wanted; and therefore he believed there would be no propriety in reducing the number on the ground of economy.

For his own part, Mr. S. said, he did not pretend to be a judge of military affairs; but he thought, when our posts were increased, the military for garrisoning them ought not to be decreased. A state of peace with the Indians, he believed, did not do away the necessity of a Military Establishment, because he believed that peace was only to be continued by the terror inspired by the garrisons.

He would take this opportunity of remarking upon what had fallen from his colleague, [Mr. GALLATIN,] who had said that he thought the four regiments necessary, but that on account of the unwillingness of the House to grant revenue, he would wish to reduce them. Mr. S. said, he believed the circumstances of this country to be such as were fully equal to all the expenses of Government; he believed the people were both able and willing to pay those expenses. Indeed, if there could be any reliance upon the decision of that House, there would be no doubt of revenue being found. If there was any unwillingness there, however, to find revenue, he believed there was none out of doors. There might, indeed, be objections to the mode of raising revenue, but he believed the people were ready to give what was necessary.

Mr. S. said, that when gentlemen agreed that the four regiments were necessary, it was their duty to vote for them, and to provide the means for paying them. It was not right to say, "We agree the men are wanted, but there will be found a difficulty in paying them, and therefore we will withhold our vote;" they ought to vote for the men, and afterwards provide the money. Such was his opinion, and he believed it to be the opinion of the people in general; he should, therefore, vote for retaining the present number of infantry.

Mr. PRESTON hoped this motion would not prevail. He voted yesterday for doing away the cavalry, but he had no idea of reducing the infantry, as he believed the present establishment necessary for the protection of the frontiers. It was true we were at peace, but it was also true that it was with a faithless people, who, when their dispositions or wants urged them to it, would violate the peace, and destroy the frontier inhabitants.

He said, he had not been a little surprised that the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. GALLATIN,] who lived on the frontiers, and were consequently subject to the incursions of the Indians, should have advocated the reduction of the present establishment. The gentleman from New York had said he lived within thirty miles of them, but that he depended upon the yeomanry for support, and was not afraid. There was magnanimity in this declaration; but suppose these Indians were to come out upon him with hostile intentions, he perhaps might call for assistance when it was too late, and when the defenceless inhabitants of the frontier had met destruction.

Mr. P. said, he could not help being surprised at the reason given for the proposed reduction of the present number of infantry, viz: to retrench the public expenses. He should be glad to meet gentlemen on the ground of a retrenchment of the public expenses; he loved economy, but he hated that little, contracted economy, which saved pence at the expense of pounds.

He hoped they should not be afraid of doing their duty, because there was a degree of unpopularity attached to all taxes; but if they would fix a permanent source of revenue, they must not go to cents and half-cents on sugar or five-penny bits on salt, but to a land tax, the only object upon which they could look with certainty for supplies.

He should not, however, do as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and one of his colleagues [Mr. GALLATIN and Mr. NICHOLAS] had done, because there was a reluctance in the House to vote for revenue, decline from voting for the present establishment. He would do what he conceived to be his duty, and let others do what they pleased. He would therefore vote for the present establishment, trusting that no gentleman, convinced of the necessity of the Military Establishment, and that further revenue was necessary to support that and the other expenses of Government, would withhold his assent to some effectual system for raising it; and that if it were found indirect taxes would not answer the purpose, direct taxes would be resorted to. Take what mode of taxation they might, difficulties would present themselves. These were unavoidable; but because difficulties occurred, he trusted they would not shrink from the business; to do that would be to show an imbecility of conduct which he trusted that House would never show.

Our constituents, said he, know as well as we do that Government is necessary, or we should not be here; they know expense must be incurred; that that expense must be raised by taxes, and be collected from themselves. Shall we, then, exclaimed he, be afraid to meet them, from having done our duty? All we shall have to do, added he, will be to show the justice of the demand, and he ventured to say their constituents would have patriotism enough cheerfully to pay it.

It was a fact—he acknowledged it was a melancholy one—that there was necessity, from the present uncertain state of our commerce, of fixing upon some permanent revenue, which should be equal to the purposes of peace or of war. It was proper to guard against all possible circumstances, since we could not always expect to be free from the calamities to which all other nations are subject. Indeed, a day did not pass but they heard from the newspapers of depredations being committed upon our commerce, not only by the British, but by the French and Spaniards; and it was not to be supposed that our merchants would continue their commerce, notwithstanding their mad thirst of gain, under such risks. It was necessary, therefore, to find a substitute for at least a part of the revenue which had heretofore been drawn from that source, or they should not be able even to pay the four regiments of infantry they were then about to agree to keep up. He should, however, consent to do this, and trust in the House to provide revenue when that subject should come before them.

Mr. THATCHER did not see what the present question had to do with revenue. The question was not how many troops the United States could support in time of war, but how many were necessary in the present state of things. As far as this subject was connected with fighting, he knew but little about it, nor did he ever wish to know more than he did. But it was a singular circumstance, he said, that ever since 1791 till the late peace, there had been war on a frontier of five hundred miles extent, during which time the English had had possession of the posts on that frontier, and this war had been supported, and the Indians brought to a peace, by nearly the same number of troops which were now in pay. The reduction since that time had been very small. It was now a time of peace, not even the least suggestion had been offered that any rupture with the Indians was likely to take place, yet gentlemen seemed unwilling to reduce the establishment. During the war, the English had possession of forts within our territory, which they had now given up, and we had taken possession of them, and it could not be considered other than extraordinary that we should have occasion for nearly the same troops now as during that war. Some of the posts which we had obtained being garrisoned, would do away the necessity of garrisoning others. He therefore supposed there would not be occasion to have troops in all the posts which had been mentioned.

But gentlemen had hinted there was danger of war from another quarter. But if they supposed France or England intended to wage hostilities against us, it was idle to talk of one regiment of infantry; they should have twenty regiments. This was, therefore, not the ground of the present question. All that was necessary to be considered was, what number of troops was necessary to garrison the frontier posts? believing, as he did, that three regiments would be sufficient, he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. S. SMITH said, if it were really a fact that as many men were in pay now as were in service during the Indian war, he would agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that the number was too large. [Mr. THATCHER denied having said the number was equal, but that there had been little reduction.] Mr. SMITH said, the number of men then in the service was 5,000, but at present the number contemplated was 3,000. The regulations made last year contemplated the taking in all those who were in service on the first of July last; and gentlemen would recollect that the artillery had been raised in consequence of an apprehension of war with Great Britain, and were meant for the service of the sea-coast; there were, therefore, only two thousand for the service of the frontier.

Military Establishment.

[H. OF R.]

The gentleman had said some of the posts would be unnecessary, but had not said which. He had been told that a cordon of posts had been so formed as to prevent supplies being conveyed to the Indians—from which cordon the inner posts were excluded. In doing this, they had contemplated the security of the trade to be carried on by the United States on the frontier. If the United States were not able to keep up 1,500 men, they were in a bad situation, indeed. That such an opinion should be entertained in that House, their constituents would not believe, nor did he believe they would thank them for such economy: it was no economy. The last year they had declared what the establishment should be, and now they were proposing to undo what they had then done; by which means they should throw a number of deserting men upon the world, without perhaps the means of subsistence. Was this the way, he asked, in which meritorious soldiers were served in other countries? No; they had half-pay given them, and this, he said, ought to be the case everywhere, and not that, after fighting our battles, and perhaps receiving wounds in the service which incapacitated them from labor, they should be thrown upon the country, desolate. Mr. S. hoped that they should show that there was some degree of fixedness in their conduct. The business was well settled last session. They had only four small regiments to support, and he trusted they should support them, as he believed them necessary.

Mr. HARRISON said, that if the Chairman of the committee had informed them of the number of posts to be occupied, and the men required for garrisoning them, and had shown that the whole four regiments were wanted, he would have voted for them; but not having done this, he should vote for the proposed reduction. That gentleman himself, Mr. H. said, had shown that three regiments would be sufficient; for he had said a certain portion of these men should be kept as a corps de reserve. Where, he asked, would he keep them in reserve? He believed the cordon of posts would be too distant for any supplies to reach them in time, in case of an attack from the Indians.

Gentlemen blamed the present economy, and condemned the proposed system of direct taxes; but who, he asked, had created the necessity for one or the other? Not those who advocated either, but those who opposed them. And now, when they were called upon to provide revenue for defraying the increased expenses of Government, and to discharge a part of the Public Debt, they shrink from the task.

Where, said Mr. H., is this regiment to be placed? It was not to be in garrison, and he did not know where else it could be to any purpose; so that they were about to fix a taxation to grind their constituents for no purpose. Who were the best judges of the wants of the frontiers? Those who lived on them, surely; and they had said there was no necessity for so large a body of men. To keep them, would, therefore, be a lavish use of public money; but if the money, instead of being so applied, were appropriated towards the reduction of the Public Debt, every citizen in the Union would be satisfied. This consideration, and the gentleman's own showing, induced him to vote for the proposed reduction.

Mr. HOLLAND said, if the committee had stated to them the number of posts, and the men necessary to be placed in them, they might have formed a judgment whether the four regiments would be wanted or not; but without that information, they were under the necessity of acting in the dark. The gentleman from Maryland asked if the United States were not able to keep up the troops in question? One thing he knew: that the United States had been able to keep up their expenses, equal to all the revenue which could be collected. But that gentleman seemed to be much affected with the situation of the officers, who would be thrown out of service, if the amendment should prevail. He did not know that they were under any tie to keep them longer than wanted, and he doubted not that officers would always be found when wanted. The compensation, he believed, was fully equal to the service, and that it was a matter of favor to obtain such situations.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SINGREAVES] had said, the military gentlemen were all in favor of retaining the four regiments. He was at a loss to know how that gentleman came at his knowledge on that subject. It was his opinion, the Army system was a bad one, and that it should be reduced as much as possible.

He believed they were likely to have peace on the frontiers. The Indians, he said, would not commit depredations near a post, but at a distance; because they knew, if they attempted a post, they would bring the force of the United States upon them, which would involve them in war. It was well known, the Indians were more afraid of the militia than of regulars, and that therefore the former was the best defence against them. Not having any information, he should vote in favor of the amendment.

Mr. COOPER said it might be of use to gentlemen to be informed of the number of men which the British had kept in their several posts on the frontiers. He said he had obtained the number. He then mentioned what were in the different posts. The total number was 1,245 men.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, our troops were reduced last year to 3,000 men. Now, it appeared, from what had fallen from a gentleman on the committee, their number was 2,500 men. These would be sufficient for three regiments; therefore, the same number of men would be kept up, as if the four regiments were retained. With respect to the number of officers, we had, he said, 32 companies of infantry, and 16 companies of artillery and engineers. If the reduction proposed were agreed to, there would be left 130 officers. If these were not sufficient for the garrisons, he did not know anything of the business. But the gentleman from Maryland said, the saving would not be so much as had been said. How he estimated he could not tell; but, he believed, that, by putting the same number of men in three regiments which were now in four, would be a considerable saving.

With respect to the frontier, he said, we had no defence in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, or Vermont, nor at New York, except at Oswego, Niagara, and Detroit. This, he said, was a distance of between five and six hundred miles. Nor did he think they were necessary, though there were several tribes of Indians in that quarter. Nor did he think a small post any defence against Indians; if they were to prove troublesome, the militia was the best defence.

He did not see the use of keeping officers when we had no occasion for them. Let us, said he, do equal justice. If they were not wanted, he had no objection to giving them a gratuity, but he had an objection to keeping them in pay when the service did not require them. He hoped the amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. GALLATIN said he would not have brought the question once more before the House had he thought the reduction of expense a trifling one; if he had not thought that the Military Establishment was the most expensive—he had almost said the most extravagant—establishment in the Government. Yet, he said, they were told they had no right to think upon the subject, because military men told us they were wanted.

Mr. G. said, if he understood the gentlemen of the committee, it was a mere matter of opinion as to the number of men to be kept up; and if it was matter of opinion, it was not strictly necessary, because if necessary it was no longer a matter of opinion.

As to the reduction which had heretofore taken place, notwithstanding what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THATCHER] was pretty nearly right. If his memory was right, when the subject was last under discussion, the number of men in actual service was 3,500, though the nominal establishment was 6,000. It was then concluded that all the men which remained on the 1st of July should be retained in the new establishment; which, as the time of about 400 would then expire, left 3,100 effective men, or thereabout. So that the reduction was more nominal than real.

Mr. G. wished to know, if any reason could be given why we should have more troops now than before the Indian war? He meant exclusively of the artillery and engineers, which was meant for the sea-coast.

He then mentioned some posts where he thought there would be no necessity for garrisons: It was well understood, he said, that the possession of the posts lately held by the British would curb the Indians. He hoped they should have some benefit from the British Treaty, and if there was any one, it was to be secure, so far as related to the posts occupied by the British, without being obliged to keep up so large a number of troops as before.

As to the idea suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PRESTON] that the present was a saving of pence, to prove it was something more, he would call the attention of the House to the expense of the different years, from 1791 to 1795. The years 1790 and 1791, he said, we were in much the same situation as now. There was actual hostility at the time, but it was not so serious as afterward. In 1790, he found the expense was $291,000; in 1791, $520,000; in 1792, which was the year in which General St. Clair was defeated, $974,000; in 1793, $1,120,000; and in 1794 and 1795, after deducting the expense of the Western insurrection, and harbors, from 1,700,000 dollars to 1,800,000 dollars; in 1796, 1,300,000; and that estimated for 1797, 1,200,000 dollars.

If this expense, he said, was compared with the general expenses of the Government, it would be found to be five-sixths of the whole; and, therefore, if they meant to make any retrenchments, this was the object in which they should attempt them.

If the average expense of 1790 and 1791 was compared with that of 1796 and 1797, the former would be found about 400,000 dollars, while the latter was from 1,200,000 to 1,300,000. Surely, then, there was room for retrenchment.

It was true, as had been suggested by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] that many retrenchments might take place in the Quartermaster's and some other departments. He should certainly support him in those deductions, when they should come under consideration; but an intention of saving in detail ought not to prevent them, he said, from saving in the principal.

That gentleman was, however, mistaken with respect to his saving in the Naval Establishment; for, supposing the frigates would not have more than four months' pay, he had omitted to take notice that there was yet required to finish the frigates about 200,000 dollars.

Considering, therefore, that under the head of the Military Establishment the principal deductions must be made, he hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. HARTLEY again requested gentlemen to consider that honesty was the best policy, as the old adage says; and while we pay proper respect in our conduct to our officers, they will not forget us when calling for their service. He would candidly ask gentlemen whether, the last session, the Army was not put on a Peace Establishment? The Executive had now ordered the Army to be organized upon that order, and now for a counter order to take place almost before the old one was established, were they free from alarm, he would ask? After the posts are all occupied, and there should appear a surplus, then would be the time to disband.

Military Establishment—Regulation of Pilots.

[H. OF R.]

The question was then taken by yeas and nays for the reduction of the four regiments to three, and carried—yeas 44, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS.—Theodorus Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thos. Blount, Richard Brent, Nathan Bryan, Daniel Buck, Dempsey Burges, Samuel J. Cabell, Thomas Claiborne, John Clopton, Isaac Coles, Jesse Franklin, Nathaniel Freeman, jr., Albert Gallatin, Christopher Greenup, William B. Grove, Wade Hampton, Carter B. Harrison, John Hathorn, Jonathan N. Havens, James Holland, Andrew Jackson, George Jackson, Matthew Locke, Samuel Lyman, Samuel Maclay, Nathaniel Macon, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Anthony New, Robert Rutherford, John S. Sherburne, Thompson J. Skinner, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, Richard Sprigg, jr., William Strudwick, John Swanwick, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Joseph B. Varnum, Abraham Venable, John Williams, and Richard Winn.

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Theophilus Bradbury, Gabriel Christie, Joshua Coit, William Cooper, William Craik, James Davenport, George Dent, Abiel Foster, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, Andrew Gregg, Roger Griswold, John Hancock, Robert Goodloe Harper, Thomas Hartley, Thomas Henderson, John Wilkes Kittera, William Lyman, Francis Malbone, Frederick A. Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Alexander D. Orr, John Page, Josiah Parker, John Patton, Elisha R. Potter, Francis Preston, John Reed, Samuel Sitgreaves, Nathaniel Smith, Samuel Smith, William Smith, Richard Thomas, Mark Thompson, John E. Van Allen, and Peleg Wadsworth.

Mr. MURRAY made a motion to restore the two companies of light dragoons. When the motion to strike out was agreed to, it was contemplated, he said, to retain the four regiments of infantry. Now one regiment had been struck out, there might be gentlemen who would wish to have the dragoons kept up. He owned he was of that opinion.

Mr. SITGREAVES called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLLAND thought there was no necessity for these troops. Georgia was secure, and had soldiers in garrison, as well as the other frontiers. He supposed the member from Georgia voted for the reduction, for the purpose of having those horse kept.

Mr. MILLEDGE said he was still of the same opinion as before, of the great necessity of the dragoons being kept up on that frontier. If posts were necessary there, he said, dragoons were also necessary. He knew it would be a great expense, and he was as much as possible for retrenching expense, but not at the hazard which a want of proper security in that quarter would run. If any disturbance with, or inroads from, the Indians in that quarter should occur, what would give that expeditious check which dragoons could, when our posts are 25 miles asunder, and our frontier extends 300 miles? It was well known that we might be one day upon the best terms, and perhaps the next at war. From these ideas, he would leave gentlemen to judge whether they did not require expeditious movements.

Mr. GALLATIN said he knew not how a motion of this kind could be made, when the question was put on the words as amended.

The SPEAKER explained.

The question was then put to restore the dragoons, and lost—yeas 18, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS.—Abraham Baldwin, William Cooper, William Craik, James Davenport, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, Robert Goodloe Harper, Thomas Hartley, John Wilkes Kittera, Francis Malbone, John Milledge, F. A. Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, John Page, Samuel Sitgreaves, and William Smith.

NAYS.—Theodorus Bailey, Thomas Blount, Theophilus Bradbury, Richard Brent, Nathan Bryan, Daniel Buck, Dempsey Burges, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, John Clopton, Joshua Coit, Isaac Coles, George Dent, William Findley, Abiel Foster, Jesse Franklin, Nathaniel Freeman, jun., Albert Gallatin, Christopher Greenup, Roger Griswold, William B. Van Allen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Joseph B. Varnum, Abraham Venable, Peleg Wadsworth, John Williams, and Richard Winn.

And then, the main question being taken, that the House do agree to the said first resolution, amended to read as follows:

“Resolved, That all such parts of the act, entitled ‘An act to ascertain and fix the Military Establishment of the United States,’ which relate to the light dragoons, ought to be repealed, and that the four regiments of infantry be reduced to three:”

It was resolved in the affirmative.

The second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth resolutions being read, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. PARKER, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, and Mr. DEARBORN, do prepare and bring in the same.

REGULATION OF PILOTS.

The House, on motion of Mr. DENT, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the regulation of pilots within the bay and river of the Chesapeake; when

Mr. SWANWICK briefly stated the intention and operation of this bill, which was to give equal privileges to Virginia and Maryland pilots, with respect to bringing in vessels into the Chesapeake. This application was founded on this circumstance, viz: that Maryland pilots went out further to sea than Virginia pilots to meet vessels, and were frequently called on to pilot vessels belonging to Virginia, but not being allowed anything for this pilotage, the Virginia pilots taking possession of any vessel brought in by such a Maryland pilot into the Chesapeake, and receiving all the advantages of the pilotage. This practice had consequently had this effect: Maryland pilots, though vessels were in the greatest distress, would not come on board, so that many had been lost for want of pilots, as the Virginia pilots scarcely ever went out to sea. The bill went to direct the Board of Pilots to grant licenses on equal terms to Maryland and Virginia pilots.

Mr. PARKER confirmed this statement.

Mr. COIT objected to the principle, from doubts whether they had a right to direct the affairs of a State Government to do certain acts.

Mr. S. SMITH thought these officers might be directed to grant licenses to these pilots on the same ground that the Judges and Justices of States are directed to do the business of the United States.

Mr. SITGREAVES did not allow the analogy of the two cases. In 1789, he said, there was a similar case. When it was necessary to provide for the safe-keeping of the prisoners of the United States in the several States, when Congress did not pass a law on the subject, but passed a resolution requesting the several States to pass laws to provide for the case.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought the duty might as well be done, not by directing the officers to perform the duty, but by permitting them to do it. He thought this mode would steer clear of the objection.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Tennessee."

NAVAL EQUIPMENTS.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee appointed to inquire into the business of the Naval Equipments ordered by former acts of Congress, and to report whether any and what further regulations were necessary, made a report. The whole amount of expense of the frigates was estimated at $745,437, exclusive of manning and provisions. The expense of the galleys was estimated at $80,000. The annual expenditure, it was supposed, would be $223,174. The money wanted for completing the frigates was—for that building at Philadelphia, named the United States, of 44 guns, $55,950; for that at Boston, named the Constitution, of 44 guns, $96,671; for that at Baltimore, named the Constellation, of 36 guns, $47,275. The United States, it was estimated by the Secretary at War, would be completed in April, the Constitution in July, and the Constellation in May. But the committee were of opinion, owing to the frost, they would not be ready so soon. The committee recommend that the vessels should be finished as soon as possible, and that — dollars should be appropriated for the purpose; that there also be a sum appropriated for purchasing a proper site for a naval-yard; and, also, that provision should be made for obtaining a sufficiency of live-oak and red cedar for naval purposes.

The report was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

On motion of Mr. VENABLE, the unfinished business of yesterday was postponed, in order to take up the report of the Committee of Elections on the election of JOSEPH BRADLEY VARNUM, which was in favor of the sitting member. It is also stated that his conduct has not only been fair and regular throughout the whole business, but that the object of the petitioners was "rather the effect of malevolence than from a wish of promoting the public good."

Mr. COIT moved to strike out the words printed in italics. He doubted the propriety of the House passing a censure of the kind proposed upon the petitioners and those who supported them.

The motion to strike out the words in question was supported by the mover, and Messrs. THATCHER, BRADBURY, SITGREAVES, CRAIK, N. SMITH, COOPER, MURRAY, SEWALL, HARPER, D. FOSTER, and WILLIAMS; and opposed by Messrs. VENABLE, SWANWICK, W. LYMAN, NICHOLAS, DEARBORN, RUTHERFORD, BALDWIN, CHRISTIE, HOLLAND, MADISON, and BRENT.

The principal ground upon which the motion was supported was, that the Committee of Elections had no business to scrutinize the motives of petitioners; that their motives had nothing to do with the legality or illegality of elections; that they ought to report that a petition had foundation, or it had not; that the House had no right to take upon them to judge upon motives and characters. It was said, on the other hand, that the charges in the petition were so notoriously false and malicious as to call for some other notice than barely to say they were unfounded, and that it was necessary to put a check upon such outrageous attacks upon members of that House, by some such notice as was reported, in order to prevent them in future.

The yeas and nays were called for upon this question, and all the papers relative to the business were read. This took place towards the conclusion of the business, and so exhausted was the patience of the House, that four different motions were made and negatived for adjournment.

At length Mr. COIT offered a substitute for his former motion, viz: to strike out the words in italic, in order to insert these words: "that the conduct of the sitting member has been fair and honorable throughout the whole transaction."

This motion was put and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 44, nays 28, as follows:

THURSDAY, January 26.

UNITED STATES LAWS IN TENNESSEE.

The message from the Senate, of Wednesday, was read, signifying their dissent from the amendment made in altering the salary of the Judge of the State of Tennessee from $1,000 to $800 per annum, being part of the act for giving force to the laws of the United States in that State.

It was moved that the consideration of the same be now taken up—ayes 22, noes 22; the SPEAKER decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SITGREAVES was originally a supporter of the larger salary, from a conviction that $800 would be inadequate to the expenses of the office, or the respectability of talent and character required to fill it. He should expect that the expenses of traveling across the wilderness and opening the several terms at the seasons required by law, were such as entitled a magistrate of so necessary and respectable a description to adequate compensation.

Mr. WILLIAMS had originally opposed the salary of $1,000, because he considered $800 as sufficient for the duties that were to be performed; as to the price of the necessities of life, he believed that the argument went for nothing, since it was very well known that they were much cheaper in the Tennessee country than in most other States, where the salaries were not higher than the greater sum; and there were some of the States, the Judges of which had no more than $800.

Mr. THATCHER had supported the salary of $1,000 before, and he did not see the justice of arguing that the duties of the office were such, because the same qualifications are necessary for the office, and the same expenses are incurred, whether the Judge has to decide on three causes or three hundred.

Mr. GILBERT said, that it appeared to him that there could be no reason for giving the Judge of Tennessee a larger salary than that of Vermont.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that Vermont was the only State in the Union where the Judge had less than $1,000; and it did not appear to him as fair to argue for the present time upon an establishment that had taken place at a period when the necessities of life were cheaper.

Mr. NICHOLAS was desirous of practising economy as much as any one in the distribution of the public property, but he did not see that it would be money misspent in allowing a competent salary on the present occasion.

Mr. CORT said, that gentlemen had formed their notions of the salaries that should be given to magistrates of importance, upon incorrect views of the nature of the case; the class of persons from which they are taken, it must be considered, derive a large income by professional duties, and a profession, too, whose members are generally desirous, after a few years' practice, of retiring from its fatigues; the office of Judge, therefore, must be considered as a kind of sinecure.

Mr. SITGREAVES noticed the observations of the previous speakers, and said that it was entirely immaterial whether, in point of justice to the magistrate, he tried many or no causes, if he was taken from a profession whereby he derived a competent support for himself and his family. As to persons of the legal profession wishing to retire from business, he believed it was their wish in common with every other profession; the expense of living had been said to be cheaper, and the duties few; but, he would ask, if the sessions must not be opened by the Judge at the places appointed by law at the stated periods? When these points are remote, he did not see, then, but labor was greater on a professional man to make those journeys than the local duties themselves, and it would not be said that the expense was less.

On motion for resuming the bill with the larger sum, as decided upon by the Senate, the House divided—ayes 33, noes 39.

The House, therefore, insisted upon their amendment, and returned the bill to the Senate; it afterwards came from thence, with notice that they had receded from their amendment.

PUBLIC DEBT.

A report was received from the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, enclosing a report from the Secretary of the Treasury to them, giving an account of the sales of public property in consequence of the act passed last session for making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States. By which it appears that 2,160 shares of the stock of the Bank of the United States belonging to the United States, have been sold on a credit of sixty days, without interest, at the rate of $2,500 per share, or 25 per cent. above the original cost. That the money received had been placed to the credit of the United States with the Bank; that there had been sold of the 6 per cent. stock to the amount of $1,200,000, which had been applied to discharge sundry obligations of the United States therein specified.

The report was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the last clause contained in the report of the Committee of Elections of the 19th instant, in the case of the contested election of JOSEPH BRADLEY VARNUM, one of the members returned to serve in this House for the State of Massachusetts: Whereupon,

The question being taken, that the House do agree to the same, amended to read as followeth :

"Your committee are, therefore, of opinion that Joseph Bradley Varnum was duly elected; and that the charges in the said petitions against the sitting member are wholly unfounded; and that the conduct of the sitting member appears to have been fair and unexceptionable throughout the whole transaction."

It was resolved in the affirmative.

COMPENSATION TO PUBLIC OFFICERS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee appointed to inquire, whether any and what alterations ought to be made in the compensations allowed by law to the officers of the United States? The following report being read, viz :

"That, in the opinion of the committee, the compensations, allowed by law, to the Secretary of War and Attorney General, ought to be augmented by an additional compensation of five hundred dollars per annum, to each of the said officers; and to commence on the first day of January, 1797.

"That, in the opinion of the committee, an addition of salary for the year 1797, ought to be allowed to each of the following officers, viz :

"The Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Department of War, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Treasurer, the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Commissioner of the Revenue, the Auditor, the Register, the Assistant Postmaster General, and the keeper of military stores; and that such addition of salary ought to be at the rate of 25 per cent. on the amount of the present compensation allowed by law, to each of the said officers, respectively.

"That, in the opinion of the committee, the act entitled 'an act to regulate the compensation of clerks,' passed the 13th of May, 1796, ought to be continued during the year 1797, and no longer.

"That, in the opinion of the committee, an additional compensation ought to be made, for the year 1797, to each of the Loan Officers of the States of Massachusetts and New York; and that each of the said officers ought to be allowed the further sum of three hundred and seventy-five dollars, for the present year, and likewise three hundred dollars to be distributed, at their discretion, among the clerks in their respective offices, in addition to the compensations heretofore allowed by law, to the said clerks; and that the sum of one hundred and twenty dollars, ought to be allowed to the Loan Officer of the State of Pennsylvania, to be, in like manner, distributed among the clerks in his office, for the present year."

The first clause being under consideration—

Mr. DEARBORN said, the reasons which had induced the committee to recommend an advance in the salaries of the Secretary of War and Attorney General were, that they appeared too low when compared with those of other officers. They could see no reason why the Secretary of War should not have three thousand five hundred dollars, as well as the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, since they believed the business was, in all respects, equal to either of the other Secretaries. They thought, also, that one thousand nine hundred dollars was not a sum equal to the services of the Attorney General, since the abilities and character required for that office were of the first kind, nor in proportion to the pay of other officers of Government. These were the reasons, Mr. D. said, which had operated with the committee to propose these permanent additions to the salaries of these two officers in question. They were afterwards included with the other officers, upon whose salaries an advance of 25 per cent. was proposed on account of the present high price of living.

Mr. RUTHERFORD hoped they should not concur with the report of the committee. He thought it an improper time to go into the proposed advances of salary. He believed gentlemen drew their opinions of the necessity of doing this, from the present immense circulation of money; but this, he said, would not continue to be the case; they might expect money would appreciate. These advances would prove very disagreeable to the people at large; they were inconsistent, and an outrage on common sense, right reason, and justice. If they had it in their power to raise the salaries of every person in their employ, it would give him pleasure; but how would it look to the people to do it at this time, when our finances required economy? They would not like it, and he should, therefore, give the measure his decided negative.

Mr. THATCHER was opposed to the proposed advances. When salaries were fixed, he doubted not, they were fixed according to their relative importance, and according to the business each would have to transact. As it was probable the expenses of living would not always be so high as at present, he thought any allowance made these officers should be for a limited time. Until he heard some reasons for these advances, (for he had not distinctly heard his colleague,) he should vote against them.

Mr. MURRAY believed little could be added to what had been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEARBORN,] as the reasons for the advance in question. He believed the committee were unanimous in their opinion of the propriety of making the salary of the Secretary of the War Department equal to that of the other two Secretaries. He did not, therefore, anticipate any objections to this proposition. It would be invidious, he said, to go into a comparison of the business of the several departments; but he thought he might, with propriety, say, that the business of the War Department was as important and laborious as that of any of the other departments. It was, therefore, always strange to him that the salary of the Secretary of that department should be less than the other Secretaries. He never heard any reason for it; and he could not doubt, when gentlemen considered the importance of the office, and the labor which he had to go through, particularly, since the system of civilization with respect to the Indians had been adopted, they would not hesitate in voting for the report.

With respect to the Attorney General, he supposed, when his salary was fixed, that it had been made low, from a consideration that he would be able to make up the deficiency from his practice

Compensation to Public Officers.

[H. OF R.]

at the bar; it was true, this might have been the case; but, being generally drawn from a distance, and of course a stranger at the Seat of Government, he would always have many difficulties to overcome before it could be supposed he would have much business in his profession. He might now and then meet with cases in the Supreme Court, but could not expect to meet with business to afford him any considerable profit. And, surely, said Mr. M., a man, whose opinion was the guide of Government in many of its important movements, should have a sum allowed for his services that should at least be equal to maintenance. Ambition, it was true, might induce men to accept of such an office; but, he asked, if it was proper or reputable to Government, that an officer of such importance in the Government, should be obliged to have recourse to his own private fortune to supply the deficiency of his salary? for everyone knew how far one thousand dollars would go in maintaining a family in Philadelphia.

The additional salary proposed for these two officers, were the only permanent additions contemplated in the report, and he trusted they would be deemed reasonable and proper.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he believed it would be easy to give a reason why the salary of the Secretary of War was not made equal to that of other Secretaries. At the time these salaries were fixed, the business of that office was not what it is now; he believed they had only one regiment at that time. That officer had now an infinity of business, which he had not then, which was good reason for the proposed advance. The Naval Establishment, he said, would also add to the duties of that office. With respect to the Attorney General, his colleague, he thought, had given good reason why his salary should be advanced. One thousand nine hundred dollars, he said, would not be more than a fourth part of the expense which such an officer would be put to in living at the Seat of Government. So that, if his salary were advanced, as proposed, he would still have to encroach upon his private fortune for a maintenance.

Mr. HOLLAND doubted not that, when the salaries of their respective officers were fixed, they were apportioned according to their several duties. He was not well enough acquainted with the duties of the different offices to form a correct judgment on the subject; but, if they were fixed right, he saw no occasion for altering them. The Attorney General had received considerable additions to his salary since it was first established. It had been said, the private business of an Attorney General was injured by undertaking that office. He did not know how this might be in the General Government, but in the State Governments it was very different, such an office gave a man consequence in the public opinion. He believed this would be the case with respect to the Attorney General, if he had time to spare. With respect to the Secretary of War, he thought it a little odd that now, in a time of peace, an increase of salary should be asked. Something had been said of the Naval Establishment adding to his duty; he hoped that establishment would not afford him much business. He should certainly be opposed to troubling him much on that account. He hoped the report would not be agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLAS said the advance now proposed, was different from raising of salaries in general. He believed the salary of the Attorney General was fixed at so low a sum from an idea of his getting business; but it must be known that a stranger would have little chance of entering into practice on his arrival at the Seat of Government. If the office was necessary (and he believed no one would dispute that) it was necessary to raise his salary.

Mr. N. said, he was doubtful whether the business of the Secretary of War was equal to that of the other Secretaries; but he thought the public service and interest would be promoted by making this salary equal to the others, as it would do away that desire of change which at present existed, on account of the difference of salary. He should, therefore, vote for this part of the report, but should be opposed to the other parts of it.

Mr. HARTLEY said, the committee could not see any solid reason why the salary of the Secretary of War should be less than the other two Secretaries. The Attorney General, he said, was cut off, by the duties of his office, from the taking circuits in the country. Indeed, he believed, he had not much time to attend to any other business than that of Government. Fees, he got none. He therefore depended on his salary. He was a stranger, and as Government was likely shortly to be removed, he would be looked upon merely as a temporary resident, and would not, on that account, be likely to obtain much steady business.

Mr. THATCHER wished the present subject had been put off till next session. At a time when they were embarrassed for want of money, he thought they ought not to be advancing salaries. He saw no reason, if they agreed to this report, why they should not extend the advance to themselves. No officers suffered more from the depreciation of money than that House and the Senate.

The arguments of the gentleman from Maryland, for advancing the salary of the Secretary of War, went to the docking that of other Secretaries. He saw no justice in augmenting one and not the other. He saw no objection to the salary of the Attorney General being raised, if he had not business. Justice seemed to require this; but still he was sorry the subject was now brought forward. The fears which they at present entertained of a defalcation of revenue on account of the hostile dispositions of foreign Powers, might not be realized; and, in that case, they should feel more disposed to be liberal. He therefore moved the Committee might rise.

The question for the Committee rising was put and negatived, there being only 28 votes in favor of it.

Mr. BRENT said, the sense of the Committee would, perhaps, be more fairly taken, if the question was divided; for, though he thought it no more than right that the salary of the Secretary of War should be advanced, yet he did not think it so necessary as that of the Attorney General. It had been justly observed that, when the salary of this officer was fixed, it was, probably, from an idea that he would get business in his profession; but, notwithstanding some of the highest law characters in the country had filled that office, he believed they had never had much business besides that of their office. He said there was no office under Government of greater importance than this, and its duties ought, in some degree, to be requited. The income of the present Attorney General, from his profession, he well knew, before he entered upon his office, was more than double his present salary. He hoped, therefore, whatever might be done with respect to the Secretary of War, the pay of the Attorney General would be increased.

Mr. HARPER believed, without entering into a comparison between the duties of the different officers of Government, other views of the subject might show the justice of the proposed advance. He trusted, no objection would be made to the advance of the Secretary of War equal to the other Secretaries. It was certain none of the duties of the officers of Government could be discharged without a constant residence at the Seat of Government; and, when a man left his home, it was of little importance whether he was employed a half or a whole day, or whether his duty was great or small, he made the same sacrifice in one case as the other.

With respect to the Attorney General, the present salary held out a fallacious expectation of business, independent of his office; whereas, no man entering upon this office could obtain a practice of any consequence, till he had held it at least for three or four years; because, when business of this kind had got into a channel, it required time to divert it. The Attorney General, Mr. H. said, was an officer of Government frequently called upon in public business, not only by the Executive, but by Congress, and this being of a paramount nature, all other business must yield to it. Therefore, a gentleman filling this office would not have time to attend to regular practice, since, to do that to any purpose, he should always be found at his office or at court. An officer of this kind, Mr. H. said, ought to be so paid, as not to depend upon private business for a living. His office was very important, and would require his mind to be wholly free from other concerns; as, except this were the case, public business would never be done in a proper manner. He hoped, therefore, the report would be agreed to.

Mr. RUTHERFORD repeated his objection to agreeing to the report. He said, to advance the salaries as proposed would be, to remedy a temporary evil, at the expense of a permanent one, and would be contrary to Republican economy.

Mr. HARPER proposed, by way of amendment, to make an additional allowance of $1,600, instead of $500, to the Attorney General, in order to make his salary $3,500, so as to be equal to the Secretaries of State and of the Treasury.

This proposition did not meet with a second, and therefore fell to the ground.

Mr. GALLATIN said, there was much weight in many of the observations of gentlemen in favor of the first clause of the report. Strong reasons had been urged why the Secretary of War should be put on a level with the Secretaries of the other Departments, and, also for advancing the salary of the Attorney General. Though he did not think all the reasons which had been offered were of equal weight. One of the arguments used by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] was, that all the officers of Government were obliged to leave their homes to reside at the Seat of Government, and that it was not important to inquire what were their duties. He did not think this a good reason why the salaries in question should be advanced. It would apply to all the officers of Government resident at the Seat of Government,—to the Postmaster, Comptroller of the Treasury, and others.

But, taking it for granted, that it was necessary to make some distinction between the Heads of Departments and others, there was a fact stronger than any arguments used on the occasion. Our business, said Mr. G., has been done, and been well done, under the present establishment. If this were a fact, until they found it neglected for want of a sufficiency of salary, he thought they should not increase it. At any rate, he thought they ought not to vote for this increase, when revenue was so much wanted as at present.

Without wishing to give it as general sentiment, we ought, said he, to consider, on the present occasion, the feelings of the people. Upon the subjects of granting salaries and laying taxes, these feelings should be considered, because the security of revenue depended upon public opinion; and if once that was unattended to with respect to raising of money, our situation would be worse than at present. Evasions would be made and smuggling would be introduced.

He believed the present prevailing opinion was, that the salaries of our officers were sufficiently high. If this was so, he thought, at the moment they about to resort to direct taxes, which would go to the pockets of every one, they ought not to tell the people their opinion was ill-founded. For this reason, and believing that no mischief could arise from withholding this advance, he should vote against this part of the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, when the salaries of these officers were estimated, Congress doubtless took into view the duties of each, and apportioned them accordingly. Since that time the business of the War Department was much increased; and it was found that the Attorney General's dependence upon business, besides what was connected with his office, was very uncertain. When the subject was before the committee, he was of opinion that the salaries of these two officers were too low; and it was well known that he was not in the habit of voting for the increase of salaries. And, he would ask, where there was a man who lived in Philadelphia, in the same style in which it was expected that our Attorney should live, that could maintain his family for $1,900 a year? And if this could not be done, was it right that they should expect their officer to encroach upon his own private fortune, whilst in the service of Government? He trusted not. Their officers, he said, ought not only to have a sufficiency for a handsome maintenance, but something more. He trusted, therefore, the report would be agreed to.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] might wish, by keeping down salaries, to shut out persons from distant parts of the Union, from the offices of Government, and confine them to inhabitants of Pennsylvania, who would not labor under the disadvantages of strangers; he, therefore, might not feel the subject so much as others. He believed the PRESIDENT had found a difficulty in filling the offices of Government, from the lowness of the salaries affixed to them. Persons, who could not afford to spend their private fortunes in the public service, had declined the acceptance of them. The present Secretary of War was a man of fortune, and could afford to spend a part of it, and therefore he accepted it; but it might have been offered to persons who could not have afforded to have made the sacrifice.

No man, Mr. S. said, could come into Philadelphia, and live for $3,500 a year. Suppose him at the head of a Department, he could not keep a riding horse for that sum. He agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] that they ought to attend to public opinion. The opinion of that gentleman's constituents, he doubted not, was, that $3,500 was a monstrous thing. But, he would ask, what the opinion of the people of Philadelphia was? In his district, he was confident, the opinion of the people was not that the salaries of our officers were too high.

But, what was the consequence of thus keeping down salaries? It excluded from the offices of Government all but men of fortune. Many gentlemen would not complain of this, but he wished to bring forward men of talents and industry, who could not be put into offices, except the salary were sufficient to support them in the style in which they must live.

Mr. A. JACKSON said, the reason which had weighed with the committee principally, was, that these salaries ought to be advanced, in order to make them in proportion to the other salaries of Government officers. No gentleman, he believed, had given any reason why the present difference should exist.

But, whilst he was up, he would notice what had fallen from the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS.] He had asked what Attorney General could maintain his family for $1,900 a year? But, when the salary of the Judge of Tennessee was under consideration, $800 were thought enough by that gentleman, for him and his family, though he were a man of abilities equal to the filling of the office of Attorney General. If the Judge of Tennessee was to leave his profession to live upon $800, he thought $3,000 might support the Secretary of War. For this reason, though he saw no other ground for changing his former opinion, he should vote against the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he wished to set the gentleman right. He thought $800 in Tennessee more than equal to $3,000 in Philadelphia; but the Attorney General, if the proposed advance was made, should have only two thousand four hundred dollars.

Mr. MURRAY hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would not depart from the opinion which he acknowledged he had been of. The question was not whether $3,000 in Philadelphia were equal to $800 in Tennessee, but whether they should not advance the salary of one Secretary to that of two others, and add $500 to that of the Attorney General. He trusted, therefore, five minutes' reflection would restore the gentleman to his former opinion, since the Judge of Tennessee had nothing to do with the present business.

Mr. HENDERSON said, amongst the duties of the Secretary of War had been mentioned the great business which would be occasioned by the plan adopted for civilizing the Indians. He did not know what part of that business he would have to perform; but he knew there had been appointed an agent of the Indian department, and a Purveyor of Public Supplies, who, he imagined, would reduce the business of the Secretary of War in that respect. Peace, also, being concluded with the Indians, they might rationally conclude that there would be a diminution of duty.

Mr. H. asked, whether the Secretary of War or the Attorney General had presented any memorial for an increase of their salaries? He believed not. He had heard, on former occasions, of gentlemen volunteering themselves in the service of petitioners; he thought this would be truly a volunteering business, and at a time when our revenues called for the strictest economy. He wished the subject had been suspended (as had been proposed) for the present session. For his part, he did not expect much diminution in the price of living.

Mr. CORR hoped the question would be divided, so that the sense of the committee might be taken separately on the advance proposed to each officer. An argument of considerable weight with him in favor of the advance of the Secretary of War, was, that his salary being $500 less than the other two, however his abilities may be peculiarly adapted for that office, whenever there was a vacancy in either of the other two, he was always ready to make a change, and by these changes, it might happen that a valuable man would be lost to the War Department, whose abilities were peculiarly fit for the office, and which, therefore, were sacrificed. He hoped the report would be agreed to.

Mr. MURRAY said, he meant only to make one remark in reply to the gentleman from New Jersey. He would inform him that this was not a volunteering of business, as he had been pleased to call it; but in consequence of (what seemed to have slipped the gentleman's memory) a recommendation from the PRESIDENT at the opening of the session. [Mr. M. read the passage of the PRESIDENT'S Speech, which recommends the compensations of the officers of Government to the attention of both Houses.] This was a recommendation, which he trusted the gentleman from New Jersey would not feel a disposition to slight. As to there having been no petitions, he said, it would be a miserable justice, which waited to be petitioned to redress a grievance which was so glaring as the present.

Mr. HARTLEY read the resolution of the House which appointed the committee to take this subject into consideration. In consequence of that resolution, Mr. H. said, the committee had looked into all the salaries, from the highest to the lowest, and the report before them was the result of their inquiries. The committee, he said, were unanimous as to the propriety of raising these two salaries.

Mr. HENDERSON said, it struck him that there had been no application to the House in the usual way for an advance of these salaries, and this was the foundation of his remarks. Though he trusted he should always pay due respect to what came from the PRESIDENT, yet he did not wish to pay implicit confidence to any communication. He wished to have an opinion of his own. It was on account of economy that he objected to the proposed advances. Notwithstanding the recommendation of the PRESIDENT, the present embarrassment of our revenue was such as would warrant, at least, the postponement of the subject to a future day.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, it was a strange thing that so much should be said about the embarrassment of our revenue upon every question which came before them, as if they could not do an act of justice, because of that embarrassment. If this argument was to be used so often it became necessary to question wherein it consisted. Would any gentleman say that the state of the country was such as not to be equal to the support of Government? Was the country, then, poor? No; the people were able and willing to do justice. The embarrassment, of which they heard so much, was nothing more than a conflict of opinion in that House, and a difficulty of forming a majority on any one plan,—and no real embarrassment. This consideration, therefore, ought not to be pressed upon the House on every occasion. It was not a want of means, but a difference of opinion on the choice of means, which embarrassed them.

While he was up, he would make a few remarks on what had fallen from his colleague, [Mr. GALLATIN.] Though he differed with him with respect to his conclusions, yet he was pleased with the avowal of his opinion, "that the business of Government had not only been done, but well done." He felt satisfaction at hearing the approbation of so good a judge; but he differed from him in the inferences which he drew from his assertion. Mr. S. said, he acknowledged "it had been well done," but it did not follow that it would continue to be well done. If these gentlemen had been enabled to discharge their duty while things were low, without an outrage of their duty to their family, did not a change of time and circumstances call for a change of conditions? Most certainly they did. Besides, though they were told "that the business was done, and well done," yet he believed there had been some difficulty in obtaining persons to do the business. Was it not true that embarrassments had arisen, and were likely to arise, from a want of sufficient salary being allowed? The PRESIDENT, he said, was a character not wantonly to lay things before the House; and, when he had suggested what was important, was it not to be supposed that, from his experience, he had found them to be so? Was it not a fair inference that serious inconveniences had arisen? Was it not matter of notoriety, that offices had been offered and refused, and that valuable officers had given up their situations, on account of the incompetency of salaries? He believed it was.

Nor did Mr. S. agree with his colleague as to what was the public opinion with respect to salaries. In his mind, the prevailing opinion was, that the salaries of officers ought to be competent; such as would command men of abilities throughout the United States.

There might be some difference of opinion betwixt people in one part of the country and those in another, with respect to what was sufficient; but amongst the people in his walk, very opposite sentiments were held to those which the gentleman had given as the prevailing public opinion—they thought the salaries of officers incompetent to their situations.

He hoped, therefore, the House would do what they conceived to be right in the abstract. If there was a propriety in making the salary of the Secretary of War equal to the other Secretaries, and of advancing the Attorney General's, he trusted they would do so. He doubted not they would afterwards provide the means. He hoped, therefore, they should hear no more about embarrassments.

Mr. GALLATIN said, when we feel, and have felt for some time, embarrassments with respect to our revenue, it was but just, but right, to bring those embarrassments forward against our increasing expenses; the thing was so evident as not to need an argument to support it. Had they not last session and this session, he asked, statements from the Department of the Treasury, which showed clearly this embarrassment? Did they not know that they had been obliged to sell their shares of the Bank of the United States? That, though that Bank had asked for payment of the debt due to them, they had not been able to pay it? Last year, when they asked for payment of part of the debt, Government opened a new loan upon the most advantageous conditions; they had also offered for sale their shares of the Bank stock, but all had not been sufficient to pay the debt.

If this was not a real embarrassment, if it was not felt by all of them, he did not know what was become of their feelings with respect to public credit. When they knew (what did not depend upon the opinions of any man, who was liable to be mistaken, but from official reports) that the present revenue was not equal to our expenses; that, from not being able to borrow money, they had found it necessary to increase the revenue; when we know the situation of our present revenue, that it depended on a commerce every where subject to attack and depredation, and that, consequently, it must experience great defalcations; was there not some ground, he asked, for saying their revenue was embarrassed, and for refusing, on that account, to go into an increase of salaries?

Additional Revenue.

Mr. G. said, his colleague seemed to have laid peculiar stress upon his having said that the business of the officers, whose salaries were proposed to be advanced, "had been done, and well done," for their present pay, and that, therefore, there was no occasion to increase them. Mr. G. did not mean to retract anything which he had said; he thought it "had been done, and well done." But, as a different meaning might be put upon this assertion from that which he intended by it, he would just declare in what sense he used the words. He solely applied the remark to the business of office; he meant that all the details of business which fell under these Departments, had "been done, and well done;" and had no allusion to the Ministerial measures of any of those gentlemen. He did not know, upon examination, whether he would approve or disapprove of them; but he had applied his remark merely to the business of office, which he considered "as done, and well done," and that, therefore, there was no need of any increase of salary.

As to what his colleague had asserted respecting "prevailing opinions," he knew not the line of his walk; but when he mentioned the prevailing opinion, he meant the opinion of the great mass of the people out of large cities. He believed that opinion was what he had said it was, and he thought it necessary to pay some respect to it. And when he said, that our revenue depended in a great degree upon public opinion, it was not a wild assertion, but founded on fact. He knew if public opinion did not look upon the practice of smuggling as dishonorable, it would not be long prevented. If it were looked upon here as no higher crime than in England, where it was thought very lightly of from the oppressive weight of duties imposed, smuggling would soon become very common in this country; but, at present, infamy was attached to the character of a smuggler, and while public money continued to be properly expended, this sentiment would continue; but no longer would public opinion support Government than while Government respected public opinion.

When he made these observations, he said, he did not mean them to apply particularly to the five hundred dollars proposed to be advanced to these gentlemen, but to increases of salary in general. This was not a moment, Mr. G. said, in which to increase these salaries; for if they increased these, they must increase many others.

One of his colleagues [Mr. HARTLEY] had said, they had begun at the head, and examined all the offices downwards, in order to discover what alterations were necessary in the salaries of the different officers of Government. He would have begun differently. He would have set out at the lowest officer, and proceeded upward. The reason why he thought this should have been done, was not immediately connected with this report. It was, that the increase of price in the necessities of life bore harder on the lower than the higher ranks of society. But the present increase, he believed, was to be a permanent one; and, as he had heard nothing to alter his opinion on the subject, he should vote against the measure.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH said it was from a respect to economy, he should vote for this report. If, by having their salaries too low, none but the wealthy could accept of them, he believed economy would not eventually be promoted by such a practice. Wealth, he said, did not give wisdom. Cræsus was a rich man, but he never heard it said that he was a wise one. He did not look upon the proposed advance as a rising of salaries, but as an equalization of them. Instead of five hundred, he thought the advance should be one thousand dollars; nor would this addition make them equal in value to what they were when granted.

The question being divided, the sense of the Committee was first taken on that part which relates to an advance of five hundred dollars to the Secretary of War, and negative—47 to 42. It was then taken on making a like allowance to the Attorney General, and carried, there being 48 votes in favor of the amendment.

The next resolution, recommending a continuance of the act for regulating the compensation of clerks, passed last year, was taken up. There appeared to have been a mistake in the report of a date. This act was said to have passed on the 13th, instead of the 30th of May last, on which account the reading of the act was called for. It was read.

Mr. DEARBORN said, upon examination, it appeared that the same reasons operated now for keeping the act in force, as operated last year in passing the law, when the business was thoroughly investigated. With an exception of two or three instances, this act, it was thought, would provide sufficient compensation for the several officers and clerks therein mentioned. These exceptions were the Loan Offices of New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, for whom a provision was made in the next resolution.

Mr. MADISON said, if he was not mistaken, the act which had been read not only provided for the increase of salaries of the clerks in the several public offices, but left it to the Heads of Departments to apportion this increase as they thought proper. This, he supposed, was the effect of necessity, and not meant as a permanent principle. He wished, therefore, the allowance should be apportioned by law. This, he said, was conformable to the true spirit of the Constitution. It was proper that these salaries should depend on law, and not upon the will of a superior. He wished, therefore, the allowance should be apportioned by law. This, he said, was conformable to the true spirit of the Constitution. It was proper that these salaries should depend on law, and not upon the will of a superior. He wished, therefore, that that part of the report might be recommitted.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if the law in question was proposed to be a permanent one, the alteration proposed by the gentleman from Virginia would be very proper; but as the law was only passed for one year, and it was now only proposed to continue it for the year 1797, at the expiration of which he trusted the price of living would be moderated, he did not think it necessary to recommit the report for the purpose mentioned.

Mr. HENDERSON said, that during the last session, there was a report made to the House, that the number of clerks in certain public offices might be reduced, from one hundred to eighty. By this diminution, he said, there was an immediate addition of 25 per cent. to the remaining clerks. This, he said, was not taken into consideration in the law which had been read. He thought the addition proposed by this law, with that of the 25 per cent. which he had mentioned, would make a very extravagant addition to the salary in question. He thought, therefore, that there was no necessity for a continuance of the law before them. He was of opinion, also, that a further reduction of clerks might be made.

Mr. DEARBORN said, he was not acquainted with the circumstance which had been mentioned by the gentleman from New Jersey; and that the only thing which had come before the committee on this subject, was the act in question. If any act existed of the kind which had been alluded to by that gentleman, it did not come before them.

The question for continuing the act was put and carried—42 to 40.

Mr. HENDERSON moved that the Committee rise, as, before the next resolution, relative to the Loan Officers, came under consideration, he wished the resolution, which he had lately laid on the table, relative to this subject, to be disposed of, in order to obtain the information there contemplated. Mr. H. briefly related the reasons which had urged him to bring forward that resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, if it was possible to get any information on the subject, he should not object to the Committee's rising. They might obtain information as to the past, but no one could say what would be the business of future years. The resolution before them proposed to advance the salaries of the Loan Officers of New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania. If the gentleman would cast his eye upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he would see that there had been paid at Boston, last year, three hundred thousand dollars; at New York, about the same sum; and in Philadelphia, about eighty thousand dollars. And, except the system were to be entirely changed, after waiting two or three weeks for information, he did not know that it would afford any satisfaction.

If the proposed addition was made, Mr. W. said it would only amount to six or seven hundred dollars; but if the gentleman thought they had time this session to go into a different arrangement, he would not object to it. He believed an alteration in the system was very desirable, for the Loan Officer of North Carolina was paid a salary of one thousand seven hundred dollars for himself and clerks, and had only received three thousand five hundred dollars, and yet he was praying for an increase of salary!

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 27.

COMPENSATION TO PUBLIC OFFICERS.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole of yesterday, on the report of a select committee on the subject of compensations, and the last paragraph relative to the Loan Offices being under consideration—

Mr. GALLATIN said, he was unwilling to agree to an augmentation of the salaries of the Loan Officers in the manner proposed by the report. He found these officers in the State of Massachusetts and New York, had each 1,500 dollars, and it was proposed to add $375 to each. The present salary was equal to the District Judge of New York, and 300 dollars more than the District Judge of Massachusetts. It was true the business was greater in those two States than in any other in the Union, but he thought this ought to be provided for by additional clerks, though there were already five clerks in each of those offices, which called for a sum of 4,000 dollars to each office. He would, therefore, move to strike out what related to the increase of the salary of the Loan Officers, and confine the allowance to the clerks only.

Mr. S. SMITH had no objection to the proposed amendment, or to vote against the whole clause; for, if they declined to compensate offices of the first trust, he did not see any reason for adding to the compensation of the offices in question, particularly as he perceived one cent was already paid upon all the money received. He had observed, that men who were the most expert with their pen before they got into office, when they were placed there, laid it aside. He could not see how five clerks could be employed in those offices.

Mr. SWANWICK was of opinion that this business was capable of considerable reformation. He thought there was very considerable embarrassment in this department, which might be dispensed with. He did not see why this business in Philadelphia might not be transferred to the office of the Treasury Department. But as it would not be proper to make a proposition of this kind at present, he should satisfy himself with voting against the amendment.

Mr. SEWALL said, gentlemen were mistaken when they spoke of the business of the Loan Offices (particularly of Massachusetts) as not having much to do. He believed the Loan Officer and Clerks at Boston were fully employed every day, and sometimes on Sunday, so numerous and minute were their entries. The present motion, he believed, was in conformity to the proceedings of yesterday, but he thought the salaries in question ought to be advanced. The proposed addition was not, as he understood, on account of additional business, but upon the same principle which had influenced advances in other cases, viz: a decrease in the value of money.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that if it had been on the ground of a depreciation of money, that these salaries were proposed to be advanced, it would have applied to every officer in the Union equally with the Loan Officers proposed to be raised. He Compensation to Public Officers.

[H. OF R.]

therefore moved to strike out the whole of the paragraph.

Mr. VARNUM seconded the motion.

Mr. AMES said the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] had suggested that persons who were very active with their pen before they came into office, when they found themselves fixed there, were apt to put the whole of their business into the hands of clerks. The suggestion might have weight; and, therefore, he should take the liberty of saying, the remark did not apply as it respected the officer of Massachusetts. [Mr. S. SMITH said he did not allude to any particular officer.] Mr. AMES said he knew he did not; but his observations might be supposed to be applicable to the officer of Massachusetts. If, indeed, the remark was applicable, it might afford good reason for withholding the proposed advance; but the Loan Officer of Massachusetts was a man of great industry and application, and the business of his office required the unremitting attention of himself and clerks.

As to the State officers, he would not say whether they had, or had not, sufficient salaries; nor did he believe they always attended to the rewards given to State officers as a scale upon which to reward the officers of the United States. They had set out upon a scale of their own at the commencement of the Government; but what was an adequate salary then, was not so now; and the business of the Loan Offices was so far from being diminished, it was continually increasing. In Massachusetts in particular, since the assumption of the State, of debts, the business was vastly augmented. He was informed that there were upwards of two thousand accounts open in that office. Of course the adjustment of interest upon all these accounts, would require great accuracy and labor.

Observations, Mr. A. said, which went to keep down the salaries of office, he knew were popular among certain descriptions of people; but he did not think this squeezing of public officers was prudent, just, or honorable. He did not think the least possible sum for which an office could be executed was the wisest or best to be adopted. The true rule was, that such a sum should be paid for service as was sufficient to command men of talents to perform it. Anything below this was parsimonious and unwise.

Mr. SWANWICK said, many of the difficulties which they experienced from the applications of their officers for advances of salary, arose from the source of indirect taxation. For instance, if you lay an additional duty on sugar, your officers will have to pay a portion of that duty out of their salary; so, likewise, if a duty was laid upon any other article which they were in the habit of consuming. Every tax on articles of consumption necessarily increased the price of living, and the United States must pay their officers accordingly.

Mr. S. said, they were apt to deceive themselves, when they charged the high price of every article of subsistence to the depreciation of money; it was chargeable, principally, to indirect taxation.

Laborers who had to pay indirect taxes upon almost everything which they consumed, were obliged to charge these taxes upon their labor; the farmer had, therefore, to pay higher wages, and he in return, charged his produce accordingly. He thought, therefore, we should find economy consulted, in resorting to a different plan of taxation.

Mr. S. saw no particular occasion for advancing the salaries of the Loan Officers, while other officers remained at their former rate. It was true, that the salaries of our officers slid imperceptibly from under their feet; for though a salary was a just compensation when granted, they were continually taking from it by taxes, since every additional tax was a deduction from the salary of every officer of the United States, and they had a just demand against Government, at least, for the amount of taxes paid in this direct way upon almost everything they purchased. He should, however, be against granting any partial relief. Indeed, he was of opinion, this business of Loans might be done upon a much more economical plan. He thought the business might very well be done at the branch banks.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he frequently heard that a depreciation of money was the cause of the salaries of their officers proving incompetent; this, he allowed, might have some weight, but not all that was given to it. It was notorious, at the time these salaries were fixed, Government was attempting a dazzling splendor of office; but he trusted better principles were now gaining ground; he trusted they should have more satisfaction in paying their debts than in wasting the public money in splendid salaries, and by that means giving a fictitious splendor to office, which was unfit for a Government like ours. He should not say that a depreciation of money might not have had some effect, but attention should also be paid to the change in opinion which he had mentioned.

The present salaries were not perhaps sufficiently high; yet, in our present situation, when our commerce lay prostrate, and when we knew not whether greater difficulties might not ensue, it was not a time to think of advancing salaries. Public officers must submit to bear a share of the evils in common with others. The time was coming, and, he thought, would soon arrive, when money would be as valuable as ever. He, therefore, would not consent to the proposed advance.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, he concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] that an ill-timed parsimony was not to be defended; but he said there was as great a difference between economy and parsimony as between luxury and economy, and it was the great duty of this democratic Republic, to conduct itself with economy, decency, and simplicity of manners, and to part with everything loose and fantastical. He would refer to the gentleman's own feelings—for he acknowledged he was a man of feeling—and ask whether there were not twenty characters in Massachusetts in every way equal to the filling of their Loan Office, who would be ready to offer themselves for the office at the present salary, if it were vacant? Money was a precious article; the people viewed their money with a great deal of respect, and parted with it with great regret; and it was this people, and not a Commissioner of Loans, who were to support this Government, and it was their feelings which ought to be consulted.

Mr. GALLATIN said his motion was to strike out what related to the Loan Officers, and to confine the proposed advance to the clerks only; but the motion of the gentleman from Maryland went to strike out the whole paragraph. He wished the committee would give them the information which they had on the subject. If there was a want of clerks in the offices mentioned, he would vote against the present motion; but if there was no need of any addition, he would vote for it.

Mr. DEARBORN did not know that he could give satisfactory information on the subject, though the committee took every means in their power to obtain it. It appeared to him that the business of the two offices of New York and Massachusetts had become so burdensome that it was next to impossible, without laboring day and night, and on Sundays, to do the business; and the complaints of the clerks were so general that the committee were induced to believe it was necessary to give them additional compensation. As he passed through Boston, he saw one of the clerks of that Loan Office, who assured him that it was impossible to live upon the salary which he received, and that he was constantly obliged to his friends for assistance. Mr. D. said, he was no friend to exorbitant salaries, but he did not think it right that they should pinch persons in their employment so much as to oblige them to trouble their friends to make up a maintenance for themselves and families.

Mr. D. said, it was the opinion of the House last session that the salaries of certain officers of Government should be advanced; a bill passed that House for that purpose, but, from the lateness of the session, or some other cause, it did not pass the Senate. If it was necessary then to make the increase, the necessity did not exist less at present. The Committee of the Whole, it was true, had decided against augmenting certain other salaries, but he considered this as a subject which would come again before the House; and he thought they must either agree to the present proposition for advancing the Loan Officers and their clerks, or acknowledge they did wrong last session.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts went to show the propriety of an increase of the salaries of all other officers, as well as those in question. He was against singling out particular officers for an advance; if the whole were advanced together, he should not object to it. As to the $120 proposed for the Loan Office of Pennsylvania, he thought the office itself might be dispensed with, and the business be as well done at the Treasury Office. The only reason given for the advance was, the depreciation of money, and that consideration would apply equally to all the officers of the Government. He should, therefore, be opposed to granting the allowance to the officers in question.

Mr. AMES said, from the turn which the debate had taken, the object became of greater importance than the mere advance of the salary of the officers in question. It became of importance to determine upon what principle the officers of Government should be paid.

He did not intend to investigate the motives of gentlemen who were so desirous of keeping down the salaries of the officers of Government; he could not suppose they acted from unworthy principles. It was a well-known fact, that in all popular assemblies, the disposition to withhold grants of money was notorious. Perhaps it was proper; it was doubtless a fence against wasteful expenditure, nor did he wish to break it down; but when the gentleman from Virginia called upon them to attend to the feelings of the people, he thought it was necessary to remind the Committee that they ought also to attend to the interests of the people, and he believed it was for the common interest of the people that persons selected for office should be fit and proper to fill their respective offices. And it was a fact, that from the dispersedness of the population of the country, and from other circumstances, there was great difficulty in finding suitable persons to fill the offices of Government. In other countries, Mr. A. said, where their Governments had been of long standing, persons were trained up with a view to public employments; but in this country this had not been the case, and, therefore, the PRESIDENT found the circle from which to select proper characters for office was very confined. It was, therefore, the more necessary that such an allowance should be made to officers of Government as should induce fit persons to accept of them; such as (to use a vulgar but strong expression) would command the market. Five hundred dollars, more or less, was nothing when compared with fitness for office. He said he had already laid it down as a principle, that the rate of salary should be such as to command men of talents and of character, for these the interest of the country required.

Mr. A. said, he knew the feelings of the people were soon roused when money was the object; but he was surprised the gentleman from Virginia should have attributed to gentlemen from the Eastward a desire to introduce a splendor of office into the Government. This spirit, he thought, was full as likely to come from the Southward as from the Eastward. He thought they were as economical and as just in the Eastern as in the Southern States; and he thought the remark could have been made with as little sincerity as propriety.

Had it been understood, was it believed, said Mr. A., that a splendor of office had been introduced into our Government? How did facts corroborate the assertion? Had their officers even stood upon an equality with others in the line of life in which they moved? Had any officer of theirs been able to lay up an estate for his family? Or were they not rather obliged to walk on foot, while those with whom they associated rode in their coaches? They were even, comparatively speaking, without a dollar, whilst gentlemen, living upon their professions, were rich. On this account, he said, there had always been an unwillingness to accept of offices of Government by persons best calculated to fill them. These were facts, and he spoke them with audible voice; yet it was wonderful that, at a moment when their officers might be said to be in want, they were reproached with living in luxury and extravagance.

Having disposed of this subject, and given the observations upon it all the credit they deserved, he would inquire why they should expect gentlemen to undertake the offices of Government which would not allow them to live in an equally comfortable manner to that in which they had been accustomed to live? He despised the idea of endeavoring to make the people believe that their public officers lived in splendor, and on that account to hold them up to the hatred of our citizens; but could it be supposed that a person who undertook a public office should descend from that style or living to which he had been used, because some gentlemen chose to call it splendid? Or, was there any reason that such a man should immediately begin to eat brown bread, though heretofore he had always eaten white?

Another suggestion had been made, that the present high price of living had been increased, and depended upon the duties on imposts, and therefore it was an evil arising from indirect taxation. Though there might be some ground for this observation, it by no means went to the extent to which it had been pushed. He would ask, for instance, whether the broadcloth upon which a coat was made cost materially more now than before the impost of 15 or 16 per cent. was laid upon it? He believed not; but every one knew that the produce of the farmer was double in price to what it was when these salaries were fixed, and they ought, therefore, to be advanced in proportion. And were the people unprepared for an advance in the salaries of the officers of Government? He believed not. He believed most of the States, on account of the increased price of living, had increased the pay of their officers. Why, then, said he, should the officers of the United States be unattended to? And were they to suppose that the advance now proposed would be a thing improper for the House to agree to, when they had last session judged a like advance a proper one? As to the observation of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] that he did not wish to raise one officer and not another, he should take a different course from that which that gentleman proposed to adopt. He would vote for an advance of those which came before him, and do the same to others when he should have an opportunity.

Mr. WILLIAMS hoped the proposed advance would take place, as these two Loan Offices did three-fourths of the business of all the Loan Offices in the Union.

Mr. HARTLEY said, however willing he might be to strike out what related to an additional allowance to Loan Officers, he should be against striking out what related to the clerks. There was great difficulty, he believed, to retain clerks. Bankers and merchants giving larger salaries, they were naturally drawn from these offices. He did not wish to give large salaries, but he wished to make them reasonable and competent.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, he should not follow the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] through his field of declamation. But he seemed to have set him up in very disagreeable colors to the people, to this great Confederation, and it was necessary he should say a few words in reply. He said he revered the people; he never found reason to do otherwise. He was for keeping things in their due simplicity, and by no means to add to salaries. He could not think of giving the honey from the hive, the marrow from the bones of the people. He was for holding tight the purse-strings of six or seven millions of respectable people; he could not think of lavishing the precious article of money, however his caution might displease the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he should be sorry to dispute the point with his colleague for the honor of being noticed by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but he believed there could be but little doubt that the gentleman had pointed the chief of his observations at him.

It was no unusual thing, Mr. N. said, for that gentleman to make the fact, from which he chose to draw his conclusions. And he was astonished to hear that the oratorical powers for which that gentleman was famed, should have been employed upon a basis not true. For he neither had said that the Eastern States had fixed the salaries of Government with a view to splendor, nor that their officers were rioting in wealth, in order to insult their poverty. With respect to the original establishment of salaries, he did not know that there had been a struggle in the business. If the gentleman had a consciousness of the fact, he knew nothing of it. With respect to the present salaries, he had not said they were too high, but he had doubted their being sufficient. He said, indeed, that when the offices were established, they were established with too great a view to splendor; but, that from the change which had taken place in the value of money, instead of riding in coaches, their officers had learnt to be satisfied without them. This difference (as he had before observed) was not, he believed, more owing to the change which had taken place in the value of money than to a change of public opinion in favor of that plainness of manners which was so well suited to the Republican character.

Mr. N. asked, where they were to get the money now wanted, viz: an annual sum of $1,400,000? He knew pretty well the taxation which the people of this country would be inclined to bear, and he knew that the raising of that sum would be very sensibly felt. Did gentlemen rely, he asked, upon the small majority of ten votes, on the passing of a system of direct taxation? He believed there was great danger, when the bill came in, that the manner of collecting the tax could not be made agreeable to at least that number of members who voted for a bill to be brought in. Had not the gentleman from Massachusetts resisted taxation? He had; and though the opposers of the system of direct taxes had been frequently called upon to produce their substitutes for a direct tax, no substitute had been brought forward, except that produced by the gentleman from South Carolina; and he believed the Secretary of the Treasury had given it as his opinion that a very small sum only could be raised from a further extension of indirect taxes, if prudence did not forbid the attempt. As he wished, therefore, for expenses to follow, and not precede the funds which were to pay them, he should be opposed to all increase, of expense which could be avoided.

Mr. N. said, he was not sensible of the difference which existed between the country which the gentleman from Massachusetts came from and his own. He defied that gentleman to show any part of the country in which greater economy was practised, or where the revenue and expenditure were better attended to. It was so much so, that the debt, which had given the gentleman ground to make his antiquated charge, had been extinguished. No part of the United States paid more respect to its engagements, nor had better ability to pay their debts. He did not, therefore, feel the gentleman's insinuation, though he had condescended to answer it. He denied the truth of it.

Mr. SWANWICK said, he should not have risen again on this subject, had he not wished to have made a single remark on what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] on the subject of indirect taxes. That gentleman had said, suppose broadcloth paid 15 or 16 per cent. impost, would it materially affect the price of a coat? If it did not, Mr. S. said, there must be something very wrong in the commercial system; for certainly a duty of 15 or 16 per cent., with the profits upon it, would not make a difference of much less than 25 per cent. The gentleman seemed to think that indirect taxes had not much effect upon salaries, but that the price of living was what principally called for an advance of salaries. But if he had traced indirect taxation to its source, he would have found that it operated more than he was aware of upon every necessary of life. The house in which we live, said Mr. S., is an object of labor, and the person who built it did not fail to charge the taxes which he paid, upon his labor, and the owner of the house would of course be obliged to lay a rent accordingly. So with respect to the produce from the country. The farmer pays 25 per cent. more than he used to do for every article he purchases and for his labor, and he must therefore increase the price of his produce. Whilst the farmer finds a ready market for his articles, he does not feel this; but whenever markets fall, (and he did not think they would always remain so high as at present,) then the farmer will feel the evil of indirect taxes. He thought it necessary to make this remark upon the sentiment to which he had alluded.

Mr. DAYTON said, that the question before them seemed to him to be a fitter subject for cool, dispassionate calculation, than for animated declamation, which rather unfitted than prepared the mind for a right decision. The arguments of those gentlemen who advocated the increase of salaries of the two Loan Officers in question, were of two kinds, viz: the greatly enhanced price of every article of consumption, and the increased duties in the offices respectively. As to the former, if it was to have any influence, it should operate more generally, and, instead of producing this partial provision, should lead to an augmentation of the compensations of all the Commissioners of Loans whose salaries were determined at the same time. In respect to the other reason which had been assigned, viz: the accumulation of duties, he viewed it as rather calling upon Congress to adjust the whole scale of compensations anew, than to take up the subject in the partial manner that it appeared before them. If it were true that the duties in some offices were increased, it would certainly follow that those of other offices were diminished in like proportion; and if, as some of the advocates for the proposed augmentation argued, the sum of labor, duty, and risk were to be the measure of compensation, then the salaries must be diminished in the one case, while they were augmented in the other. More than half of the interest of the Public Debt was paid at the Treasury of the United States, and it was well known that the general current transfers, instead of setting from the Treasury to the different Loan Offices and thus adding to their business, had taken an opposite direction, and thus considerably lessened it. He would not be understood to say, that the salaries were in every instance adequate, but, on the contrary, he believed that they were in some cases too low, and in others (particularly where perquisites were annexed) that they were exorbitantly high, and of course that a strict examination should be had, and a new scale adjusted, which would render compensations more adequate and equal, without any additional expense to the public. Whilst he was upon the floor, Mr. D. said that he should take the liberty of correcting the error into which several gentlemen had fallen, who had adduced the sums paid at each office, as the evidence of the relative quantum of business and of risk. The payment of ten cents was, he said, as troublesome, and required as many receipts and as much writing as ten dollars, and therefore not the sums paid, but the number of payments, would afford the only just criterion for ascertaining the relative extent of business. As to the risk of cash-keeping, to which it was said they who paid most were most subjected, it would be remembered, that the Loan Officers residing in the great cities were entirely freed from it by the agency of the banks, which were always for them sure places of deposit, and the cashiers were their paymasters. They therefore, who were thus situated, incurred less risk and trouble in the payment of two hundred thousand dollars, than other Loan Officers who resided in country towns not possessing the same advantages, incurred by the charge of safe-keeping and payment of twenty thousand dollars. In short, every argument which had been used, tended, in his opinion, to prove the impolicy and inequality which would be the inevitable consequence of the adoption of this part of the report, which he hoped would not be agreed to.

The question for striking out the clause was put and carried, 61 being in favor of it.

The Committee rose and reported the amendments, when the House took them up. The first being under consideration,

Mr. W. LYMAN moved to strike out the whole clause. He should not repeat his reasons for this motion, as he had before stated his objections to this clause to the Committee. He would mention one observation which had not been noticed by any one, which was, that the Attorney General was not precluded from any other business, which was not the case with the other officers of Government. So far from the appointment being an injury to him as a professional man, he believed it was the greatest recommendation which he could have, particularly to strangers who would conclude they might safely trust one whom Government had thus distinguished. He thought, therefore, that there was no argument in favor of advancing his salary which would not equally apply to every other officer of Government. This was an unfortunate time to propose an advance of salaries, when the revenues were so much embarrassed; but if this was not the case, he believed things would soon run to their former situation, and the rate of living become as reasonable as heretofore.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he had no connexion with this gentleman which would induce him to wish for an advance of his salary, if he were not convinced it was just and reasonable. He knew, from certain information, that when the receipts of his private business were added to his salary, they did not make his income equal to the other Heads of Departments.

Mr. MURRAY said, the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts had truly thrown great light upon the subject. It had been made, he believed, fifty times; it was neither any thing new or striking. The experience of two gentlemen, who had filled the office of Attorney General, Mr. M. said, was a very important one; the Attorney General had not only to decide upon questions put to him by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, but also by Congress. The report which he made last session, a copy of which had been called for this session, was alone worth one-half of his salary to any bookseller; yet this was extra business, and they were frequently calling upon him for reports.

The Attorney General, he said, ought not only to have an increase of salary, but also an office, and a clerk, if not a door-keeper; for he was obliged to keep a servant to return answers to messages sent to him. He hoped the motion would not prevail. They were not to expect petitions from these officers for advances to their salaries; such a thing might, perhaps, be gratifying to some gentlemen, but, he thought, it would not be very honorable to the Government.

Mr. S. SMITH thought his colleague had not sufficiently attended to the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He had said he might do other business; by which he supposed he meant he might keep a shop, or turn broker!

Mr. SITGREAVES called for the yeas and nays on the question to strike out the following words, viz: "That, in the opinion of the Committee, the compensations allowed by law to the Secretary of War and the Attorney General ought to be augmented, by an additional compensation of five hundred dollars per annum, to each of the said officers; and to commence on the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven:" it passed in the negative—yeas 39, nays 49, as follows:

The next amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House, for striking out the second clause of the said report, in the words following, to wit :

“That, in the opinion of the Committee, an addition of salary, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, ought to be allowed to each of the following officers, viz: The Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Department of War, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Treasurer, the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Commissioner of the Revenue, the Auditor, the Register, the Assistant Postmaster General, and the Keeper of Military Stores; and that such addition of salary ought to be at the rate of twenty-five cent. on the amount of the present compensation allowed by law, to each of the said officers, respectively,” being about to be put—

Mr. MURRAY said, though he wished not implicit confidence to be placed in the opinion of the PRESIDENT, yet he thought his having recommended this subject to their consideration ought to have some weight. No gentleman, he believed, would say that three thousand five hundred dollars was too high a salary for Heads of Departments in 1789, when they were settled. The Secretary of War, indeed, had only three thousand dollars. He believed if gentlemen compared the value of money now to the value of it then, it would be found that a sum would not purchase more than one-half now of what it would then have purchased. It was a dull thing, from having been so often repeated, to say that every necessary of life was advanced from fifty per cent. to one hundred per cent., and house rent in the same ratio: so that, in fact, a salary of three thousand five hundred dollars now, is only half what it was when it was fixed. And gentlemen from distant parts of the country, who think three thousand five hundred dollars a handsome sum for an annual income with them, when they recollect the price of living in Philadelphia, will at once see its inadequacy for a decent living for the officers of the Heads of Departments of our Government.

The consequence of this lowness of salary, is, Mr. M. said, either the officers leave their situations, or encroach upon their private fortunes. This was discouraging to the pride of character. You, by this means, put men in a dangerous situation. You do more, you set a precedent for a future Congress. At present, you have men of honor; but, by this means, you may retrograde from the character of office; you may drive first one corps of gentlemen from office and then another, until you force the PRESIDENT into the situation of filling the public offices with such persons as shall be willing to accept them, and not with such as shall be most fit to fill them. And what, said Mr. M., would you get in exchange for men of real pride of character? You would get men who would re-echo the sentiment which was frequently seen in the papers, and which was sometimes heard in that House, that there was a Republican mode of life! that it became a Republican Government, that their public officers should live with great economy, and with great austerity of life. You would meet with men also who would re-echo this sentiment, and who would live in the greatest style of simplicity; but you would mostly find lurking under this character designs of the basest kind; and, as a reward for this kind of penance, they would probably take care of themselves. He believed this would be the result; hypocrites would take the place of men of talents, and the public officers of Government would become contemptible. The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES would, of course, be chosen from amongst the highest characters in the nation, because chosen by the people at large, and because the salary is not contemptible; but the Executive would become low in estimation; and by degrees, such a conduct would go near to oversetting the Government itself. Mr. M. therefore cautioned the House against a refusal to advance the salaries before them.

The question was then put and agreed to—yeas 57, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS.—Theodorus Baily, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Nathan Bryan, Daniel Buck, Dempsey Burges, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, John CLOPTON, Isaac Coles, Samuel W. last clause of the said report, in the words following, to wit:

"That, in the opinion of the Committee, an additional compensation ought to be made for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, to each of the Loan Officers of the States of Massachusetts and New York; and that each of the said officers ought to be allowed the further sum of three hundred and seventy-five dollars, for the present year; and, likewise, three hundred dollars, to be distributed, at their discretion, among the clerks in their respective offices, in addition to the compensations heretofore allowed by law, to the said clerks; and that the sum of one hundred and twenty dollars, ought to be allowed to the Loan Officer of the State of Pennsylvania, to be in like manner distributed among the clerks in his office, for the present year"— was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House—yeas 60, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS.—Theodorus Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Nathan Bryan, Daniel Buck, Dempsey Burges, Samuel J. Cabell, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, John Clopton, Joshua Coit, Isaac Coles, Samuel W. Dana, George Dent, William Findley, Jesse Franklin, Nathaniel Freeman, jr., Albert Gallatin, William B. Sherburne, Samuel Sitgreaves, William Smith, John E. Van Allen, Peleg Wadsworth, and John Williams.

And then, the main question being taken that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole in the said report, amended to read as follows:

"That, in the opinion of the Committee, the compensation allowed by law to the Attorney General, ought to be augmented, by an additional compensation of five hundred dollars per annum, and to commence on the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven."

"That, in the opinion of the Committee, the act entitled 'An act to regulate the compensation of clerks,' passed the thirtieth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, ought to be continued during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and no longer."

On a division of the House, it was resolved in the affirmative—ayes 45, noes 34.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said report, as amended, and that Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. DAVENPORT, do prepare and bring in the same.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1797.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the subject of appropriations for the year 1797, when the article which relates to the contingent expenses of the two branches of the Legislature, amounting to twelve thousand dollars, being read,

Mr. BALDWIN said, he had often before made the remark, (and he thought it not unseasonable now to repeat it,) that the House was too apt to be merely formal and superficial in passing on the general estimate for the year. He was sorry to observe that this item had within this year or two been considerably increased; he believed the price of wood, stationery, and other articles purchased for the session, was now much the same as in 1795, though the Printer's bills might be higher, yet, as the session would be but three months, he thought the sum allowed for 1795 would be sufficient. He had always thought this charge for the contingencies of the two Houses, one of the strongest instances of that kind of loose economy which it has been complained, and perhaps with too much justice, pervades all the operations of the Federal Government—we have often been reminded that, to make an expedition into the woods to an Indian town, or to build a frigate, or to coin one hundred tons of copper, costs us a great deal more than it ever did any other Government in this country. If this is a strong instance of that style of economy, let us begin the reformation with ourselves, and not be so prodigal this year in our contingent expense; our circumstances calls on us for greater attention to economy. He was sensible the place for correcting these evils was ordinarily on passing the law authorizing the expense, and not on the appropriation for the payment of it; but this item, and many others, depended on no law—changing the sum in the estimate will control the expense. If any one will take the trouble of looking over the vouchers on which these accounts have been settled for past years, he will see that there is room for more economy. One branch of the Legislature consists of about thirty members—four thousand dollars is a great sum for the purchase of their wood, quills, and paper, and for furnishing them with copies of business under consideration. Is it possible that twelve thousand dollars can be necessary for the two Houses? The whole yearly expenses of some of the State Governments do not amount to a much greater sum—he hoped this would be struck out, and the sum which was allowed for 1795, and some preceding years, be inserted.

Mr. SMITH presumed the estimate was founded upon information received from the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of that House. He did not conceive it would make any difference in the expenditure, whether a larger or smaller sum be appropriated; as he did not suppose the Senate or that House would print the less because a less sum was appropriated. The gentleman, he said, might, by his speech, give an idea to the public, that this would be a saving of so much money; but it would, in reality, make no difference.

After a few observations from other members, the question was put and negatived—37 to 30.

The Committee then rose, and had leave to sit again. And the House adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, January 30.

GEORGE LEONARD, from Massachusetts, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the committee appointed to bring in a bill to alter and amend the act for ascertaining and fixing the Military Establishment, reported a bill, which was twice read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

A report was made by Mr. NICHOLAS and read from the committee appointed to inquire into the progress made in the sale of lands Northwest of the river Ohio and above the mouth of Kentucky river. The report was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SWANWICK moved, that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from the further consideration of the bill relative to certain officers, collectors of duties and tonnage, as to additional compensation. This was, that it might be referred back to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. This was done accordingly.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the memorial of Richard D'Cantillon and Daniel Lefferts, owners of a ship which had been sold under execution, through the want of a register, which had been lost, and a new one could not be obtained, without delivering the old one up; on account of this, they reported the following resolution:

“Resolved, That provision be made by law for granting certificates of registry, enrollment, and licenses, without surrendry of the old ones, in certain cases on sales, by proof of law, of any ship or vessel.”

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in accordingly by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

MANUMITTED SLAVES.

Mr. SWANWICK presented the following petition:

To the President, Senate, and House of Representatives.

The Petition and Representation of the under-named Freemen, respectfully sheweth:—

That, being of African descent, late inhabitants and natives of North Carolina, to you only, under God, can we apply with any hope of effect, for redress of our grievances, having been compelled to leave the State wherein we had a right of residence, as freemen liberated under the hand and seal of humane and conscientious masters, the validity of which act of justice, in restoring us to our native right of freedom, was confirmed by judgment of the Superior Court of North Carolina, wherein it was brought to trial; yet, not long after this decision, a law of that State was enacted, under which men of cruel disposition, and void of just principle, received countenance and authority in violently seizing, imprisoning, and selling into slavery, such as had been so emancipated; whereby we were reduced to the necessity of separating from some of our nearest and most tender connexions, and of seeking refuge in such parts of the Union where more regard is paid to the public declaration in favor of liberty and the common right of men, several hundreds, under our circumstances, having, in consequence of the said law, been hunted day and night, like beasts of the forest, by armed men with dogs, and made a prey of as free and lawful plunder. Among others thus exposed, I, Jupiter Nicholson, of Perquimans county, North Carolina, after being set free by my master, Thomas Nicholson, and having been about two years employed as a seaman in the service of Zachary Nickson, on coming on shore, was pursued by men with dog and arms; but was favored to escape by night to Virginia, with my wife, who was manumitted by Gabriel Cosand, where I resided about four years in the town of Portsmouth, chiefly employed in sawing boards and scantling; from thence I removed with my wife to Philadelphia, where I have been employed, at times, by water, working along shore, or sawing wood. I left behind me a father and mother, who were manumitted by Thomas Nicholson and Zachary Dickson; they have been since taken up, with a beloved brother, and sold into cruel bondage.

I, Jacob Nicholson, also of North Carolina, being set free by my master, Joseph Nicholson, but continuing to live with him till, being pursued day and night, I was obliged to leave my abode, sleep in the woods, and stacks in the fields, &c., to escape the hands of violent men who, induced by the profit afforded them by law, followed this course as a business; at length, by night, I made my escape, leaving a mother, one child, and two brothers, to see whom I dare not return.

I, Job Albert, manumitted by Benjamin Albertson, who was my careful guardian to protect me from being afterwards taken and sold, providing me with a house to accommodate me and my wife, who was liberated by William Robertson; but we were night and day hunted by men armed with guns, swords, and pistols, accompanied with mastiff dogs; from whose violence, being one night apprehensive of immediate danger, I left my dwelling, locked and barred, and fastened with a chain, being at some distance from it, while my wife was by my kind master locked up under his roof. I heard them break into my house, where, not finding their prey, they got but a small booty, a handkerchief of about a dollar value, and some provisions; but, not long after, I was discovered and seized by Alexander Stafford, William Stafford, and Thomas Creevy, who were armed with guns and clubs. After binding me with my hands behind me, and a rope round my arms and body, they took me about four miles to Hartford prison, where I lay four weeks, suffering much for want of provision; from thence, with the assistance of a fellow-prisoner, (a white man,) I made my escape, and for three dollars was conveyed, with my wife, by a humane person, in a covered wagon by night, to Virginia, where, in the neighborhood of Portsmouth, I continued unmolested about four years, being chiefly engaged in sawing boards and plank. On being advised to move Northward, I came with my wife to Philadelphia, where I have labored for a livelihood upwards of two years, in Summer mostly, along shore in vessels and stores, and sawing wood in the Winter. My mother was set free by Phineas Nickson, my sister by John Trueblood, and both taken up and sold into slavery, myself deprived of the consolation of seeing them, without being exposed to the like grievous oppression.

I, Thomas Pritchett, was set free by my master Thomas Pritchett, who furnished me with land to raise provisions for my use, where I built myself a house, cleared a sufficient spot of woodland to produce ten bushels of corn; the second year about fifteen, and the third, had as much planted as I suppose would have produced thirty bushels; this I was obliged to leave about one month before it was fit for gathering, being threatened by Holland Lockwood, who married my said master's widow, that if I would not come and serve him, he would apprehend me, and send me to the West Indies; Enoch Ralph also threatening to send me to jail, and sell me for the good of the country: being thus in jeopardy, I left my little farm, with my small stock and utensils, and my corn standing, and escaped by night into Virginia, where shipping myself for Boston, I was, through stress of weather landed in New York, where I served as a waiter for seventeen months; but my mind being distressed on account of the situation of my wife and children, I returned to Norfolk in Virginia, with a hope of at least seeing them, if I could not obtain their freedom; but finding I was advertised in the newspaper, twenty dollars the reward for apprehending me, my dangerous situation obliged me to leave Virginia, disappointed of seeing my wife and children, coming to Philadelphia, where I resided in the employment of a waiter upward of two years.

In addition to the hardship of our own case, as above set forth, we believe ourselves warranted, on the present occasion, in offering to your consideration the singular case of a fellow-black now confined in the jail of this city, under sanction of the act of General Government, called the Fugitive Law, as it appears to us a flagrant proof how far human beings, merely on account of color and complexion, are, through prevailing prejudice, outlawed and excluded from common justice and common humanity, by the operation of such partial laws in support of habits and customs cruelly oppressive. This man, having been many years past manumitted by his master in North Carolina, was under the authority of the aforementioned law of that State, sold again into slavery, and, after having served his purchaser upwards of six years, made his escape to Philadelphia, where he has resided eleven years, having a wife and our children; and, by an agent of the Carolina claimer, has been lately apprehended and committed to prison, his said claimer, soon after the man's escaping from him, having advertised him, offering a reward of ten silver dollars to any person that would bring him back, or five times that sum to any person that would make due proof of his being killed, and no questions asked by whom.

We beseech your impartial attention to our hard condition, not only with respect to our personal sufferings, as freemen, but as a class of that people who, distinguished by color, are therefore with a degrading partiality, considered by many, even of those in eminent stations, as unentitled to that public justice and protection which is the great object of Government. We indulge not a hope, or presume to ask for the interposition of your honorable body, beyond the extent of your Constitutional power or influence, yet are willing to believe your serious, disinterested, and candid consideration of the premises, under the benign impressions of equity and mercy, producing upright exertion of what is in your power, may not be without some salutary effect, both for our relief as a people, and towards the removal of obstructions to public order and well-being.

If, notwithstanding all that has been publicly avowed as essential principles respecting the extent of human right to freedom; notwithstanding we have had that right restored to us, so far as was in the power of those by whom we were held as slaves, we cannot claim the privilege of representation in your councils, yet we trust we may address you as fellow-men, who, under God, the sovereign Ruler of the Universe, are intrusted with the distribution of justice, for the terror of evil-doers, the encouragement and protection of the innocent, not doubting that you are men of liberal minds, susceptible of benevolent feelings and clear conception of rectitude to a catholic extent, who can admit that black people (servile as their condition generally is throughout this Continent) have natural affections, social and domestic attachments and sensibilities; and that, therefore, we may hope for a share in your sympathetic attention while we represent that the unconstitutional bondage in which multitudes of our fellows in complexion are held, is to us a subject sorrowfully affecting; for we cannot conceive their condition (more especially those who have been emancipated and tasted the sweets of liberty, and again reduced to slavery by kidnappers and man-stealers) to be less afflicting or deplorable than the situation of citizens of the United States, captured and enslaved through the unrighteous policy prevalent in Algiers. We are far from considering all those who retain slaves as wilful oppressors, being well assured that numbers in the State from whence we are exiles, hold their slaves in bondage, not of choice, but possessing them by inheritance, feel their minds burdened under the slavish restraint of legal impediments to doing that justice which they are convinced is due to fellow-rationals. May we not be allowed to consider this stretch of power, morally and politically, a Governmental defect, if not a direct violation of the declared fundamental principles of the Constitution; and finally, is not some remedy for an evil of such magnitude highly worthy of the deep inquiry and unfeigned zeal of the supreme Legislative body of a free and enlightened people? Submitting our cause to God, and humbly craving your best aid and influence, as you may be favored and directed by that wisdom which is from above, where-with that you may be eminently dignified and rendered conspicuously, in the view of nations, a blessing to the people you represent, is the sincere prayer of your petitioners.

PHILADELPHIA, January 23, 1797.

The petition being read—

Mr. SWANWICK said, he hoped it would be referred to a select committee.

Mr. BLOUNT hoped it would not even be received by the House. Agreeably to a law of the State of North Carolina, he said they were slaves, and could, of course, be seized as such.

Mr. THATCHER thought the petition ought to be referred to the Committee on the Fugitive Law. He conceived the gentleman much mistaken in asserting these petitioners to be absolute slaves. They state that they were slaves, but that their masters manumitted them, and that their manumissions were sanctioned by a law of that State, but that a subsequent law of the same State, subjected them to slavery; and if even there was a law that allowed them to be taken and sold into slavery again, he could not see any propriety in refusing their petition in that House—THEY CERTAINLY (said Mr. T.) ARE FREE PEOPLE. It appeared they were taken under the fugitive act, which he thought ought not to affect them; they now came and prayed the House so to model that fugitive act, as to prevent its affecting persons of their description. He therefore saw great propriety in referring their petition to the committee appointed to amend that act in another part; they could as well consider its relation to the present case. He could not see how there would be a propriety in rejecting their petition; they had an undoubted right to petition the House, and to be heard.

Mr. SWANWICK was surprised at the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BLOUNT] desiring to reject this petition; he could not have thought, nor could he indulge the suspicion now, that the gentleman was so far from acknowledging the rights of man, as to prevent any class of men from petitioning. If men were aggrieved, and conceive they have claim to attention, petitioning was their sacred right, and that right should never suffer innovation; whether the House ought to grant, was another question. The subject of their petition had a claim to the attention of the House. They state they were freed from slavery, but that they were much injured under a law of the United States. If a law was ever made that bore hard on any class of people, Mr. S. hoped that the door would never be shut to their complaints. If the circumstance respecting these people was as they stated, their case was very hard. He animadverted on the atrocity of that reward of ten dollars offered for one of them if taken alive, but that fifty should be given if found dead, and no questions asked. Was not this, he said, encouragement to put a period to that man's existence? Horrid reward! Could gentlemen hear it and not shudder?

Mr. BLOUNT said, the gentleman last up was mistaken in calling the petitioners free men; the laws of North Carolina, as he observed before, did not suffer individuals to emancipate their slaves, and he should wish to know what evidence there was to prove these men free, and except that was proved, the House had no right to attend to the petition.

Mr. SITGREAVES, in answer to the gentleman last up, said he would reverse his question, and ask what evidence he had to prove that these men are not freemen; can he prove they are slaves? They have stated that a law has been made in North Carolina with a view to affect their case, and bring them again into a worse slavery than before; they want to know whether they cannot obtain relief by their application to the Government of the United States. Under these circumstances, Mr. S. wished to know why their petitions should not be taken into consideration? Was there anything in these men, he asked, that should prevent every kind of assistance being bestowed on them? Had they not an equal right to be heard with other petitioners? He hoped the House would not only give them a hearing, but afford them all the consolation of which their unfortunate case was susceptible. If the House were obliged, through a want of power to extend to the case, to object compliance with the prayers, yet, he hoped it would be done with all due tenderness; before hearing them, he thought it would be exceedingly unjust to decide. These people may produce documents sufficient to obtain favorable attention; therefore, it was impossible before they were heard to conceive whether the House could constitutionally grant relief or not. He could see no impropriety in referring it; the object of referring a case, was to inquire into facts; thus, the committee prepared the way for discussion in the House; and why the House should refuse to deliberate and discuss this case, he knew not.

Mr. HEATH was clearly convinced these people were slaves, and therefore hoped their petition would lie on the table. He would remind the gentleman that, if they undertook this business, they would soon have petitions enough of the same kind, and public business would be thereby prevented. It appeared to him to be more within the jurisdiction of the Legislature of that State; indeed, the United States had nothing to do with it.

Mr. MADISON said, he should be sorry to reject any petition whatever, in which it became the business of the House to attend; but he thought this case had no claim on their attention. Yet, if it did not come within the purview of the Legislative body, he thought, it might be suffered to lie on the table. He thought it a Judicial case, and could obtain its due in a Court of Appeal in that State. If they are free by the laws of North Carolina, they ought to apply to those laws, and have their privilege established. If they are slaves, the Constitution gives them no hopes of being heard here. A law has been passed to prevent the owners of those slaves emancipating them; it is therefore impossible that any relief can be granted. The petitioners are under the laws of North Carolina, and those laws cannot be the interpreters of the laws of the United States.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, he was not prepared to deny that this petition is in the situation the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] states; nor was he prepared to prove that it came under the power of the General Government, but he could see no kind of reason why it should not be sent to a committee who should examine the case and report whether it required Legislative interference, or whether it was a subject of Judicial authority in the country whence the petitioners came. Many petitions, he said, were sent to the House, who referred them for investigation to a committee, and many had been reported as being under Judicial power only, and as such been rejected here. If this underwent the same order, and should be found to be of a Judicial nature, the committee would report so, and the House would honorably refuse it. This he thought the only just method.

Mr. RUTHERFORD concurred with the gentleman

Manumitted Slaves.

[H. OF R.]

from Pennsylvania, that this memorial ought to be referred to a committee who would report whether these people had been emancipated, according to a law of the State of North Carolina, or not. The circumstances attending this case, he said, demanded a just and full investigation, and if a law did exist either to emancipate, or send these poor people into slavery, the House would then know. He doubted not, every thing just and proper would be done, but he hoped every due respect would be paid to the petition. In short, he was assured every member in the House would wish to act consistently. This case, from the great hardships represented in the petition, applied closely to the nicest feelings of the heart, and he hoped humanity would dictate a just decision.

Mr. GILBERT hoped the petition would be referred to the committee proposed; he thought it laid claim to the humanity of the House. He thought every just satisfaction should be given, and attention paid, to every class of persons who appeal for decision to the House.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the practice of a former time, in a similar case, was, that the petition was sealed up and sent back to the petitioners, not being allowed even to remain on the files of the office. This method, he said, ought to be pursued with respect to the present petition. It was not a matter that claimed the attention of the Legislature of the United States. He thought it of such an improper nature, as to be surprised any gentleman would present a petition of the kind. These men are slaves, and, he thought, not entitled to attention from that body; to encourage slaves to petition the House would have a tendency to invite continual applications. Indeed it would tend to spread an alarm throughout the Southern States; it would act as an "entering-wedge," whose consequences could not be foreseen. This is a kind of property on which the House has no power to legislate. He hoped it would not be committed at all; it was not a proper subject for Legislative attention. He was not of the opinion of some gentlemen, that the House were bound to sit on every question recommended to their notice. He thought particular attention ought to be paid to the lateness of the session; if this subject were to be considered, too much time of the House would be devoured which was much wanted on important business.

Mr. THATCHER said, he was in favor of referring this petition. He could see no reason which had been adduced to prove the impropriety of receiving a petition from these people. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BLOUNT] is of the opinion that these people being slaves, the House ought not to pay attention to their prayer. This, he said, was quite new language—a system of conduct which he never saw the House practise, and hoped he never should. That the House should not receive a petition without an evidence to prove it was from a free man. This was a language which opposed the Constitutional freedom of every State where the Declaration of Rights had been made; they all declare that every man is born equally free, and that each have an equal right to petition if aggrieved—this doctrine he never heard objected to.

The gentlemen from Virginia [Mr. MADISON and Mr. HEATH] had said, it was a Judicial and not a Legislative question; they say the petition proves it, and that it ought not to be attended to. Mr. T. said, he saw no proof whatever of the impropriety of the House receiving it. There might be some Judicial question growing out of the case; but that was no reason, because it might possibly undergo a Judicial course, that the General Government were not to be petitioned. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] had said, "that this was a kind of property on which the House could not legislate;" but he would answer, this was a kind of property on which they were bound to legislate. The fugitive act could prove this authority; if petitions were not to be received they would have to legislate in the dark. It appeared plainly that these men were manumitted by their masters; and because a number of men who called themselves legislators should, after they had the actual enjoyment of their liberty, come forward and say that these men should not remain at liberty, and actually authorize their recaptivity, he thought it exceedingly unjust to deprive them of the right of petitioning to have their injuries redressed. These were a set of men on whom the fugitive law had no power, and he thought they claimed protection under the power of that House, which always ought to lean towards freedom. Though they could not give freedom to slaves, yet he hoped gentlemen would never refuse to lend their aid to secure freemen in their rights against tyrannical imposition.

Mr. CHRISTIE thought no part of the fugitive act operated against freedom. He thought no good could be derived from sending the petition to a committee; they could not prove whether they were slaves or not. He was much surprised any gentleman in the House should present such a petition. Mr. C. said, he was of the same opinion with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that the petition ought to be sent back again. He hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] would never hand such another petition into the House.

Mr. HOLLAND said, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THATCHER] said, "the House ought to lean towards freedom." Did he mean to set all slaves at liberty, or receive petitions from all? Sure he was, that if this was received, it would not be long before the table would be filled with similar complaints, and the House might sit for no other purpose than to hear them. It was a Judicial question, and the House ought not to pretend to determine the point; why, then, should they take up time upon it? To put an end to it he hoped, it would be ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MACON said, he had hearkened very closely to the observations of gentlemen on the subject, and could see no reason to alter his desire that it would not be committed. No man, he said, wished to encourage petitions more than himself and no man had considered this subject more. These men could not receive any aid from the General Government; but by application to the State, justice would be done them. Trials of this kind had very frequently been brought on in all the different Courts of that State, and had very often ended in the freedom of slaves; the appeal was fair, and justice was done. Mr. M. thought it a very delicate subject for the General Government to act on; he hoped it would not be committed; but he should not be sorry if the proposition of a gentleman [Mr. SMITH] was to take place, that it was to be sent back again.

Mr. W. SMITH observed, that a gentleman [Mr. THATCHER] had uttered a wish to draw these people from their state of slavery to liberty. Mr. S. did not think they were sent there to take up the subject of emancipation. When subjects of this kind are brought up in the House they ought to be deprecated as dangerous. They tended to produce very uncomfortable circumstances.

Mr. VARNUM said, the petitioners had received injury under a law of the United States, (the fugitive act) and not merely a law of North Carolina, and therefore, he thought, they had an undoubted right to the attention of the General Government if that act bore hard on them. They stated themselves to be freemen, and he did not see any opposition of force to convince the House they were not; surely it could not be said that color alone should designate them as slaves. If these people had been free, and yet were taken up under a law of the United States, and put into prison, then it appeared plainly the duty of the House to inquire whether that act had such an unjust tendency, and if it had, proper amendments should be made to it to prevent the like consequences in future. It required nothing more under that act than that the person suspected should be brought before a single magistrate, and evidence given that he is a slave, which evidence the magistrate could not know if distant from the State; the person may be a freeman, for it would not be easy to know whether the evidence was good, at a distance from the State; the poor man is then sent to his State in slavery. Mr. V. hoped the House would take all possible care that freemen should not be made slaves; to be deprived of liberty was more important than to be deprived of property. He could not think why gentlemen should be against having the fact examined; if it appears that they are slaves, the petition will of course be dismissed, but if it should appear they are free, and receive injury under the fugitive act, the United States ought to amend it, so that justice should be done.

Mr. BLOUNT said, admitting those persons who had been taken up were sent back to North Carolina, they would then have permission to apply to any of the Courts in the State for a fair trial of their plea; there are very few Courts in which some negroes have not tried this cause, and obtained their liberty. He agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, on the freedom of these men to procure their rights; it did not appear to him that they were free; true they had been set free, but that manumission was from their masters, who had not a right to set them free without permission of the Legislature.

Mr. KITCHELL could not see what objection could obtain to prevent these people being heard. The question was not now, whether they are or are not slaves, but it is on a law of the United States. They assert that this law does act injuriously to them; the question is, therefore, whether a committee shall be appointed to inquire on the improper force of this law on the case of these men; if they are freemen, he said, they ought not to be sent back from the most distant part of the United States to North Carolina, to have justice done them, but they ought to receive it from the General Government who made the law they complain of.

Mr. K. said, he had not examined the force of the law on the subject, and was not prepared to decide; there could be no evil in referring it for examination, when the committee would report their opinion of the subject and gentlemen be prepared to act on it.

On the question for receiving the petition being put, it was negatived—ayes 33, noes 50.

STATEMENTS OF REVENUE.

Mr. HARPER laid upon the table an alteration to the resolution which he had brought forward some days ago, relative to certain annual statements of revenue being laid before the House, viz: to omit what related to a list of all the officers employed, and the compensations allowed to each, as he found it would be inconvenient to obtain such a list.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1797.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the subject of appropriations for the year 1797. The sum estimated for the expense of the Legislature being under consideration,

Mr. S. SMITH moved that, instead of six months, three should be inserted; as the time which Congress would sit this year would not be longer than that period.

Mr. GALLATIN wished the gentleman would agree to insert four, instead of three months, as he believed, the whole of the money appropriated last year was expended; and there would, consequently be December, in last year, and January, February, and December, in this year, to be provided for.

Mr. SITGREAVES wished to know whether the present session only was included, or whether December in the next was calculated? If the estimate extended to the next session, he thought the amendment should not take place, because there might be cause for fixing their meeting at an earlier day before they separated; or the President might convene them at an earlier day than usual, if he saw occasion. If this should be the case and the appropriation was made only for four months, embarrassment might be the consequence; but no inconvenience could arise from granting more than was wanted, as the expense was of such a nature as could readily be checked.

Mr. NICHOLAS concurred in opinion with the gentleman last up.

JANUARY, 1797.]

Appropriations for 1797.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. VARNUM thought differently. He was not for voting for any one object more than appeared to be necessary. If, as had been supposed, the session would be longer than was at present expected, an additional appropriation might be made; but he was against locking up sums of money in too large appropriations, which might be wanted for other purposes. He thought three months would be a sufficient estimate, viz: two in this session, and one in the next.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, it would be well for the Committee to consider, that the Senate might sit after the House of Representatives adjourned, or be called together again. He would, therefore, wish the motion to be confined to that House only.

The motion for striking out "six" and inserting "four" was carried.

The sums of money appropriated were altered of course.

Mr. GALLATIN moved that $30,000 should be inserted in place of $34,000, for defraying the expenses of clerks of Courts, jurors, and witnesses, in aid of the funds arising from fines, forfeitures, and penalties; and likewise for defraying the expenses of prosecutions for offences against the United States, and for safe-keeping of prisoners. $30,000 was thought sufficient last year, and it had been found so, or the Secretary of the Treasury would have reported a deficiency.

Mr. GREENUP said this sum had vastly increased, and he wished it to be reduced lower than proposed. It was formerly $12,000, and he knew not why it should now be more.

Mr. THATCHER said it was impossible to say, to $3,000 or $4,000, what would be necessary under this head. He had no objection to reduce the sum, though he could see no inconvenience which could arise from the sum remaining as it stood.

Mr. S. SMITH moved that the sum might be left blank, that they might ascertain the sum necessary. Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CORR, the compensation for messengers and office-keepers to the Treasurer of the United States, the Purveyor of the Treasury, and an assistant office-keeper to the Secretary of State, were struck out, on the ground of their being new items.

Mr. GALLATIN said, in the Purveyor of the Treasury's office was a clerk, said to be there in pursuance of the act of May 30, 1796. That act, he remarked, did not make provision for any new clerk; it only gave a power to apportion a sum of money among the clerks then employed. He therefore moved to strike out that item of $500. Agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN believed the item of $800 for printing an edition of the laws had been copied from an old estimate, without considering that a new edition of the laws was now printing. It had been customary heretofore, he said, to print an edition of the laws at the close of every session—two copies of which were sent to every member; but as there had been a law passed for printing 5,000 copies of the whole laws, he conceived there was no necessity for the item alluded to, as one edition of the laws would be sufficient.

Mr. W. SMITH did not think, with the gentleman from Georgia, that the item alluded to was unnecessary. He believed it was necessary there should be a small edition of the laws at the end of the session. The edition of the laws to which the gentleman had alluded, would not be out for some time, and it had been usual for members to have the laws of the session sent to them soon after adjournment. It was also necessary that the officers of the revenue, Judges, &c., should have copies of the laws as soon as possible after they were passed.

Mr. CORR said there was a copy of every law printed on a sheet as soon as passed, a copy of which was laid upon the desk of each member, which he supposed was meant by this item.

Mr. SWIFT observed, that by a law of the 3d of March, 1795, 5,000 copies of the laws were ordered to be printed; 4,500 of which were to be distributed among the different States, and the other 500 to be disposed of as may be hereafter by law directed. This edition will make four volumes; but he thought it would be convenient to have a number of the laws printed off, as heretofore, to make complete sets of those already in the hands of members. This, he said, would not be attended with much additional expense, as the types would be set for the other edition, and there would, therefore, only be the press-work and paper to pay for. He thought the $300 might be reduced to $300.

Mr. BALDWIN conceived that, as there were $1,600 in the next line for an edition of the laws of this session, the $800 in question need not be retained. $2,400 appeared too much for printing the laws of one session.

Mr. SWANWICK said he believed $1,600 would pay for printing all the laws they should pass this session.

Mr. HARPER thought both editions necessary.

The question for striking out was put and negatived—sixteen only being for it.

Mr. GREENUP said he found two items, $1,500 each, for striking Mediterranean passports. He thought one was sufficient, and moved to strike out the other. Besides, he thought the expense enormous.

Mr. S. SMITH said it would be necessary to preserve this item, as a very considerable revenue arose from thence. Our Captains, he said, were obliged to carry one of these, and if they were not appropriated for, they could not be had.

Mr. W. SMITH said it would be seen that one of the items was for last year, which was not then appropriated for; but, the expense having been incurred, it must be paid.

The question was put and negatived.

Mr. HOLLAND thought the Mint Establishment was of no use to the United States; he therefore proposed to strike out the whole estimate of $10,600 for that department.

This motion not being seconded, fell to the ground of course.

Mr. CORR moved to strike out $350, appropriated for stationery, office-rent, &c., for the Governor of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) thought it deserved to be considered whether this item had been before allowed.

Mr. COIT said, if it had been allowed, he doubted the propriety of it. The salaries allowed he thought sufficiently ample without this contingent.

Mr. GALLATIN said there had always been this charge allowed heretofore, and he should therefore be against striking it out.

The question was put and negatived.

Mr. SWIFT believed the youngest children of the late Major General Warren were now of age, and therefore the $450 dollars heretofore allowed them might be struck out. Agreed to.

Mr. S. made a similar motion with respect to the son of the late Major General Mercer; but, on its appearing that there was at least a probability he wanted yet a few months of being 21 years of age, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. GALLATIN moved that the $7,000 appropriated for the wages of persons employed in the Mint should be left a blank, as there was a committee on that subject, who had not yet reported. Agreed to.

Mr. G. said, the next head was the Diplomatic department, which had always been considered as a separate subject. Indeed, some inquiries would be necessary with respect to one of the items at least. He should move therefore for the Committee to rise, and report that part of the estimate which had been agreed to.

Mr. W. SMITH did not see any reason why the Committee should rise. Any inquiry might as well be made now as at any future day. They had no law this session before them. An extra expense of the Diplomatic department would probably come in, in the current expenses of the year. He did not expect any other information on the subject. There remained, to be provided for, $67,900. The items were before them, and could be determined upon. It would be better to pass the whole together than to have a separate act. This estimate, he said, would be referred to the committee to bring in a bill, and undergo further discussion. He did not see why they should have a separate bill. He saw no reason for detaching this any more than any other subject.

Mr. GREENUP said information was necessary on some of the items, and he hoped the Committee would rise.

Mr. GALLATIN said there was a charge of $50,000 for continuing the prosecution of the claims of our citizens, whose property had been captured by the belligerent Powers. He wished some check to be put upon this expenditure. He wished an inquiry as to the quantum of expense required in this business. He did not think they were justified in appropriating money to a large extent, upon which there was no check but the will of the PRESIDENT. It would, perhaps, appear extraordinary that he, who was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, should want information on this subject; but this item had never come into discussion in that committee when he was present, and, he believed, had been introduced into the estimate as a matter of course. He therefore wished the Committee to rise, and he thought it would be best to have the appropriations for this department in an act by itself.

Mr. W. SMITH said it would be recollected that, in the estimate of the Secretary of State last session, there was an estimate of $50,000 for this object, and that, after a full discussion, a majority of that House had agreed to it. This, therefore, had sanctioned the principle of continuing this charge. The only question was as to the quantity. If $50,000 were thought too much, the sum might be struck out, and left a blank, to be filled up hereafter.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he believed the House meant last session (at least he could speak for himself) to vote for a sum of money for the purpose in question, and not that they would go to any length in the business. Indeed, he should be disposed to ask for an account of the expenditure of the money they had voted last session, before he thought of voting for more. The question would now come up in a very different manner from what it did then.

Mr. SWANWICK said it would be very desirable to know the success which our agents had had in Europe, in the recovery of the property of which our citizens had been despoiled, before fresh sums of money were voted on that account; because, if the speculations were to be continued, that House was concurring with the British and French in their attacks upon the property of our citizens, by thus voting away their money. If the whole of this money, he said, were to be expended upon the English lawyers, it would be a harvest for them, and it would be their interest to foment disputes betwixt the two countries. He was therefore in favor of the Committee's rising.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out this item altogether.

Mr. SEWALL hoped it would not be struck out: he trusted the item would be preserved. If the sum should be thought too large, it might be left a blank. It was well known, agents had been employed in the business, and what the extent of the expense would be, could not now be told. At any rate the sum should be appropriated.

Mr. NICHOLAS did not think they had information enough before them to know whether any further sum was necessary. What had been appropriated might prove sufficient; but if they were to go on appropriating, there could be no doubt but the expense would keep pace with their liberality in granting money.

Mr. SWANWICK wished the Committee to rise. They were told that the Diplomatic department was to cost $107,000, from which was to be deducted the regular annual appropriation of $40,000, which left a sum of $67,900 to be provided. They had, last session, been called upon for $50,000 to prosecute our claims against the British for their spoliations. Those spoliations were continued, and they were now called upon for a further sum of $50,000. He supposed, another year, since the French were now following the example of the British, in committing spoliations on our property, $150,000 would be wanted to prosecute our claims against both nations. He hoped, when this money was granted last session for adjusting the claims of our merchants, that those spoiliations would not have been continued; but they heard every day of our vessels being seized and carried into Martinique. Indeed, it would be the interest of Great Britain to prevent these claims being settled, while they can receive from us an annual income of $50,000.

Mr. THATCHER said he knew of no good answer by traveling to Great Britain, France, Martinique, &c., when speaking on the present subject. It was well known, that, in consequence of depredations committed on the commerce of this country, agents had been appointed, in order to obtain redress: the business was in train. These facts were enough to justify the item. If it was necessary to gain information as to the sum necessary, the $50,000 might be struck out until due inquiry was made; but he would by all means preserve the item.

Mr. SEWALL said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWANWICK] seemed to think the Diplomatic department ought to be swallowed up by the War department. Means, Mr. S. said, had been provided by the British Treaty for the settlement of the spoiliations committed upon our commerce by that nation. Perhaps the same means might hereafter be agreed upon with France; but he trusted they should never suffer our citizens to be kept in bondage in any country, for the sake of a few thousand dollars employed under the head of the Diplomatic department. In his opinion, money spent in a diplomatic and peaceable way was much better expended than in building navies and preparing for war. It was necessary Government should undertake the settlement of this business, since merchants could not do it for themselves. They might, indeed, if Government permitted and sanctioned them, fit out letters-of-marque and make reprisals; but as Government had chosen a peaceable course in preference, it was desirable that they should pursue it.

Mr. SWANWICK gave the gentleman from Massachusetts credit for his remark on the War and Diplomatic departments. Mr. S. said he thought the Diplomatic department nearly allied to the Military; and that the latter naturally grew out of the former; because, if disputes were not continually engendered, these gentlemen would have nothing to do; and while they could receive $20,000 annually for an employment of this kind, they would so contrive the business as not to want employment. And while one country received $50,000 a year, to be expended in law-suits to adjust spoiliations committed upon our commerce, it would hold out inducements to other nations to use us in a similar manner, since they saw that they may do it with impunity. For his own part, he wished for peace as much as any man, but he would wish to preserve that peace with honor.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) conceived it to be their duty, before they agreed to the item under consideration, amounting to 50,000 dollars, to consider well whether the United States were in any degree obligated to defray from the general Treasury, the expenses of prosecuting the claims in question. Without determining how far the grant of a sum, to the extent and in the words here mentioned, might be justly construed into an assumption, on the part of the Government, of the charges to arise in future, there was reason to apprehend that it would be so considered. He still thought, as he had thought and declared last year, that no money ought to be granted upon that principle, and that the amount contemplated was far too great upon any other principle whatever. He would therefore be in favor of striking out 50,000 dollars, and leaving a blank to be filled in the bill after the object of this expenditure had been more fully explained and understood. Mr. D. avowed his unwillingness to appropriate more than a tenth part of that sum for the purpose expressed. He was aware that our Government might be called upon to procure, through the public agents in the West Indies and other channels, various documents and extracts from the registry or records in the Courts of Vice Admiralty of Great Britain, which might aid the appeals prosecuting in the higher Courts. Such useful and necessary papers might probably be best procured through the interference and influence of the Executive of this country with its agents resident in the islands, and could not be effected for nothing. Some expense might also attend the transmission of writs of inhibition or other processes, from the High Court of Admiralty to this country, and from hence to the West Indies. Those charges, he would not deny, might necessarily be incurred; and as they could not be assessed upon individuals, ought under this head to be provided for; but they would need a provision very inconsiderable indeed when compared with the extravagant appropriation of 50,000 dollars, which he hoped would be struck out for the purpose of their introducing, in another stage of the business, a much less sum.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped the question would be divided, so as to retain the item if the sum was struck out.

The CHAIRMAN declared the question not capable of a division.

The question being put for striking out the item, the votes were for it 40, against it 39, when the CHAIRMAN voting in the negative, declared the question not carried.

The question was then put for striking out the sum and carried.

Mr. GALLATIN moved to strike out the words "continuing the prosecution," and insert in their place "expense relative to," in order to avoid an appearance of sanctioning a continuance in the prosecution of these claims. This amendment would also meet the ideas of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SWANWICK seconded the motion, for he did not believe we should ever get so much from Britain on account of the spoiliations, as would be spent in the pursuit of them.

The question was put and carried.

The Committee then rose and had leave to sit again.

Indirect Taxes.

[JANUARY, 1797.]

TUESDAY, January 31.

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that they had appointed a joint committee, viz: Messrs. SEDGWICK, LAURANCE, and READ, to act in conjunction with a committee to be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and fix the mode of examining the votes of the Electors for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, &c., and to regulate the time and manner of administering the oaths of office to the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

INDIRECT TAXES.

Mr. HENDERSON proposed the following resolutions to the House. He observed that his reason for offering them was to bring the whole subject of indirect taxation forward at one time. The gentleman of South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] had offered many articles to their attention, but not having specified these now proposed, he would move that they be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the subject of indirect taxation, viz:

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per gallon, on all beer, ale, and porter, imported in casks into the United States.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per dozen bottles, on all beer, ale, and porter, imported in bottles.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents, per pair, on every pair of boots, imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pair on all imported shoes and slippers of silk; and on all other shoes, slippers, clogs, and golo-shoes, for men and women, per pair, — cents; and on all shoes and slippers for children, — cents per pair.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound, on all souchong and black teas.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents, per pound, on all hyson, imperial, and gunpowder teas, imported; and on all other green teas, — cents per pound.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents, per hundred weight, on all unmanufactured steel.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per hundred weight, on all bar iron imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound on all nails imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per hundred weight on all Glauber salts imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound on all manufactured tobacco imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound on all snuff imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound on all cocoa imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound on all chocolate imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound on all pepper imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound on all pimento imported.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid a duty of — cents per pound on all chocolate manufactured within the United States.

Resolved, That there ought to be laid a duty of — cents per pound on all snuff manufactured within the United States.

Mr. W. SMITH said, if he thought any good could be derived from the propositions, he should be glad to indulge the gentleman, but not perceiving any advantages whatever, he must oppose the reference. He had not time at present to go into the merits or demerits of these several articles. He thought they would have the injurious tendency to lead the House from the view of direct taxes, and thus lose the substance while they grasped at a shadow: it would argue that the House were to resort to imposts for revenue, when it ought to be observed that this was the most improper time that could be pointed out for an extension of that system. We have, Mr. S. said, the Secretary of the Treasury's ideas on the system; he considers, that, if entered into, it will not be productive, and of those he had offered, the Committee of Ways and Means had only proposed three. We may go into it, but the time of the session now remaining being so short, we should be led into a track which would be quite impracticable and injurious, because to no purpose whatever. If they were to be referred to a Committee of the Whole, they could not be considered till after those proposed by his colleague, [Mr. HARPER] which had a priority.

Mr. HENDERSON said, it was from the invitations of the gentleman who had just sat down, who is Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that he had proposed these articles for consideration. It may well be recollected, that gentleman gave a general invitation for every gentleman who opposed direct taxation, to propose his substitute, that they might come all under view at the same time, and how could he now say those of his colleague had a priority: not one of the articles now proposed were before included. As for the idea of an abiding system, Mr. H. thought the other could not be preferred to this, while these articles would bear an extension of duty every way adequate to the wants of the Government, without being burdensome to the people.

Mr. S. SMITH thought these articles were only proposed for the purpose of defeating the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. They had proposed three articles of the indirect kind, which, in the view of the Secretary of the Treasury, were all that would bear an extension of duty. What is the object of the gentleman? Is it to increase our own manufactories? It appeared to him the gentleman had proposed these articles at random, without considering their merits. He presumed the revenue would be very little helped by it. He thought it a wrong time to go as far into this system as it would bear. It was the intention of gentlemen to propose a resolution, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to digest a plan of indirect taxation, to be brought forward at the next session; and therefore he hoped this would not be referred.

Mr. KIRCHELL said, he could not think that his colleague would propose these resolutions to defeat the propositions before made. He had acted consistently with his former declarations; he had been called upon, in the general invitation, to produce a substitute for direct taxation, and he had proposed those just read. Though the gentleman from Maryland says it is to destroy the other system, yet the gentleman could not say that system would be effected. Could he say that would be put in force? Mr. K. thought not; he thought there were insuperable difficulties attending it, more by far than any gentleman could be aware of. Certainly, then, if there is a prospect of that system not prevailing, there is wisdom in proposing a substitute—a resort to which to apply. He thought it ungenerous to say that this was brought forward to evade a direct tax, and he hoped that opinion would not prevail so far as to prevent committing the resolutions.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was against the reference, not only for the reasons so ably stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH] but because, if admitted, they would bear very heavy on the people of the Southern States, already too much burdened. At Massachusetts, New York, Philadelphia, and other places, where goods were landed, he said the burden may not be so great, but it was to be remembered, that they were to be reshipped, and after landed in the Southern States, perhaps have much inland carriage, thus 100 per cent. was added by which they became very expensive. He hoped the House would so systemize as to make men pay in proportion to their property. These were his honest sentiments, founded on what he knew to be the interest of his constituents.

The question being here asked, the SPEAKER answered, the question was not on the adoption of the resolutions, but their reference.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, he had only given his reasons to support the impropriety of them, and the natural references growing out of them, to show they ought not to be referred.

Mr. NICHOLAS, upon this, said, that he hoped gentlemen would vote in silence, since it was disorderly to enter into the merits.

At the desire of Mr. SWANWICK, the resolutions were read a second time.

Mr. GALLATIN said, the nature of the business was such as to exclude the House the privilege of entering into the resolutions in detail, though it was exceedingly difficult to speak on the principle of the question without. Though he might be imperceptibly drawn out of the line he would wish to keep, he should speak a few words on the principle, in which he would give his reasons against the admission. It may be recollected, that the gentleman from New Jersey, some time ago, laid a resolution on the table, in general terms, to institute an inquiry as to what articles of foreign growth imported, and articles manufactured within the United States, would bear an additional duty. This resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, who had reported on it; not in a complete system, as the gentleman seems to wish, but in a manner which they considered best. Their report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on the subject of indirect taxation. Was it not now prejudging that system, to say it was bad; that it was not complete, but required amendment? When that system comes forward, it is in the power of gentlemen to change, retrench, or modify it, with whatever alterations shall be most acceptable to the House; this was to say, it was not worth notice, and if so would naturally lead to a discussion of it, although the SPEAKER says it is out of order. Mr. G. thought it was not proper to refer these resolutions to the Committee of Ways and Means until they had the report of that committee on the subject already referred to them, under discussion. He should vote against the reference. He thought these resolutions ought not to be called a system, they were merely a set of resolutions transcribed from the Treasury book as articles of impost, without any previous consideration of the propriety or impropriety of advancing the duties on them. Mr. G. said, he would venture to assert the whole of them would not produce twenty thousand dollars to the Treasury. However, he did not wish to enter into a detail in addition to the observations from the gentlemen from Maryland and South Carolina, with both of whom he agreed.

Mr. THATCHER said, if the majority of the House were already decided in favor of a direct tax, and determined to carry it into effect this session, then they were right not to refer these propositions to a committee; but he did not, like the gentleman last up, think that a majority would favor that mode of taxation. He thought it impossible to draw the necessary supplies from a direct source, from which view he was determined in his mind to oppose that system, and apply to indirect means. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] had said that we ought not to refer them, because of several which had been brought forward and not entered upon; another gentleman had said, if these were referred, it would be bringing in a system, for which there was no time this session. With respect to that, he would say, if there was not time to digest an indirect system, a fortiori, it surely could not be supposed there would be for a direct, which must certainly take much more time; the amendment of an old, which requires no new organization, could not take up that time, which was not indispensably necessary in the formation of a new one. Those gentlemen who thought otherwise must be very much mistaken. Mr. T. thought that, with the savings which may be made, a sum considerably less than twelve or thirteen hundred thousand dollars, would answer the demands of the present year. The gentleman from Virginia says he is against the system of indirect taxation, because it would bear harder among the Southern than the Northern States. He thought it of more importance to obtain supplies the present year, than to be weighed down by these considerations. He should forbear going into the merits of the articles at this time, it having been said by the Chair that it was out of order; he would only say, he should vote in favor of the references.

Mr. SWANWICK said the gentleman last up, and others who spoke on the same side of the question, took it for granted that there was no intention to carry a direct tax. Why, then, he would ask, was the resolution entered into the other day? What may be going on in some corners of the House he knew not, but he should not at present take it for granted, though the assertion may prove to be just. And though those gentlemen may take it for granted that the taxes on imposts will produce additional revenue, yet he did not entertain the idea; he was far from thinking there was any certainty in it.

Mr. S. said he thought it might appear pretty plain to any gentleman who would give himself the trouble to think, that there was a great prospect of defalcation in the revenue in the present year. We had last year a great surplusage of goods imported into the United States, by reason of which the price was brought below, or at most even, with the sterling price. Is it not then a natural deduction that the great revenue by these importations in 1796, will considerably lessen the want of the article in 1797? He had lately had some conversation with a collector on the subject, who gave it as his fixed opinion that the surplusage would have that effect. He thought, then, it might be fairly taken for granted that there would be less revenue to be received if less goods were imported. He thought it very wrong to get at the subject by this kind of a side-wind. Believing, therefore, that this was not the way to get a direct tax established, to bring forward a list of indirect taxes to oppose it, he should object to the reference. Gentlemen, before they opposed this system of direct taxation by introducing indirect, ought to have their minds made up first that there would be none of this defalcation from a surplusage of goods, and also that there was no danger of our ships being taken by those Powers who seem hostile to our commerce. These considerations must, at least, lead gentlemen to hesitate before they press further on the subject. It is said there is no time to forward this plan, but whatever time we have, however short, said Mr. S., let us forward this plan, and make some progress, rather than merely go on copying plans already too much depended on. The gentleman from New Jersey had proposed some plan before, on theatrical exhibitions, &c., which the Committee of Ways and Means had had under consideration, but had, after deliberation, thought proper not yet to report; and should the House forestall that report, by proposing fresh articles? He hoped not. They have digested a plan, and have reported, which was also recommended, by the Secretary of the Treasury, that two or three enumerated articles are all that will with propriety bear additional duty. Mr. S. said there was, some time past, a kind of apostolic faith given to the Secretary of the Treasury; whatever he recommended was considered proper to be adopted. He tells you now that you cannot depend upon imposts for your revenue; you must apply to direct taxes, or your revenue will be endangered. It must be recollected that, last session, a resolution passed the House, instructing that officer to examine the subject and report, and now it is to be laid up in the drawer as useless—we are to think no more about it. He hoped gentlemen would pursue what they had in hand, and not refer it.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH said, gentlemen seemed to be wandering very far from the question before the House. It was not upon the principle of adopting the resolutions, but simply whether there was a propriety at some future period to consider the subject of them. He thought there was. They were told that no gentleman should oppose a direct tax without producing another; thus no person must oppose this, without devising another system. His opinion was, that what had been produced by the gentlemen from South Carolina and New Jersey [Mr. HARPER and Mr. HENDERSON] were very complete substitutes for the other mode; not that he should pledge himself to vote for them, and them only; he should think himself at liberty to exercise his opinion on the subject when before the House, to have the liberty of which he should now vote for committing those proposed for future consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON little expected any opposition to the resolutions when he offered them. He considered, by the mode first pursued, that the two systems of direct and indirect taxation were to go hand in hand, from the invitation to offer plans; and when he considered that his first proposition was in the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means, before the gentleman's from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] were brought forward, he thought they ought to have been both upon equal footing. He thought if this was refused a reference, the House would not pursue an uniform line of conduct on the subject. Mr. H. thought the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] had deviated from that line of conduct which ought to mark every member in that public body, when he charged him with a desire to defeat the object. Had he, said Mr. H., considered his conduct, he would see, at least in this business, it had been uniform; he had always declared his opposition to direct taxation, until he could be perfectly convinced that every other source was deficient. He wished some revenue to be obtained this session, which could not come from a direct system. But he should refrain from going into the system. He did not know why his resolutions might not as well go to a committee as those proposed before, as they are of the same nature. He thought the difference very extraordinary; the merit of the case, he hoped, would obtain a just decision.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the gentleman last up had charged him with something which he did not say. It came from the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GALLATIN.] But Mr. S. perfectly agreed with the latter gentleman, that there was no force of system on these resolutions. Mr. GALLATIN had guessed that twenty thousand dollars were the utmost which could be raised from these resources. He thought that for the first six months there might be at the rate of fifty thousand dollars, but as soon as the system is understood smuggling will begin, and put an end to it. Mr. S. knew the imputation cast on every thing which came from merchants with regard to impost. They were said to hate it. But, in spite of this, he would tell the gentleman that on twelve-and-a-half per cent. duties, for every ninety-five pounds paid into the Treasury, one hundred and thirty-three pounds were paid by the public. And in the two-and-a-half per cents., where the consumer paid six pounds, not four pounds of it went into the Treasury, and these were on articles on which it was proposed to increase, but to no effect. This surely was not a commendable system of raising money. You have in many instances no means of coercing merchants to pay imposts; you have nothing to depend upon but their honor. The extent of the coast, and the immense number of creeks with which it was intersected, made it impossible to hinder smuggling. But in America that practice was held to be dishonorable. Britain, while this country was under her government, had tried, but in vain, to hinder smuggling. All her ships-of-war could not prevent it. How, then, will the United States be able to do so? Under that Government it was an object to smuggle: an augmentation of the impost would again produce the same effects. When he saw gentlemen rise in support of the reference, who had not risen on the subject of direct taxation, he was led to draw the conclusion that these resolutions could have no other effect than to defeat those brought in by the Committee of Ways and Means, and to create needless delay. There can be no other end. These trifling things can raise nothing but discussion in this House, which will produce a very inconvenient stop to business.

Mr. S. insisted that the resolutions could be brought forward for no good purpose; he still thought so. Only four weeks of the session now remained, and no time was to be lost. The gentleman might judge of the length of discussion which the resolutions would require to go through them, by what had happened on this day. Six weeks would be requisite for them. The third article proposed by the committee he thought quite adequate; until a more perfect system could be brought to perfection. The revenue of 1795 would be sufficient for 1797. The gentleman might indulge himself with the phantom of a revenue from that source, but let the commerce be destroyed and where would the revenue then be? He hoped a system like that would not be depended on, which was so liable to be ruined.

Mr. HOLLAND said, it may not be too late to take a necessary view of the subject. Gentlemen said that the Committee of Ways and Means had the subject fully before them, but he would ask would it be any harm for the House also to possess it? He, as an individual, wished to know the merits of it. It was generally allowed that revenue was wanted, and two systems had been tried for that purpose; was it not desirable to see whether the one had been sufficiently extended before the other was to be adopted? They should, at least, each undergo a full and ample discussion. What gentlemen had said about it seemed to be prejudging the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means; he thought there could be no impropriety to commit it; nothing could be lost by bringing it before the House, but much might possibly be gained.

Mr. HARPER said he should vote against the reference, and should give his reasons in a few words: first, because it was unnecessary; it could be brought into the view of the House at the same time those he proposed came forward, to which they had a very great affinity; there is not one of the items but would come up very properly at that time, and any member may move them, but he thought them improper. Though the extension of this system may be necessary, yet it was so only to a certain degree; this was going too much into detail. If it could be extended at all, he thought those items before proposed would be enough, which was his second reason for opposing them. Thirdly, to go so far into minutia would lead the debate to too great a length for anything to be done during the session, while the House were pressed on all sides with business of various kinds. He should even think time so precious, that fifty thousand dollars would not be worth five or six days' discussion for; but, on the contrary, a very small revenue indeed could be drawn from this plan. He hoped the gentleman would let it lie for the present, and bring it forward at the time the House took up the subject.

Mr. HENDERSON again rose; but on the SPEAKER informing him he had spoken twice on the subject, and if he wanted to speak again he must ask leave of the House, he did so, and obtained leave; but he only rose to ask Mr. HARPER what difference there could be between the resolutions he proposed and those now proposed?

Mr. HARPER answered, that at the time his were proposed there was no report of the committee made, but now the subject was more forward.

Upon a division the reference was carried—ayes 51.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1797.

The House then took up the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the subject of appropriations for the year 1797.

Mr. BALDWIN doubted the propriety of agreeing to the amendment reducing the estimate of contingencies for the Senate from $4,000 to $3,000, since they had not agreed to reduce the $8,000 estimated for the contingencies of that House, to $6,000, upon the same ratio, viz: for four months instead of six—though he was of the same opinion as to the impropriety of appropriating too largely for these objects of expense that he had before expressed.

Mr. HENDERSON hoped this amendment would be agreed to, and that the $8,000 appropriated for that House would be reduced to $6,000.

H. OF R.]

Appropriations for 1797.

[JANUARY, 1797.]

The question was put and negatived—yeas 31, nays 51.

On the question being about to be put for agreeing to the amendment for striking out the messenger and office-keeper to the Treasurer of the United States, Mr. W. SMITH hoped it would not be agreed to. He did not think it would be using their officers well to deprive them of a person of this kind, to do their menial business.

The amendment was carried—41 to 30; and the two other amendments of a similar kind, agreed to in a Committee of the Whole, were carried without a division.

On the question being about to be put for striking out the clerk to the Purveyor of the Treasury, Mr. W. SMITH called for the reading of the act of last session, under which this clerk was said to be appointed. He said it appeared that the Heads of Departments were authorized to make such provisions with respect to the compensations of the clerks as they thought proper. They had allowed, it seemed, a clerk to the Purveyor of the Treasury, on account of his increase of business. He believed if this had not been necessary, the Secretary of the Treasury would not have allowed it, as he was not remarkable for increasing assistants where there was not necessity for them. Except they knew for a certainty that the clerk was unnecessary, he thought the item ought not to be struck out.

Mr. GALLATIN said, it must be remembered that the act appointing the Purveyor of the Treasury gave him no clerk; and, if a clerk was necessary, provision should be made by law for the purpose. By the act of last session, four thousand dollars were allowed to be distributed among the clerks, and three new clerks were allowed to be appointed, one of which it appeared had been given to the Purveyor of the Treasury. He did believe there was no occasion for this clerk, since there was three times the business when the office was first established that there was at this time. His particular reason for objecting to this was, because a variety of similar items appeared under the estimate for the Military department, which he meant to object to when that subject came under consideration. He found there the Purveyor of Supplies, the Superintendent of Military Stores, Storekeeper, Assistant Storekeeper, four clerks, &c., all of whom were appointed for nearly the same object. He thought it improper, in this indirect way, to appoint officers unauthorized by law. If the Purveyor were to be allowed a clerk, he should wish it to be done openly by law, and not in the way now proposed.

Mr. W. SMITH did not think it a sufficient reason why this officer should not have a clerk, because he was not allowed one when the office was established, for additional business might have since made it necessary, nor because too many clerks were put down on the Military Establishment estimate. They had not yet passed that estimate, and if gentlemen thought any item there unnecessary, they would of course move to strike it out. They ought not to strike out the clerk under this head, because those under another were unnecessary.

The amendment was put and carried; there being 51 in favor of it.

Mr. VARNUM said, he found the office-keepers and messengers allowed $300. They were heretofore $250; he moved to have all of them altered to that sum. Carried—36 to 31.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the several items of contingent expenses in the Mint, making together $7,400, should be left blank. Agreed to.

The report being gone through, Mr. GALLATIN wished the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to be read. This resolution is to the following effect: "Resolved, That a sum not exceeding — be appropriated, viz: for the Civil List," &c.; enumerating all the different heads of expense.

Mr. GALLATIN said he should move an amendment to this resolution, which, though at first view might appear trifling, yet, on an investigation of the subject, would be found of considerable importance. The way in which the resolution now read was, that for certain purposes, "there be appropriated a sum not exceeding —, viz." The amendment he meant to propose was to strike out those words, and insert in their place, "the following sums be respectively appropriated, viz."

Mr. G. said his object in this amendment was, that each appropriation should be specific; that it might not be supposed to be in the power of the Treasury Department to appropriate to one object money which had been specifically appropriated for any other object. He did not know, he had never investigated the subject, whether, as to the Civil List, appropriations had ever been mixed, or whether it was understood they might be so mixed; but they knew it had been officially declared that so far as related to the Military Department, the items had been totally mixed: for instance, if the estimate for clothing or any other item fell short, the officers of the Treasury did not think themselves bound by that particular appropriation, but had recourse to other items, for which larger sums were granted than there was occasion for. Such construction of the law, Mr. G. said, totally defeated the object of appropriation, and it was necessary, therefore, so to express the law that no color for such a construction should be given. The amendment he proposed would have this effect.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the amendment proposed was not of importance at present, as the particulars were entered only upon the Journals. These did not go into the law to be passed, for though all the items were entered upon the Journals, in the bill they were lumped in the aggregate. But as one gentleman had brought up the subject, it was necessary that the House should consider it, and say whether it was not proper, when appropriations were insufficient under the head of expense. In cases of emergency it would be proper that the Treasury should be so limited as not to take money from another head of expense, where there was a surplusage. This was a thing done heretofore, and the House knew it had been done in the Military Establishment. In the Quartermaster's department, in particular, the expenses might exceed the sum appropriated, and, as the services must be performed, or the military service cease, therefore, the Treasury judged they might make use of the surplus of any other head of expense to make good this deficiency. He knew not how the business could be otherwise done with convenience. With respect to the Civil List Establishment, it was of a more certain nature; most of the salaries were established by law, and therefore they could be ascertained to a certainty.

Mr. S. said he did not mean, however, to oppose the motion at present; but when the bill was brought in, it would be necessary to determine this principle, and say whether, if an appropriation fell short Government must stop rather than touch the surplus of any other appropriation.

The said report, as amended, was then read at the Clerk's table, and on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That for the expenditure of the Civil List; for the extra expenses of foreign intercourse; for the support of the Mint Establishment, light houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven; and to satisfy certain miscellaneous claims, stated in the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the fifteenth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, together with the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments, and the offices thereof, the following sums be respectively appropriated; that is to say:

MILITARY AND NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. W. SMITH wished the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution he had laid on the table with respect to a temporary appropriation for the Military and Naval Establishments. To show the necessity for which he read a letter he had received from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject.

Mr. VARNUM thought there was no necessity for going into a consideration of the resolution in question. He should prefer going into a Committee of the Whole on the appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, which might be got through in time to answer the purpose in view.

Mr. W. SMITH said, if he thought with the gentleman last up, that the business of the Military and Naval Establishments would be soon gone through, he would certainly be for going into the consideration; but the Military Establishment was not finally fixed upon, and there were some gentlemen who had objections with respect to the Naval Establishment. The law after passing in that House, would have to go to the Senate. There might also be amendments, upon which it would be necessary to hold conferences. In the mean time the public service might suffer for want of money to pay its workmen. The resolution which he proposed to be taken up might be got through in a few minutes; the sum might be left blank, and it might be referred back, and a bill brought in.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the sum of — be appropriated on account of the Military and Naval Establishments for the year 1797."

Mr. GALLATIN moved to strike out the word "naval." It might become a serious question whether they should appropriate any more money to that object or not; and, in the mean time, if the word was struck out, that establishment would not suffer, as they were told in the late report on the subject that $24,000 remained unexpended of the last appropriation. The subject would probably be determined upon before the present business was finally passed; and, if it was concluded to go on with the Naval Establishment, he should vote for restoring the word.

Mr. PARKER said, it was nearly a month since the report on this subject had been made; $24,000 were then in hand; but by this time he supposed it was expended, and, if no more was appropriated, the workmen would be discharged and great injury be sustained.

He trusted that House would never think of relinquishing the building of the frigates. If they meant to support any degree of consistency of character, he trusted they should go on to complete them. If not the whole, at least two of them. And if this were to be done, it was necessary now to appropriate some money. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would withdraw his amendment.

The committee who had reported on the subject were ready at any time to go into it, and he trusted it would be taken up in the course of a day or two, when he hoped the House would determine upon having the frigates completed as soon as possible; for if they determined to give them up altogether, they would remain monuments of their own folly, and would discover a versatility of conduct never equalled, perhaps, by any deliberative body in the world.

Mr. SWANWICK hoped the amendment would not prevail. Even if they determined to have no more to do with the frigates, still it would be the truest economy to finish them. But it would come very ill, Mr. S. said, from the fifty-one gentlemen who had lately voted in favor of indirect taxes, to vote against finishing the frigates, without which no dependence could be placed on any of their plans of taxation. He trusted, therefore, that the word naval would not be struck out, but that a supply of money would be granted, and that the work would go on without interruption.

Mr. VENABLE said, if he understood the object of the gentleman's motion, it was not to prevent an appropriation being made for the completion of the frigates, but to have it made in the proper way. It was well known that there had been an extraordinary waste of public money on these frigates; and, whenever an appropriation came under consideration, he should wish to see the estimate, and prevent a lumping appropriation. When these items were seen, he should be ready to make such appropriations as should seem necessary.

Mr. GALLATIN said, the great reason for objecting to the Naval Establishment being included with the Military, was this: an appropriation on account of the Military Establishment was made early in every session, before any estimate could be settled; but this was a sum on account of an establishment going on under authority of law, the appropriation for which was looked upon almost as a matter of form; but the Naval Establishment was altogether a doubtful thing. Before more money could be appropriated there was a previous question to be settled. They knew it must cease if the House refused to grant about $200,000 more to complete the frigates now building. Until that question was decided, he should not be inclined to vote any money for that purpose; for, if they were now to appropriate a sum of money on that account, they should pledge themselves to make good the whole appropriation. And, although there might be a large majority in favor of completing the frigates, it was not according to order to vote for an object not appropriated for by law. The building of the frigates, it was true, was authorized by law, but the business was confined by an appropriation. In order to complete them, 25 per cent. more than was last year contemplated was now wanted, and until it was decided that that sum should be appropriated, no appropriation on that account would be warranted. It was on this account he made his motion.

Mr. SWANWICK said, they had not yet passed the law with respect to the Military Establishment. He thought the Military and Naval Establishments were connected together, and that it would be as wise to strike out one as the other. To strike out the word in question, Mr. S. said, would be like prejudging the question. Because more money was wanted his colleague thought the subject new; but, on the contrary, he believed, the moment they concluded to build the frigates, they determined to complete them. If they cost more than was expected, what was it different from a house costing more than was first estimated by the builder? Yet what man would stop at the second story of his house because he had been deceived as to the expense of completing it? He thought the question was decided last session, when it was said that three frigates should be built, and it would be a little extraordinary were they now to doubt on the subject.

If the gentleman had moved to postpone the consideration of this resolution wholly, in order to wait for the subject coming before them, he should have had no particular objection to it; but he had an objection to vote for one and not the other. He thought the Military Establishment a constant waste of money; but he had a more favorable opinion with respect to the Naval Establishment. He trusted all gentlemen who supported indirect taxation would now vote for supporting a Navy, since there would be no security of any revenue from that source without a Navy; but he hoped these frigates would be the means of preserving millions to our revenue; for, although it was true, these two or three frigates would not enable us to fight the whole world, yet there were multitudes of piccaroons which took our vessels at pleasure, and which these frigates would keep off our coast. But, if they were to agree to strike out the word naval, what, he asked, would the world think of us? He believed such a measure would encourage injuries to be played off upon us from all quarters. To attend to the Military Establishment, and neglect the Naval, would be to add strength to strength, and leave weakness unprotected. He hoped they should not let an idea go forth to the world that their frigates were likely at last to be abandoned. If the question was now, whether they would go into a Naval Establishment at all, it would be a different thing from having done so much, and refusing to complete the work already in such forwardness. He trusted they should not make themselves the ridicule of the world by withholding the necessary appropriations for completing the building of these vessels.

Mr. CORR hoped the amendment would not prevail. He had himself doubts about the propriety of this Navy going on; but he thought the motion should be carried as proposed.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped the amendment would prevail; for though they had a law on the Naval Establishment, doubts were entertained whether the plan would be carried forward. He asked, if it would not be more proper and more decent to pursue the course chalked out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, than to vote for money for an object that was yet undecided upon? He said, they had a report on the subject, and a day or two would determine what they should do with respect to it. And would it not be more orderly to take up the subject from the report than to do it in this manner? He believed it would, and that an appropriation might be made at the same time with this. Though the Legislature had determined to finish these frigates, gentlemen were still in doubt whether they ought to be finished. He was himself in doubt. He had, last session, been induced to vote for finishing the frigates, because so much money had already been expended; but he was now of opinion, from a further examination into the subject, that if they were to abandon them, though the loss would be great, they should gain what would warn them from future similar folly.

Mr. MURRAY said, it was unnecessary for them to decide to-day or to-morrow whether this country should have a Naval Establishment or not. If it were determined to-morrow that there should be no establishment of this kind, it would become a question of economy whether it would not be better to finish the frigates, whatever might be the event, than to give them up to rot on the stocks. So that the question was not now, nor could it become so, whether there should be a Navy, but whether the frigates should be finished? He hoped they would be finished. If they were not, they would become (as it had been already hinted) a monument of disgrace to the country. He trusted, however, that the frigates would not only be built, but that a dock-yard, which would prove a cradle of the Navy, would also be agreed to be established.

Mr. MADISON said, it was unusual and improper to make appropriations for any object before it was legalized; and if the object now in question was not legalized, he agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] that, however certain it might be that the law would pass, before it did pass, it was not right to appropriate for that object. The law should first be before them. As he saw no evil which could arise from letting the business lie over for a few days, until the subject of the frigates had been determined upon, he should be in favor of the motion for striking out, not meaning by this vote to declare his unwillingness to vote for the sum necessary for completing the frigates when that question should come before them.

Mr. PARKER said, as his colleague seemed to have some doubt with respect to the legality of voting for the present resolution, he would read him an extract from the law of last session, which was as decided for building the frigates, and which bound the expense upon them, as certain as was that of the Military Establishment. [He read the extract alluded to.] In consequence of this law, he said, the PRESIDENT had pursued the business, and had expended, a month ago, all the money appropriated, except $24 000.

If it was apprehended (as he had heard it suggested that it was) that any part of the money appropriated for this object was to go towards building a frigate at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, he would declare the friends of this measure had no such intention. He should be as much opposed to that as any gentleman. This money would go to the building of no other vessels than to three, which had been authorized to be finished last session, which he considered themselves as much bound to complete as they were bound to appropriate for the Military Establishment. And, if money was not now appropriated, the workmen employed would have to be discharged; and a considerable loss occasioned. Indeed, he believed the delay and the expenses, with respect to these vessels, had been, in a considerable degree, occasioned by the versatility of that House.

Mr. P. said, he thought now, and had always thought, that if we were determined to have no armed vessels, we had no business with commerce, since a row-boat, with a gun or two, and a few men in it, was capable of taking our largest and most valuable ships. Mr. P. said, he was for supporting the dignity of our country. He hoped we were not in a situation to be afraid of any nation. He wished to be in readiness to meet any enemy, either with frigate or bayonet, who should choose to attack us. At present, he said, our merchants were losing their property daily, to an immense amount; indeed, many of them were almost ruined by their losses: and if we suffered them to be thus ruined, he believed the farmers, and every other class of citizens, would find themselves affected by their misfortunes.

It was time, Mr. P. said, we should put ourselves on rising ground, and provide means for supporting our dignity; for unless we put on this countenance, we should be degraded and insulted by all nations. He cared not who was their Executive Magistrate, he would support him in doing what he conceived to be right. He would, therefore, vote for every measure which went to put us into a situation of meeting any nation who might choose to insult and attack us; he would, for this purpose, vote for direct taxes, nor should he be afraid that the people, seeing the necessity, would not cheerfully pay them.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH was against the amendment. He trusted they should not, by withholding the necessary appropriations, suffer the workmen now employed upon the frigates to be discharged, but that they would be proceeded with to their completion. Economy should always be the order of the day; and if they were at last suffered to rot, after so much forwardness, it would argue a great want of economy. It was said the business was begun in folly, but, if they were now to be abandoned, it would end in greater.

Mr. W. SMITH was surprised that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] should have said an appropriation on this subject would not be authorized by law. [Mr. MADISON denied having said so.] Last session, Mr. S. said, that House consented to the passing of a law to authorize the PRESIDENT to construct three frigates. In consequence of which law the PRESIDENT had proceeded with the business, and the officers of Government now told them they wanted money to pay the workmen; but these gentlemen say they will refuse, until it be determined whether the frigates should be finished or not. He thought this very extraordinary conduct. If gentlemen were disposed at any rate to destroy the Naval Establishment, why not bring in a bill at once to repeal the law? This, he said, would be the direct way of getting rid of the business; but, after employing the PRESIDENT to build these frigates, he thought it strange that, when they were told money was wanting to carry on the work, that they should withhold it, from a doubt of the legality of such an appropriation.

It was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] that there was money in hand, and therefore no necessity for an appropriation on this head; but the chairman of the committee, who had made the report on that subject, [Mr. PARKER,] had informed them, and it was some time since that report was made, that the money was therefore expended, and more was now wanted. Mr. S. said, he should not then go into arguments to show the propriety of keeping up the Naval Establishment; but, as there was an existing law for the expense, the expense having been incurred, and the officers of Government calling upon them for money, he thought they could not avoid paying it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania wished this appropriation to be delayed until they determined upon the question of finishing the frigates; but did he not know, that in doing this, considerable loss would be incurred by the discharge of the workmen and the perishing of materials? He said they had passed a law declaring they would build three frigates; the law did not say they should cost only so much, but that they should be built. So far from limiting the sum, they had, from time to time, granted additional sums for this purpose. Indeed, he did not think they were at liberty to refuse this appropriation.

Mr. GILES said, if he understood this question, it was, whether they should appropriate first, and then discuss the propriety of doing so, or discuss the propriety and then appropriate? It was not a question whether the frigates should be completed, but merely a question as to the proper time of making the appropriation.

For his part, Mr. G. said; he was against the building of them at all, and always had been. He believed that candor would not permit the business to be called by a milder term than folly, and the farther they proceed in the project the worse it would be.

Mr. G. said, the House should doubtless first take up the report on the subject, and determine whether or not they were willing to furnish the $200,000 wanted. As to what the gentleman from South Carolina had said with respect to their not being at liberty to refuse this appropriation, he did not understand it. If they had not this liberty, why make any appropriation at all? Why was the business brought before them if they had no choice to act or not to act? He was one of those, he said, who thought that House was always at liberty to say whether they would appropriate money or refuse to appropriate it. He hoped, therefore, the motion would prevail.

Mr. VENABLE said, the objection to the proposed grant of money did not go against the appropriation itself so much as against the principle, as being an anticipation of law; for he did not suppose that the present appropriation was meant to include the whole of the money wanted; but before he agreed to vote any more money to this object, he wished to see the items of expense. He did not see any necessity for making an appropriation now, when it was probable they should next week be called upon to make another. He did not think the merits of the question was at all before them, but merely whether they would consent to appropriate a further sum of money before they had come to a decision upon a previous question, viz: whether the House would agree to furnish the necessary money for the completion of the frigates?

Mr. W. SMITH said, the objection of the gentleman last up went to the Military Establishment as well as to the Naval. With respect to their not being at liberty to refuse the appropriation, he meant only to say, that having authorized the PRESIDENT to lay out money, they were not at liberty to refuse to pay it.

Mr. VARNUM said, if the fact existed, the conclusion of the gentleman from South Carolina would be just. If expense had been incurred, and it was not provided for, it certainly ought to be; but it was not so. The committee who had reported on the subject, had told them that a month ago there were $24,000 in hand unexpended; but it had been said that it was probably now expended. He did not believe it was probable; he did not believe a thousand dollars a day had been laid out upon the frigates since that time. Indeed, he did not think that, northward of this place, the work had gone on at all, owing to the severity of the frost. Besides, if the fact had existed, would it not have been in evidence before them? If the PRESIDENT had incurred an expense for which no provision had been made, would he not have stated it to the House? He certainly would, and this statement not having been made, there was every reason to believe there was yet money in hand, and why this anticipation should be so strenuously urged he was at a loss to know. The Military Establishment, he said, was quite a different thing. They knew there had been expense incurred under that head, and could have no objection to appropriate money on account of it.

Mr. SWANWICK referred to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to show that the money was really wanted to carry on the work.

The question on the amendment was put and carried—ayes 42, noes 34.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to. The Committee rose; the House took it up and agreed to the amendment, and referred the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

LOST CERTIFICATES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, reported on the petitions of Barnt De Klyn, Jacob Hollingsworth, Archibald Johnson, James Powell, Elizabeth Stewart, and Peter Winter, who all prayed a renewal of lost certificates; the report was against the petitioners, and the House concurred therewith.

Mr. CHRISTIE observed, that he expected a general report would have been made on this subject, and not that the petitions would have been reported upon particularly. He trusted some redress would be afforded to persons who held certificates which had been lost, and wished the decision upon these petitions to be postponed until the subject had been determined upon by the House.

Mr. D. FOSTER suggested whether it would not be best to bring the business before the House, independently of any particular case.

Mr. CHRISTIE consented to do so, and afterwards proposed the following resolution to the House:

“Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for a renewal, under specific restrictions, of certificates which have been destroyed, of certain descriptions.”

This resolution was agreed to, and referred to a select committee. Messrs. COIT, R. SPRIGG, PATTON, VARNUM, and BLOUNT, were accordingly appointed to examine and report thereon.

SUABILITY OF STATES.

The following resolution was received from the Senate, viz :

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President be requested to adopt some speedy and effectual means of obtaining from the States of Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and South Carolina, whether they have ratified the amendment proposed by Congress to the Constitution of the United States, concerning the suability of States; if they have, to obtain evidences thereof."

It was read a second time; when

Mr. W. SMITH said, he thought this resolution would be best referred to a Committee of the Whole, as perhaps it might be amended, by proposing some other alterations to the Constitution.

Mr. DENT thought this purpose would be best answered by a reference to a select committee in the first instance.

Mr. SMITH withdrew his motion, and the resolution was referred to a select committee.

MESSRS. HARPER, FREEMAN, GOODRICH, ISAAC SMITH, and HARRISON, were appointed.

COUNTING VOTES FOR PRESIDENT.

The resolution received from the Senate yesterday relative to the appointment of a committee to ascertain the election of PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, and to appoint a time and place for administering the oath of office to the PRESIDENT, was taken up, read a second time, and a committee of three members, viz : Mr. SITGREAVES, Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, and Mr. PARKER, were appointed accordingly, to act in conjunction with the committee appointed by the Senate.

POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. THATCHER moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the bill for regulating Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. S. SMITH wished that the subject on the Military Establishment should be entered upon in preference.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped neither of these subjects would be taken up, but business which was of a more pressing nature than either. He meant the business of the revenue. A string of resolutions were yesterday referred to a Committee of the Whole on the subject of indirect taxes. The House having directed the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill with a plan for collecting direct taxes, it was necessary they should determine which of the two plans should be pursued; as, until that determination was made, the Committee of Ways and Means were in a state of suspense, and he knew not but by the time they had completed the bill for laying the direct tax, the House might have determined not to resort to direct, but to push indirect taxes still further. He would, therefore, move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions alluded to, together with that formerly proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. If it were found that sufficient revenue could be drawn from indirect sources, and the House chose to adopt that plan, it would be unnecessary for the system of direct taxes to be further pursued; if not, the Committee of Ways and Means could not report a bill on the subject. As the session was drawing to a close, it was necessary some conclusion should speedily be come to, otherwise they should rise without providing any additional revenue at all.

Mr. THATCHER said, if they attended to one thing at once, he doubted not they should get through the whole of their business. He thought the subject he had proposed was deserving of attention; and if members recollected the many petitions which had been received on the subject, he thought they would agree with him in opinion.

Mr. CRAIK hoped they would not take up the resolutions referred to the Committee of the Whole yesterday, on the subject of indirect taxes. He had not had time to consider them. That House, had adopted the principle of direct taxes, and had directed the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill on the subject. Before they entered upon the discussion of indirect taxes, he should wish to see that bill, in order to ascertain whether any practicable plan could be formed for collecting a direct tax. If it could, it would probably influence the decision of the House upon the resolutions respecting indirect taxes.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman from Massachusetts that the question before the House was not whether they should go into a Committee of the Whole on the subject of indirect taxes, but whether they should go into the business of Post Offices and Post Roads.

The question was put and carried—ayes 46, noes 40.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for regulating Post Offices and Post Roads.

The debate continued the remainder of the sitting—many new roads were proposed. It was observed, on the one side, that to propose new ones or continue the old, it was necessary they should in their products bear a tolerable proportion of the expenses attending postage, &c., as it appeared some of the present roads did not produce more than one-hundredth part of their expenses. On the other hand, it was argued that no estimate could be formed of the produce and advantage of roads in some situations. Any part in the middle of a principal road from one capital to another, might be pointed out as unproductive, and therefore changed, because those post offices did not receive much money, but being a thoroughfare, the extremities of which were productive, the expenses were more than paid. It was also urged, that the reason of many roads being established and continued, was to convey information. It was said to be much to the credit of the United States that information was sent by newspapers into many obscure parts, and, therefore, that while the general receipts of the Post Office Establishment throughout the United States bore the general expenses, every present post-road should be continued, and as many new ones established as the receipts would support, as it was not proper that any money, on such a laudable establishment, should be put into the Treasury. At length, after much uninteresting discussion, Mr. GALLATIN moved the Committee to rise; which was carried—ayes 42, noes 41.

He then moved that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged, and the subject be referred to a select committee.

On the question for the Committee of the Whole to have leave to sit again, it was carried—ayes 48, noes 38.

It was then observed, that if they were to sit again, they might as well have sat until the usual hour. The question was then put for the House again to resolve itself into a Committee on the same subject; which was carried—ayes 47.

The House accordingly went into Committee, and, after more discussion, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 2.

LAWS OF IMPOST AND TONNAGE.

Mr. COIT proposed to the House the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to prepare and report to the House of Representatives, at the next session of Congress, such a system as will enable the House to comprise into one the various laws which have been made, and are now in force, for laying and collecting duties of impost and tonnage, reducing therein to a specific rate of duty those articles which are now rated according to value, and which, in his opinion, may more advantageously be rated specifically, and conforming, as nearly as may conveniently be done, to the existing rates, agreeably to the tariff directed to be by him reported by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of March, 1795."

Mr. COIT said, his reason for proposing this resolution was, to bring the whole of the laws on this subject, which were at present very complex, into one view; and he believed this could be better done by the Secretary of the Treasury than in any other way.

The SPEAKER said this resolution was not in order, as there was a rule of the House which directed that no bill could be introduced in a way different from that prescribed by that rule, viz: by appointing a committee, &c.

Mr. PAGE said, if it were not out of order, he should have opposed the reference of such a resolution, as such a measure would be calling upon the Heads of Departments to do their business. He trusted they should not agree to any thing which would carry the appearance of such inattention and laziness.

Mr. CORR said, he did not wish to violate any rule of the House, and he believed the objection might be got over by introducing the word system in place of bill. He did not mean to charge the House with laziness and inattention. He knew he was himself, in some degree, lazy and inattentive, and he thought he saw others so, but he did not mean to charge the House with being so.

Mr. HEATH said, though he generally found reason to approve of the accuracy of the gentleman from Connecticut, yet he could not do so in the present case. In his opinion, it would be infinitely more proper to appoint a committee to do the business, and bring in a bill. To do otherwise would be to transfer the business of the House to Heads of Departments.

Mr. W. SMITH thought gentlemen were making difficulties where there were none. Last session, the Secretary of the Treasury had been directed to report a system of direct taxation; and whilst the House could with propriety require him to do that, they might certainly direct him to report a system for regulating the laws on impost and tonnage. There were difficulties as to directing him to report a bill, but there could be none in directing him to report a system. The idea of appointing a committee on the subject was a little extraordinary. They could only sit till the 3d of March, and it could not be supposed they could report a system before that time.

Mr. HENDERSON was in favor of the resolution.

Mr. COIT said, he had no other object in view than to get this thing brought into shape; and, if no better plan could be adopted, he hoped his motion would prevail.

Mr. W. SMITH proposed an amendment, viz: instead of the words, "for comprising into one the various laws," &c., to say, "such a system as shall enable the House to comprise into one."

The resolution, with the amendment, was then agreed to.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that, conformable to rule, they had appointed Mr. SEDGWICK on their part, teller of the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT.

LOST CERTIFICATES.

Mr. DENT said if there were any more petitions on the subject of lost certificates before the Committee of Claims, he should wish them to be discharged from a further consideration of them, since a committee had been appointed to make a report as to the propriety of affording relief in certain cases.

Mr. D. FOSTER said there were a number of cases before them of a similar kind, part of which the committee had decided upon, but not drawn out the reports. If the House chose to discharge them from the subject, they certainly could have no objection to it.

Mr. DENT moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from a further consideration of any petitions on the subject of lost or destroyed certificates.

Mr. MACON saw no necessity for this motion, as, if it were determined to make provision for sufferers in certain cases, the cases of those persons whose petitions had been reported upon would stand in the same situation with others.

Mr. R. SPRIGG hoped the motion would prevail. It would come with a bad grace to propose a law for the relief of these persons another session (for he did not expect anything to be done in the business this session) when their cases had been decided upon in a former session, and the more cases which had been decided upon, the greater weight they would have. He thought, therefore, it would be best for these petitions to lie until the committee appointed should make their report: for, if it should be determined that, in certain cases, allowances should be made for lost or destroyed certificates, it would prove to have been a waste of time to make the decisions they were now daily making upon them.

Mr. COIT hoped the motion would not prevail, as it was taken for granted that some provision would be made in these cases. The objections urged might afford good reason for not acting upon the reports, but not for discharging the Committee of Claims from a consideration of them.

The motion was put and negatived.

POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to the act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States.

After the business of the roads was gone through, and that part of the bill which relates to newspapers came under consideration, an amendment was proposed by Mr. NICHOLAS, which occasioned some debate. The bill directed "that no newspapers should be received by the Deputy Postmasters, to be conveyed by post, unless they were sufficiently dried and enclosed in proper wrappers. The amendment proposed to strike out the words printed in italic.

Messrs. THATCHER, HARPER, and JEREMIAH SMITH, supported the clause as it stood. They said that it was owing to the papers being put into the Post Office wet, that the directions became defaced, and persons at a distance were disappointed in the receipt of their papers. This was said to be particularly the case with respect to papers sent from this city to the Southern States, and not that newspapers only were spoiled by this means, but that letters also were liable to be defaced and injured. All this inconvenience and injury, it was alleged, would be remedied by the papers being dried (which would be attended with very little trouble to the printers) and would secure their being safely conveyed to the most distant parts of the Union.

The amendment was supported by the mover, Messrs. SWANWICK, MURRAY, PAGE, S. SMITH, and W. LYMAN. There was no necessity, they said, for this regulation. Printers would find it to their interest to pack up their papers so as to get safely to their customers; but were it to pass, it would oblige the printers of daily papers to keep a person wholly employed in drying papers; and, beside the expense, from the extra fire necessary, it would subject them to great danger from that calamity which had lately been experienced by one of the printers of this city: and so far from this being attended with little trouble (as had been intimated) it would be so great as to increase the price of a daily paper at least two dollars a year. The regulation would also operate more unfavorable on some printers than on others; for instance, morning papers printed in this city must be in the Post Office before seven o'clock, of course, persons must be employed the whole of the night in drying and packing them, or they must be delayed a day for the purpose of drying, whilst those printed in an afternoon (though at considerable trouble and expense) could be dried and packed in the course of the evening, so as to be sent by the same post as heretofore. Such a provision, it was observed, would also give the Postmaster a power of showing an undue partiality to favorite printers, by refusing papers from their competitors on the ground of their not being sufficiently dry. With respect to the wetness of the papers defacing their directions, it was believed there were causes of that defacement besides their being packed up wet. Mr. PAGE, in particular, said, they were frequently suffered to be wet with rain, thrown carelessly about, and trodden under foot! This he had seen. And, as to their injuring letters, Mr. S. SMITH said, this was impossible, as the papers and letters were packed up in separate bags.

The motion for striking out the words was carried—41 to 23.

The last clause of the bill occasioned considerable debate. It was in these words:

"That the Postmaster General be authorized to discontinue carrying a mail on any post road which shall not produce more than one-fifth part of the expense of carrying the mail on the same during the third year after the passing of this act."

Mr. SITGREAVES moved to strike out this clause.

Messrs. THATCHER, DAYTON, WILLIAMS, and VARNUM, were for retaining it. They said that it was necessary to have some check of this sort, as when new roads were proposed, they were voted for in the dark, as probably not one-fifth part of the House were acquainted with the country in which they were to pass; if these roads, therefore, after a certain time, did not produce some certain portion of the expense of conveying the mail, it was proper they should be discontinued, as every unproductive and unnecessary road prevented the establishment of more useful and productive ones; and, though it was a settled principle that the profits arising from one part of the Union should go to the establishment of post roads in other parts, yet it was an injury and injustice to the whole to continue roads which would not pay one-fifth of the expense of conveying the mail. Mr. THATCHER, in particular, said that it was necessary there should be some check upon the House with respect to this subject; for when a road was once established, however unprofitable it might be, there was no getting it discontinued; as, while a member of that House had a letter to send to his constituents, he wished to have a post established for the purpose of conveying it.

The amendment was supported by Messrs. SITGREAVES, MURRAY, W. LYMAN, SWANWICK, MADISON, CRAIK, and GALLATIN. It was said, the power proposed to be given to the Postmaster General was a discretionary Legislative power, which belonged to that House, and could not be imparted to any other body or person; that though it was possible unprofitable roads might be established—from the partiality of members to their own district of country—yet to remedy this, evil in the way proposed, would be to introduce a greater; besides, it was said, it would be next to impracticable to ascertain exactly when a road produced less than one-fifth of the expense attending it. It was also found necessary to keep up some roads, though they did not pay one-fifth, viz: such as roads to Kentucky, Tennessee, to Niagara, &c., and therefore the Postmaster General was authorized, instead of being directed, to discontinue such roads as did not produce such a sum, which was, in effect, giving him the power to establish post roads. The Postmaster General, they remarked, might give the necessary information to the House, as to what roads were unprofitable, and they could, if they thought proper, discontinue them; but this power ought not to rest with any one man. The act might also be limited in its duration, and when it was renewed a review of the roads might take place.

The question for striking out was put and carried.

Mr. MADISON then proposed the following section in its stead, which was agreed to:

"That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to make a report annually, to Congress, of every post road which shall not have produced one-fifth part of the expense of carrying the mail on the same."

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill with the amendments.

FRIDAY, February 3.

Mr. DEARBORN, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill to augment the compensation of the Attorney General of the United States, which was received and read. He also presented a bill to continue in force the act "to regulate the compensation of clerks." These bills were read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

COUNTING VOTES FOR PRESIDENT, &c.

Mr. SITGREAVES, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, jointly with a committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and to regulate the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the PRESIDENT, made a report, in part, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next at twelve o'clock: That two persons be appointed tellers, on the part of this House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared: That the result shall be delivered to the PRESIDENT of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses."

Resolved, That Mr. SITGREAVES and Mr. PARKER be appointed tellers on the part of this House, pursuant to the said report.

ILLINOIS AND WABASH LANDS.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the Illinois and Wabash Land Companies, made a report, to this effect: That the committee had met the committee of the Senate on the subject, and that they had determined it to be expedient to adopt the report made by the Senate on this subject in March, 1792. The claims of the petitioners were said to be founded on two deeds, viz: one of July, 1773, the other of October 18, 1775, and they proposed to surrender the whole of their claim to the United States, on condition that the United States would guaranty to them one-fourth part thereof. It was the opinion of the committee, however, that these companies had no legal title to the said lands, and they proposed a resolution to the House that the prayer of the petition could not be granted. Mr. S. gave notice that he should call up this report for decision on Monday morning.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the support of Government, and a partial appropriation for the Military Establishment for the year 1797. It was read a second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

The committee to whom it was referred to inquire what progress had been made in carrying into effect the law relative to grants of lands for military services, and whether any alterations were necessary therein, reported, that owing to the difficulty attending the appointment of a Surveyor General, no progress had been made therein, and that no alterations were necessary in the present law. Laid on the table.

GEORGE CALVERT.

Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of George Calvert, one of the chiefs and warriors of the Chickasaw nation. The petitioner prayed for compensation for provisions furnished to a party of the inhabitants of the State of Tennessee, who went into the Chickasaw nation to assist them in a war against the Creeks. The committee report, that though the motives of the said inhabitants might be good, as the expedition was unauthorized by Government, and might prove a bad example in future, that as they were not bound by Treaty to support the Chickasaws in their wars, it would not be right to establish any precedent which might countenance that principle; they were, therefore, of opinion, that any claim on this subject would be best left to the PRESIDENT, who was competent to determine on the subject; they, therefore, reported that the prayer of the petition could not be granted.

Mr. A. JACKSON moved that this report be referred to a Committee of the Whole, to whom were referred the reports on the petitions of James

POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

The House then entered upon the order of the day, which was the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill regulating Post Offices and Post Roads. The amendments were considered and agreed to, and several additional ones made.

Some debate took place on a motion made by Mr. CHRISTIE to add a new section to the bill, directing a new post office to be established at the Little Falls of Gunpowder, betwixt Harford and Baltimore. His reason for moving this section was, he had applied very often to the Postmaster General in vain to get an office established there, though it was much wanted on account of several manufactories in the neighborhood. The Postmaster General had always told him that he could not fix a post office there, on account of the danger there would be of the mail being robbed. [It seems the mail was once robbed on that road.]

This principle of directing where a post office should be established was opposed by Messrs. THATCHER and HARTLEY as unprecedented.

Mr. SITGREAVES proposed a way of avoiding that objection. He said that it had been invariably the practice of the Postmaster to make every place mentioned by name in the act a place of deposite for the post; he therefore suggested the propriety of introducing the place proposed by name into the bill.

Mr. CHRISTIE accordingly moved these words as an amendment: "From Harford to Baltimore, shall be by the Little Falls of Gunpowder;" which was agreed to.

In debating on this amendment, some notice was taken of what fell from Mr. THATCHER yesterday, with respect to a "check being put upon that House."

Mr. W. LYMAN said he thought the expression used, viz: "That the Postmaster General would be a proper check to that House," was an indignity committed against the House, since they had no other check than the good sense of the community.

Mr. KITTERA observed, in reply, that that House had certainly other checks besides the good sense of the community: there was one check upon them up-stairs and another in the PRESIDENT.

Mr. S. SMITH thought, if they gave power to an Executive officer, and he did not exercise it, that House ought to check him, and not he them. The Postmaster General refused to establish a post-road at the request of the inhabitants of a certain district, and those persons now apply through their Representatives to Congress for redress. He trusted they would have an office established. In answer to Mr. THATCHER, who had doubted whether there was any person living at the place proposed who could be intrusted with the office, he said there was an inhabitant of Little Falls who was able to purchase half the Province of Maine, of which Mr. THATCHER is the Representative.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

On motion of Mr. S. SMITH, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, upon the bill regulating the Military Establishment.

Mr. S. said there was some variation in the bill from the report referred to the Committee: they had struck out the whole of the 11th section of the old act which related to an allowance of extra provisions to the troops employed to the Westward. [The clause was read.] The cause of this extra provision, he said, no longer existed, and therefore they had thought proper to omit the clause, that the troops employed in every quarter might have the same allowance. As chairman of the committee, he thought it necessary to give this information.

Mr. CORR moved to strike out the section which directs that the four regiments of infantry shall be reduced to three. He did not know that the affairs of this country were so much changed for the better, since the last year, as to justify this reduction. He said he was no military man, but he believed great inconveniences would arise from a derangement in the officers by the proposed reduction.

Mr. WILLIAMS said this subject had been already fully discussed, and it had been determined that three regiments would be adequate to all our wants, as those three would contain all the troops now in actual service. The additional expense of keeping up what were called skeletons of regiments of officers, without men, might very well be avoided. When our finances were in so low a state as at present, it was necessary to retrench every unnecessary expense. Indeed, he had heard nothing which could induce him to change his former opinion on the subject. There were only, he said, about 2,500 men in the service, and three regiments with sixteen companies of artillery would afford officers sufficient for the men. To raise men in time of peace, when we wanted the sinews of war, he could not consent to.

Mr. S. SMITH said, since the business was last before the House, he had obtained a list of the posts at which men were placed, and the number of men in each. It was not a perfectly accurate return, but it was as nearly so as he had been able to procure. By this estimate, it appeared that 2,628 men were stationed on the Northwestern and Southern frontiers. Some of the posts, it was true, would be relinquished as unnecessary, but others would be necessary. [Mr. S. delivered in the list at the Clerk's table, and it was read.]

Mr. RUTHERFORD saw no necessity for the present motion, as the business had already been determined upon. Many of the garrisons which had not been mentioned, he said, were perfectly unnecessary. An extensive Military Establishment was an evil in any country; and shall the American people, said he, lean on this support? No; the yeomanry of this country would always be ready to defend it.

Mr. GALLATIN said they had no information before them which led him to suppose that more than three regiments would be wanted. As to the list which had been produced, no kind of conclusion could be drawn from it, because one-half of the posts there mentioned were to be evacuated, viz: all that chain from Fort Washington to the Lakes, in which, according to the list before them, were upwards of 1,000 men.

He would just mention what the expense of the rations, pay, and clothing of a regiment, was: it was $94,628. He would add, that it was important, not only as it respected the rations, pay, and clothing, of a regiment, that the nominal estimate of our Army should be reduced, because the saving would not only apply to those articles, but to the contingencies, as the Quartermaster's department and every other contingent expense was proportioned in proportion to the establishment; and the greater the appropriation, the greater would be the expense, as there was always as much money expended as was appropriated, and always would be, when left to the discretion of the Heads of Departments, as no Department, except the Treasury, had any check upon their expenses, but the amount of the appropriation. Indeed, the expense of the Military Establishment had kept continually swelling; for, though the real amount of men was not more than one-half of the nominal number, the expenses were always equal to the nominal number. The real saving, by striking off the regiment proposed, would be at least $100,000, exclusive of all contingencies. He hoped, therefore, the motion would not prevail.

Mr. S. SMITH did not think it was a good reason for reducing the Military Establishment, because it would be a saving of money to do so, for the same reasoning would go to the destruction of the whole. Mr. S. believed that the pay, rations, clothing, the Hospital department, and Quartermaster's department, for a regiment of men, would be $150,000. It was but fair that the House should know this; but he did not think the cost only ought to be their guide in this matter.

There was one thing which he had frequently urged, but which did not seem to be sufficiently attended to: The forming of officers to their duty took a number of years; and when they were so formed, it was prudent to keep them in the service. It would be said, officers could at all times be got. He denied that experienced officers could at all times be got, and the fighting part was the least essential: for he believed (as he had before said) there were more men killed for want of care than by an enemy. The skeleton of a regiment ought to be kept up. It was good policy to keep such men in the service, as they would preserve the men in health and proper order. This doctrine, he supposed, would be laughed at by any but military men; but he was confident the trifling expense to Government of keeping up these officers was nothing when compared to their usefulness. But, when it should be known that our meritorious officers had been discharged from service, without notice, seven or eight hundred miles from their homes, which they had to travel at their own expense; that when we had done with them they were thrown upon the wide world without provision, men of respectability would refuse to go into the service, and none but the refuse of the people, who could not be provided for any other way, would enter our lists; and those who were best capable of commanding our soldiers, would retire dissatisfied and disgusted.

Mr. HARTLEY said he had delivered his opinion on a former occasion on this subject. He still thought they had no solid ground for making the reduction. It was said there were many posts unnecessary, but he believed all that had been mentioned as useless would not be found so. Mr. H. spoke of the route which would be necessary to be taken between Pittsburg and Fort Franklin, up the Alleghany, and said it would be policy to employ soldiers in working the batteaux, rather than have to hire men for the purpose. More posts, he said, would certainly be wanted on the waters of the Mississippi, and he did not think less than the four regiments would be sufficient. Mr. H. followed Mr. SMITH in speaking of the injustice which would be done to officers by the proposed reduction.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, when they called upon their constituents for revenue, it was necessary they should give some reason for the call. If in 1792 the country was defended by two regiments, they might certainly now be defended by three; but, if the present motion prevailed, they should have double the number. What use, then, will it have been to the United States to have had the Western posts given up? Whilst the British possessed them, they were said to be the cause of disorders on the frontiers, by exciting the Indians against us; yet, now they were given up, we were to keep up additional troops. This seemed to say they must be at a greater expense in peace than in war. Mr. W. then went over the different sums allowed as the price of peace with the Indians, which amounted to ninety thousand dollars per annum, besides which, the last session, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars had been expended in order to get goods amongst them. Taking these sums together, they made a very serious amount; and he thought they ought, at all events, to retrench the expenses of Government wherever they could.

Whatever gentlemen might say about the distressing of officers by discharging them, no officer, when he entered into the service, could consider himself as engaged for a longer term than that for which the service should want him. With respect to making officers an allowance on their being discharged, he had no objection to that, at least for the time which it required to travel to their own homes; and, in all probability, were they to frame a proper Militia law, a number of them might be employed in that service to advantage, since it would be very desirable to keep up a regular discipline in the Militia. These officers being dispersed throughout the Union, they would be of great service in this respect.

Upon the whole, the expense of four regiments, in our present circumstances, was too great. If he thought them necessary, he would give his vote for them; but, in time of peace, he saw no necessity for more than the three regiments.

Mr. MURRAY hoped the motion would succeed, because all he had heard from gentlemen who opposed the retaining the four regiments convinced him they were necessary. He should be glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GALLATIN,) would show him any reason why less troops should be kept up this year than were kept up last. That gentleman had not reasoned with his usual logic on this occasion. He argued, as if it were taken for granted, that the only object was to save money, but had not attempted to show that four regiments were unnecessary.

Military Establishment.

[H. OF R.]

That gentleman had said, that the interior posts might be abandoned, and the troops now in them might be sent upon the frontier; but, for that reason, he would rather augment than diminish the Military Establishment. Few men might serve to guard an inner post; but when these men were sent one hundred miles further back, that moment it became necessary to increase their numbers, because no aid could be given them in case they should want it.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. WILLIAMS) had said, that he was surprised that it should be thought the Military Establishment should be larger now than in 1792. But, Mr. M. said, a moment's reflection would have told that gentleman that the extreme poverty of the Military Establishment at that time was the source of a most melancholy event; for, in November, in the preceding year, a regiment was almost wholly cut off. Congress afterwards became more liberal, and the Military Establishment was enlarged. This was certainly, then, an unfortunate period to refer to, as an example for the present day, when such destruction took place for want of sufficient military force. There was great impolicy both as to the numbers of our military and as to the duration of their term of service. The necessity of enlarging the establishment had, however, at the time alluded to, been forced upon the Government.

Mr. M. said, the Militia were inadequate to the service of defending the country, and much more expensive than troops. He had supposed for three years past, that the Militia system would have been abandoned in favor of regular troops, as they had been found the best and cheapest. The events of the last three or four years have fully evinced this.

But, said Mr. M., if the Military Establishment is to be cut down, I would advise gentlemen to go through with the matter, and move a repeal of the law which empowers the PRESIDENT to call out the Militia at a great expense; because, if they did not mean still to use the most expensive sort of defence; if they were sincere in their assertions that less military force was necessary, let them show that they were willing to give up military defence, and repeal the law which may call out a frontier defence, particularly the mountain militia, who were paid, he believed, a dollar a day while in service. This would convince him that their hearts were at ease with respect to the necessity of a Military Establishment.

We have the most extensive frontier, said Mr. M., except Russia, of any nation in the world; and Russia had not only a large frontier, but had also a similar sort of natives in their back country that we have. What, then, did Russia do? They were obliged to do as the Romans did—to keep up extensive military posts. Nothing so grand as that idea had ever entered this country; but, on the contrary, a parsimonious spirit on all occasions seemed to pervade that House. They tell the people they mean to economize; but, in fact, they were neglecting an establishment which all nations had found necessary—an establishment that was worth infinitely more than any paltry saving which might be made by its curtailment, and the breaking down of which might subject the country to the most serious misfortunes.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, since this matter came into debate, it was necessary to reason upon it. It was necessary, he said, for the Representatives of a free people to pay constant attention to the disposition of the people at large; and this disposition, he was confident, was in opposition to a large Military Establishment. Among the powers delegated to them, he said, was the raising of armies; but if this power was overstrained, the people had a right to complain. To say to them, We cannot trust you, without a large military force to guard us, was an insult to the people at large. He could not, therefore, at a time when money was becoming every hour more precious, consent to the proposed amendment.

Mr. GALLATIN said, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MURRAY] seemed to suppose that after having said it was proper to economize, he [Mr. G.] had not gone far enough; and that there was no ground for making the Military Establishment lower this year than last year. He thought there was considerable difference between this year and last. Last year he voted for making the establishment what it was. Indeed, no actual reduction of the troops then took place; it was merely a nominal reduction and a new organization. At that time the posts on the Lakes, the possession of which would naturally draw after them a reduction of military force, were not secured. It was on this ground that no reduction took place; but, when peace was secured with the Indians from North to South, and the posts were in our hands, it was proper to think of reducing our military, and to compare our present force with what it was before the Indian war.

The gentleman from Maryland had said, that from the very reason that the chain of interior posts was unnecessary, a greater number of men would be wanted for the exterior posts, and that the possession of the posts on the Lakes required a large number of men to guard them. So that, according to that gentleman, the acquirement of those posts from the British would have no other effect than to increase our expense, for they could not be considered as giving any security against the Indians, if a greater number of troops were necessary to defend them than were formerly employed on the frontier.

Mr. G. said he differed in opinion from that gentleman; for he believed fewer troops would be necessary at the posts on the Lakes than were heretofore employed in the posts from the Ohio to the Lakes. If, indeed, it were necessary to have a line of posts beyond those which had been surrendered by the British, it would be requisite that the number of troops should be increased; but he did not believe any such necessity existed. He did not see either the necessity of having posts upon Lake Michilimackinac, the Illinois river, or the Mississippi. They might, in some respects, prove convenient, but that convenience would by no means be equal to the expense which would be incurred.

Mr. G. said, he should return to his position, viz: that the three regiments proposed to be kept up would afford a sufficiency of men for all the posts, and this he would show from the paper which had been laid upon the table by the gentleman from Maryland. He then enumerated a number of posts which might be given up, in which it was reported there were upwards of one thousand men. These, Mr. G. said, would all be useless. At Detroit there were five hundred and twenty-four men, and he believed two or three hundred would be quite sufficient, or perhaps a smaller number. So that men enough might be spared to garrison one or two posts on the Mississippi; because, it ought to be observed, that there would not be a less effective number of men, when the four regiments were reduced to three, than at present.

The number of men being nearly the same, the only argument used for retaining the four regiments was, to keep up the officers so as to form a skeleton of a regiment. He wished when officers were discharged, that some compensation should be made to them; but, however averse he was to the exposing of these men to disappointment, yet this was not to influence him to keep men in pay who could be of no service. If officers were not wanted, they ought to be discharged; and this remark not only applied to the military but the civil department.

The gentleman from Maryland had said, that if those who were in favor of a reduction of the military force were really sincere in their wish to reduce the expense under this head, they would move a repeal of the law which gives to the PRESIDENT the power of calling out the Militia. But, he would ask the gentleman, what that law cost the Union whilst it lay unexecuted? It was a provision against danger; calculated to save money, and not to expend it. It was proper an authority of this kind should be lodged somewhere, to be ready for exercise in case of emergency; as, without such a provision, not only the present establishment, but any establishment which it was in our power to raise, would prove inadequate to a proper defence: to such a defence as it was capable to make by means of our Militia. Instead of three thousand, fifteen thousand men would not be sufficient. But suppose he were to propose the repeal which the gentlemen had mentioned, should he not be charged with wishing to abridge the power of the PRESIDENT, and with a want of confidence in his wisdom? He was confident, however, that such a charge would never be brought against him on this ground. If the gentleman from Maryland thought such a thing desirable, he might himself make the motion; if he did, he should vote against it, because he thought the power a necessary power.

It was true, as the gentleman had said, that we had the most extensive frontier of any other country; but what was the conclusion to be drawn from this? Was it that we should have a large Military Establishment to defend that frontier? Where would this opinion lead them? If it were necessary to defend the frontier by military force, it must be such an one as would be equal to the purpose, and this would require more men than they should be either willing or able to support. No man, Mr. G. said, could be more interested than he and his constituents in preserving peace on the frontier; but he knew that an army was not adequate to this purpose. In time of war, indeed, a military force might prevent certain depredations on particular spots, but with respect to those predatory incursions which the Indians made upon the frontiers in time of peace, an army never had, nor ever would prevent them.

What that gentleman called a necessary establishment, or a large standing army, his ideas of which he seemed to have drawn from foreign countries, was wholly premature when applied to this country. We were not, he said, if such an institution was desirable, (which was by no means the case,) in a situation to support the expense of a Military Establishment. Our finances were low, and the price of labor was higher than in any other part of the world. These two reasons would be an effectual bar to so extensive a system. It was enough that we were a happy people; but if gentlemen wished to anticipate what it was only in the power of time to effect, to make us a powerful nation also, they would find their vanity disappointed. He called it vanity, because such an attempt could only issue in an increase of our Public Debt.

Mr. G. concluded with saying it was necessary to retrench expense wherever it could be done; and, as the Military Establishment was a source in which the most material savings could be expected to be made, he trusted the present motion would not prevail.

Mr. S. SMITH said, if a stranger had heard what had fallen from the gentleman last up, he would have supposed that they were about to establish a large standing army. And yet what was the establishment they were about to make? Truly, it was an establishment of sixteen hundred and sixty men! And yet this had called forth all this declamation. He had wondered to hear that gentleman so incorrect in his statement, and he had been the more surprised, because he was generally more correct than any other man in that House. He had told them of certain posts, which might be given up, (amongst which were Forts Washington and Franklin, which Mr. S. thought necessary to be retained,) in which one thousand men were employed. He agreed with him in this; but he should have gone a little further, and showed that after these one thousand men were deducted from the number said to be in the different posts, there would still be a larger number of men wanted than there would be to supply them, if a regiment was struck off. Besides which, he said, it would be necessary to have posts on the Mississippi, at the Natchez, and at Michilimackinac.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] wished our present force to be upon the same footing as in 1792. He would look into that matter, and if he could show to him that the four regiments would not be equal to what we had then, he should expect he would vote for their continuance. In April, 1790, he said, we had twelve hundred and sixteen officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates; in March, 1791, a regiment of nine hundred and twelve was added—making a force of two thousand one hundred and twenty-eight men. This, it would be seen, was considerably more than our present force, and yet we had now to protect the out-posts formerly in possession of the British, besides all other parts of the United States. In 1791, he said, the force had not been found sufficient, and the PRESIDENT raised another regiment for six months, and, like the flying camps, they were lost. It was time for us, he said, to grow wiser from experience; but experience seemed to be lost upon us. Yet this we called economy; but he called it dissipation.

Mr. S. said we had a number of posts on the Atlantic shore. It was true, there had been a new corps of artillery raised, which might be equal to the protection of them. In consequence of the misfortune of 1791, they determined in 1792, that three additional regiments of infantry should be raised. Three regiments were raised, and they were to go out of service at the end of the war. These were three regiments of upwards of nine hundred men each. At no time had we less than two regiments containing 1,920 men, though gentlemen now wished them to be reduced to somewhat more than 1,200.

Did gentlemen reflect, he asked, in what situation they would leave the new PRESIDENT, by such a measure, who had to succeed a man whose popularity, perhaps, would never be equalled? Was it right to put him in a situation in which he might be disgraced? For, if any misfortune were to befall the country hereafter, it would immediately be said by the people, if GEORGE WASHINGTON had been at the helm, this would not have happened. Notwithstanding he was free to acknowledge the wisdom and patriotism of the successor to the Presidential Chair, he did not expect him to have all the confidence which was placed in his predecessor. Would it, then, be prudent or just, to put him in a worse situation with respect to military force, than he was in? He thought not. Let us not, said he, deprive him of that small force which is at present in being, and, by that means, take from him, perhaps, the means of preserving peace on our frontier.

Mr. GALLATIN said that, in comparing the present establishment with that of 1792, the gentleman from Maryland had omitted to notice the corps of artillery which had been raised since that time. He said he had made the comparison, and he was confident that, when the four regiments were reduced to three, there would not be more than one hundred men of difference betwixt them. He did not recollect on which side the difference lay.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he did not forget the artillery.

Mr. BALDWIN observed, he felt at a loss how to vote for want of information on the subject. From the calculation given them when the question was before under discussion by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEARBORN,] it appeared that two-thirds of the force retained was to be employed on the Northern frontier. The paper on the table agreed pretty much with the statement they then received as to numbers, which might be considered rather as the old plan than the new. If they knew exactly where the new posts were to be established, and the number of men wanted for them, they would be able to form a more correct judgment on the occasion. He saw only one regiment contemplated for the Southern frontier; and he could not conceive it possible that it could be supposed that if one regiment was sufficient to protect that frontier which bordered upon Florida, and on Indians more troublesome than on any other part of our frontier, that two regiments were necessary on the Northwestern frontier. If they had twelve companies for the Northern and twelve for the Southern frontier, and kept the artillery and engineers on the Atlantic coast, he thought they would be quite sufficient; since he could not believe that more troops were necessary on the Northern than on the Southern frontier.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

It was moved that the House adjourn to Monday. This motion was opposed; but was consented to, from a representation that weighty business before the Committee of Ways and Means required more time than could be given to it on days of meeting.

MONDAY, February 6.

The bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SWANWICK presented a memorial of Stephen Addington, of Germantown, in the State of Pennsylvania, calico printer, which was read, praying the aid and patronage of Congress, in the establishment of a manufactory for printing and staining of muslins and linens, within the United States.

Mr. MALBONE presented a petition of Francis Brinley and others, manufacturers of cordage in Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, praying that an additional duty may be imposed on foreign cordage, imported into the United States; or that such other encouragement may be given to the manufacture of cordage within the United States, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem fit.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. DWIGHT FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary of War, of the 20th ultimo, accompanying a list of the names of certain claimants to be placed on the pension list, who have been examined by physicians, and also the returns of the examining physicians thereon, made pursuant to a resolution of the two Houses of Congress, of the 18th of April last, made a report, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That, on a full investigation of the documents referred to them, they find the persons hereafter named have complied with the requisitions of the law respecting pensions for invalids, and are entitled to the several rates of pension annexed to their names, respectively—that is to say—

"Of the District of New Hampshire :

"Joseph Goodridge, a private, half a pension; Joseph Patterson, a private, half a pension.

"Of the District of Vermont :

"Joseph Tyler, a private, half a pension; Isaac Webster, a sergeant, half a pension.

"Of the District of New York :

"Stephen Kellogg, a private, a full pension; Garret Oblenis, a private, half a pension; William Scot, a major, a full pension; Finley Stewart, a batteau-man, three-fourths of a pension; Thomas Ward, a corporal, a full pension.

"Of the District of Maryland :

"Philip Casson, a lieutenant, a full pension.

"Of the District of Virginia :

"Joshua Davidson, a dragoon, three-fourths of a pension; Jonathan Dyer, a private, a full pension.

"Of the District of North Carolina :

"David McKissick, a captain, half a pension; Joseph Singletary, jr., a private, three-fourths of a pension; Ithamar Singletary, a private, one-fourth of a pension; William Simson, a private, half a pension; Joseph Wasson, a private, a full pension.

"Resolved, That the Secretary for the Department of War be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension list of the United States, the several persons before named, who have been returned as pension claimants, by the Judges of several districts, pursuant to an act of Congress, passed the twenty-eighth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, entitled 'An act to regulate claims to invalid pensions,' at the rates and proportions annexed to the names of the said persons, respectively.

"Resolved, That the pensions allowed by this act shall be estimated at the same rates, receivable on the same conditions, and payable in the same manner, as directed in like cases, by the act of the twentieth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled 'An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to place the persons therein named on the pension list.'

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said report, and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

BUOYS IN BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Boston, praying for the placing of certain buoys in the harbor of Boston. The committee recommended that this business should be postponed till the next session.

Mr. AMES was not satisfied with the reasons of postponement. He need not say how important the commerce of Boston was. Many ships, and what was yet worse, many lives had been lost. The buoys would probably save in one season more than the whole would cost. No port in America was of more difficult access.

Mr. SWANWICK did not think that there was time in the present session for entering upon the business. Besides, he was at a loss to know where the money should come from. He wished that to be known before the appropriations were made.

Mr. DEARBORN said, that the whole expense would not be more than fifteen hundred dollars. There were a great variety of islands and shoals, and only a light-house for the direction of shipping.

Mr. AMES observed, that more time would be spent in debating about the report than would have been requisite for passing a bill. As to the fact that buoys were greatly wanted, it had received dreadful confirmation. No harbor in the United States had seen such tragedies of shipwreck in approaching to it. He did not believe that the House would refuse the buoys. By a delay, thirty times the value of so trifling an expense might be lost. So large a part of the public revenue was collected from that harbor as justly entitled it to public attention. The memorial was signed not only by the Marine Society of Boston, but by so many other respectable names, and which were known to so many members in that House to be respectable, that he could not persuade himself of the House suffering the matter to go by in this way.

Mr. CORT moved that the report should be re-committed. He could not help thinking it a slovenly way of doing business to report that there was not time. The committee would not have required longer to say what was their opinion.

The report was re-committed.

SHIPS' REGISTERS.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels;" and to an act, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same;" which was received and read the first and second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

LOST CERTIFICATES.

provision by law, under specific restrictions, for the renewal of destroyed certificates of certain descriptions, made a report, which he delivered at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, as follows:

"That no provision appears to be made by the United States for the renewal of destroyed certificates of any kind, except those of the description called Loan Office certificates and those called final settlements.

"That, by resolutions of Congress of the 10th of May and 18th of July, 1780, provision was made for the renewal of Loan Office certificates destroyed, on proper proof made of the destruction of such certificates to the officers of the Treasury.

"That, by act of Congress of the 24th of April, 1794, the provisions of the said act were extended to certificates of the description called final settlements; other regulations were made respecting the renewal of Loan Office certificates and those called final settlements; and it was declared that all claims for renewal of Loan Office certificates and final settlements not presented at the Treasury on or before the 1st day of June, 1795, should be barred.

"That, by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1795, all certificates commonly called Loan Office certificates, final settlements, and indents of interest, outstanding at the time of passing the said act, and which should not be presented at the office of the Auditor of the Treasury on or before the 1st day of January, 1797, were declared to be forever after barred or precluded from settlement or allowance.

"That most of the cases where certificates of the Public Debt are said to have been destroyed took place long before the passing of the said act of the 24th of April, 1794, and probably a great proportion of them before the passing of the said resolution of the 10th of May, 1780; from which circumstance, as well as from the nature of the subject, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, at this time, to guard against fraud and imposition, should further provision be made for renewing them; and the committee cannot find stronger reasons in favor of keeping in force the statute of limitations in relation to any class of claims than that contemplated in the resolution referred to them. The committee are, therefore, of the opinion that the House ought not to agree to the same."

Mr. C. said, the old Congress had been very liberal relative to the renewal of certificates by the two acts above mentioned; but as the persons holding original certificates were now effectually barred, it was their opinion that such as had been destroyed ought not to stand on higher ground than such as had not been destroyed. And, unless there was an intention of doing away the statute of limitation altogether, they could not see why it should give way, in this particular case, especially since it was one in which so much imposition might be practised.

Mr. GREENUP said he should vote against this report. No species of public securities was better guarded than this. Distant parts of the country, he said, had never heard of the law for admitting these claims until it was expired. He thought it should be extended for a year or two more. He knew there were many just claims in the part of the country from which he came.

Mr. SITGREAVES declared his intention of voting against this report. He came to Congress, he said, with strong convictions that great injustice was done in rejecting claims upon Government, and his experience since he came here had not removed that sentiment. He was convinced that justice was refused to many claimants; and he thought that class of claimants who had possessed evidences of Public Debt, but had lost them, was entitled to relief. He did not agree with the gentleman from Connecticut, that because it was possible frauds might take place, no relief should be granted. He thought frauds might easily be prevented. It struck him as a strange kind of reasoning to say, that if the holders of the original tickets were not admitted, neither ought those who had lost their certificates, since their having lost them might be the reason why they were not presented in time. He hoped the report would be disagreed to.

Mr. HARPER coincided in opinion with the last speaker.

Mr. HEATH hoped the report would be concurred in. To grant relief in this particular case would be a partial administration of justice, and an injustice to a crowd of other claimants whose claims were equally well founded. If the act of limitation were to be taken off in any case, he said, no set of men had a greater claim to regard than the poor soldier who had fought our battles, and who, by misfortune or accident, had been prevented from applying in time for the satisfaction of his equitable claim. He hoped, therefore, this report would be agreed to.

Mr. S. SMITH spoke against the report.

Mr. MACON said, this subject had nothing to do with the statute of limitation. An act had been passed to allow time for those certificates to be brought in, and as they had not been brought in, he did not think any further provision ought to be made.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, and the report was agreed to—yeas 49, nays 37, as follows:

COMPENSATION TO COLLECTORS, &c.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was recommit- ted, on the 30th ultimo, the bill relative to the compensations of certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of imposts and tonnage, reported an amendatory bill relative to the compensations of certain officers employed in the collection of impost and tonnage; which was received, and read the first time.

The said bill was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

MONEYS DUE FROM REVENUE OFFICERS.

On motion by Mr. W. SMITH, it was Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom it was referred on the 21st of December last, to inquire and report whether any, or what, alterations are necessary in the laws to enforce the payment of moneys due from the various revenue officers of the United States, be instructed to report thereon by bill or otherwise."

RECEIVERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented, according to order, a bill to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and Receivers of Public Money; which was received, and read the first and second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

DUTY ON SPIRITS.

On motion by Mr. GALLATIN, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the restriction in the fifty-sixth section of the act, entitled 'An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled in the United States, and for appropriating the same,' so far as the said restriction respects any domestic distilled spirits which may be exported from the district of Louisville, in the State of Kentucky, or from any district which may be hereafter established on the rivers Mississippi and Ohio, or the branches thereof, and to report by bill or otherwise."

Ordered, That Mr. GALLATIN, Mr. COIT, and Mr. SKINNER, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill regulating the Military Establishment; and the motion for striking out the clause relative to the three regiments of infantry, for the purpose of inserting four, being under consideration—

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he did not intend to have spoken again on this subject, had it not been for some observations which had fallen from a gentleman [Mr. S. SMITH] from Maryland. That gentleman had observed that the retaining the four regiments would not produce as many troops as the establishment of 1792, which had been contended for by him. Let us, said Mr. W., compare the pay of the troops in 1792 with the estimate for the present year. The pay of the troops in 1792 was $147,771 11. The estimate for the present year for the pay of the troops is $246,970 31, if the clause is struck out. In this calculation, however, is the allowance of the Major General and his aids to the time they were to be continued; but when we add the pay of the Brigadier General and others, in the bill before us, we may calculate at least on $250,000. If then, said Mr. W., we have not as many troops now as we had in 1792, how comes this vast augmentation of pay? But the gentleman had omitted to mention the twelve companies of artillery, which, with the great addition of officers in consequence of the changing the establishment, was the cause. And, said Mr. W., the system which he had proposed the other day to reduce the four regiments of infantry to two, on the same principle as the establishment in the year 1792, would have lessened the expense and had an equal force; but this was overruled. The changing the establishment of 1792, if the motion is agreed to, will be an addition of one Brigadier General and the officers annexed thereto, two Lieutenant Colonels Commandant, two Majors, two Paymasters, two Surgeons, four Surgeon's Mates, eight Captains, eight Lieutenants, and eight Ensigns. Yet, says that gentleman, we shall not have as many troops as in 1792. Where, then, is the propriety in asking us to agree to the motion? If the clause stands in the bill, have we now more troops than will complete the sixteen companies of artillery, which, is 992, exclusive of officers and three regiments of infantry, agreeably to the establishment of the 28th of May, 1796, which amounts to 1,506, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates; which, being added together, makes 2,498, exclusive of officers? If these are nearly the number now in service, as was supposed to be the case by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEARBORN,] which, by the by, is all the information we have, why augment that number? We find in the estimates $16,000 for bounties, premium to officers, &c. Should the reduction take place, the greater part of this sum would not be wanted. The expenses of the Hospital department in the year 1792 was $4,835 67; in the estimate for the present year it is $30,000. In short, said Mr. W., let gentlemen turn over the estimates, and pause for a moment, and he was confident the motion would not obtain.

If the bill is passed, as reported, we shall then have one Brigadier General, one Quartermaster General, one Inspector General, one Paymaster General, four Lieutenant Colonels Commandant, ten Majors, four Surgeons, eighteen Surgeon's Mates, one principal Artificer, one second Artificer, four Paymasters, five Adjutants, forty-two Captains, sixty-eight Lieutenants, twenty-four Ensigns—total 186 officers and 2,493 non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates. These, he contended, were sufficient for a Peace Establishment, and to be stationed as follows: On the sea-coast, six companies; in Georgia, five companies; in Tennessee, three companies; at the Natchez, three companies; near the mouth of the Ohio, one company; near the mouth of the Illinois, one company; on Lake Michigan, two companies; Michilimackinac, two companies; Detroit, four companies; Fort on the Miami, one company; Fort Wayne, &c., two companies; Presqu'Isle, one company; Niagara, four companies; Oswego, one company; Fort Franklin, &c., on the Alleghany, one company; Fort Hamilton, &c., three companies—total forty companies, which is according to the establishment by the bill.

Mr. W. said, that the number of troops estimated by the Secretary of War to be kept at Detroit, was about a regiment. This, he supposed, was in consequence of its being said that a number of inhabitants adjacent thereto were unfriendly. If this was the case, which he did not believe, they must, in June or July next, by the Treaty, either remove or be considered American citizens; so that, in either case, the number contemplated would not be wanted.

Mr. W. said, he was persuaded that the number of officers and men, contained in the bill before them, was adequate to a peace establishment. Had the gentleman's motion been for an additional battalion of artillerists, it would, in our present situation, have had weight with him; because the duty of the artillery is not merely mechanical, but requires to be studied. If this is omitted, and any difficulty were to arise, the want of experience would be detrimental; for, if we are inexperienced, the business must be put in the hands of foreign adventurers, soldiers of fortune. If, then, we can make a saving in the infantry, and augment our defence on the sea-coast, by improving our fortifications, and in the protection of our commerce, ought we not to embrace it? Have not that class of our citizens who have laid out vast sums in buildings, &c., in our capitals, a demand on us for protection; and, in doing this, are we not securing our revenue? What is the situation of our fortifications, harbors, &c.? Are they not in a situation truly discouraging to the citizens? It is a duty incumbent on us to pursue every necessary and prudent measure to encourage their industry and usefulness.

The motion before us, said Mr. W., is for a defence where it is declared, by those who are most likely to be in danger if any difficulty should arise with the Indians, no danger is to be apprehended. Who, then, is this force to benefit? The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Corr?] He would insure him from the depredation of the Indians; for, when they were aided by Burgoyne's army, they did not get within one hundred miles of that gentleman; and if the gentleman from Maryland is under any apprehension, those on the frontiers of Pennsylvania will check any invasion towards them. He was sorry to hear the gentleman from Connecticut make the motion, because he had generally found him an economist. It was but a few days since he moved to strike out a few dollars for a doorkeeper, whilst this item would save at least $100,000. Mr. W. observed, that the gentlemen in favor of the motion had two objections to the clause. The one was, they were afraid of the Indians, and the other, that it would be imprudent to discharge the officers. With respect to the first, said Mr. W., unless that gentleman can make it appear that it is for the interest of the Indians to go to war, he could not entertain an idea that it would be the case; and if it were so, what would that establishment be towards the defence of this country? If a war was to be apprehended, are the troops that we now have properly stationed? Not even a sergeant's guard is contemplated in the paper from the Secretary of War, on Lake Champlain. They had no troops, nor were there any on the frontier from the sea, in the Province of Maine, to Oswego. The Militia, he conceived, were the best troops on the frontiers, and the disciplined troops on the sea-coast. The latter ought to be chiefly artillery.

With respect to the reduction of the officers, it is only to examine the different laws by which they were created officers, in which we find there is an uniformity of sentiment, that they are only to serve a given time; but any part, or the whole, to be discharged when not wanted. The second and third sections of the act of the 9th of May, 1794, prohibit any enlistment after three years from the time of passing the act; and in the sixteenth section of the same act it is declared that the PRESIDENT may order the forbearance to raise or to discharge any part, &c. From these observations it appears the officers knew, when they were appointed, upon what principle the appointment took place, and it was optional with them to accept or not. It is a poor compliment paid to an officer to be told, "Sir, your service is no longer wanted, but, fearing you cannot support yourself, we will support you." Let us, said Mr. W., pay them well for a reasonable time, and give them a chance to enter into a business more serviceable to the community; and, even in this case, we shall save the subsistence, &c. Mr. W. observed, that he was apprehensive we should do the officers much greater injury to keep them in service and not pay them; for, said he, in taking the yeas and nays, he had observed that gentleman had voted to retain the payment, and had opposed the direct tax. If gentlemen's observations are to be relied on, that the laying on more duties on imposts will not augment the revenue, and no other tax is agreed on, where is the money to come from to pay these troops? For his part, he saw the difficulty. The session is so near the close, that little can be expected to be raised this year by a direct tax. The difficulty of arranging such a law, and the passing of it this session, was doubtful. If, Mr. W. said, the bill was according to his wish, he should vote against it, if the produce thereof was to be appropriated to troops which he conceived were not wanted. Direct taxes never ought to be imposed unless our commerce is interrupted, or for the express purpose of discharging the National Debt.

MR. COOPER said, he highly approved of saving money, and was no friend to standing armies; but, when it was proposed to disband a part of our little army for the purpose of saving money, and that at the expense of a reproach upon the nation, he could not content himself by giving a silent vote upon the occasion. When they were about to starve their public officers, by refusing to advance their salaries; when they talked of stopping the building of our frigates, and suffering them to rot upon the stocks; when they were proposing to discharge one regiment of our infantry out of four—he thought such measures were dishonorable to the United States as an independent nation, who had friends and allies with great and respectable nations, who might read that the Legislature of this country was engaged in discussing the propriety of making a saving in its expenses, by striking off 400 men from its Army. Wonderful calculation! to say that three regiments are necessary, but that four are not.

Notwithstanding this calculation, he should make a different one, which he thought would justify him in voting for the present motion. If it was true, what his colleague [MR. WILLIAMS] had stated last session, that great advantages were to arise from a trade with Canada, (and he believed it were,) it followed that we required as many troops to keep possession of the posts formerly occupied by the British as were employed in and by them, or more, because, he said, we must make ports of entry and delivery on the margin of our country. He hoped, therefore, his colleague would be convinced of the impolicy of striking out one regiment from our present establishment. Besides, if we are thus to strike off our officers, we should not find men ambitious to serve us in future, when our necessities might need them.

MR. S. SMITH said, the committee had frequently been called upon to give an account of the posts in which the men were to be stationed, and the number which would be required. They had found it difficult to obtain information on this subject. The Secretary of War had given them only the posts heretofore occupied, with a number of men employed. He had, however, obtained other information, which he believed pretty correct, with respect to the posts necessary to be garrisoned in future, and the number of men required for each. He said they were as follows:

Otsego	-	-	-	62
Niagara	-	-	-	124
Presqu'Isle	-	-	-	124
Detroit	-	-	-	248
Michillimackinac	-	-	-	124
Chicago	-	-	-	124
Opie	-	-	-	62
Caschatca	-	-	-	124
Massac	-	-	-	62
Fort Knox	-	-	-	62
Fort Washington	-	-	-	62
Pittsburg and Franklin	-	-	-	124
Fort Wayne	-	-	-	186

Walnut Hills	-	-	-	62
Natchez	-	-	-	248
Southwestern Territory	-	-	-	124
Georgia	-	-	-	372
Total	-	-	-	2,294

In 1792, Mr. S. said, the estimate was 1,920 infantry and 300 artillery, making 2,220; and, according to the present establishment, he said, they were—

Four regiments of infantry, which, when full, are	-	-	-	1,984
One regiment of artillery	-	-	-	764
				2,748

This was under a supposition that the regiments were always complete, and, therefore, if 15 per cent. were deducted it would give the real number. The list he had given contemplated nearly an equal number of men for the Southern and Northern frontier.

The gentleman from New York [MR. WILLIAMS] had made some observations, which it might be necessary to notice. He had stated the pay of the establishment in 1792 to be $147,000; but he would recollect that the pay of the men then was only three dollars a month, whilst at present it was four. He should also recollect that there were now six companies of artillery more than in 1792; and if he took this variation in price with that of a dollar a month, it would be found to come to much the same thing. There was a great difference also in the price of rations. Flour at Pittsburg was then at three dollars, now it was eight or ten. Beef and all other supplies were in the same proportion, and, therefore, no wonder need be made at the difference of price, as it arose out of the natural course of things. There was a great difference also in the price of clothing, for, since 1791, the duty upon articles imported had been nearly doubled.

When the gentleman from New York spoke of the Militia as a proper defence for the frontier, he contemplated his own situation only. The distance between the frontier and parts where any Militia could be had, was too great to think of wholly relying upon them—in some cases upwards of three hundred miles. It was in a few parts only where Militia could be called upon. He had heard with pleasure, some days ago, what the gentleman from Virginia [MR. PAGE] had said on the subject of the post which was cut off by the Indians in 1791, owing to its being too weakly garrisoned. The Spaniards had also suffered a similar loss from the same cause. This was the way, he said, in which experience was purchased; and if the people murmured at such events, they could tell them they had acted from economy.

The gentleman had spoken of the six regiments being reduced to four last session. They were not really reduced, but newly organized and fixed as a permanent establishment. How could officers, therefore, contemplate a discharge at the end of six months? They could not, possibly; and he trusted they would have more steadiness than now to change what they had then fixed.

Mr. GALLATIN wished to make a remark or two upon what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH.] He thought, by his statement, he had brought the matter to issue. If, from the statement of the posts which that gentleman had produced, he could show several of them to be unnecessary, and which never had been thought of till lately, it would be a conclusive proof that as many men as were estimated to be necessary for them, might be deducted from the number which that gentleman supposed to be necessary, and leave a sufficient number behind. Chicago, at the South end of Lake Michigan, near the head of the Illinois river; Opie, on the river Illinois, and Caschatca, near the mouth of the Illinois river, would not be necessary. Whilst we had a chain of posts from Fort Wayne to Detroit, there was no occasion for any on the outside of these. If it were said they were for the sake of trade, he would answer, that if they were not there the Indians would come forward to the nearest post. These were new establishments, and the troops might well be saved that were intended for these posts.

Again, on the Mississippi: He agreed it would be proper to have a post at the Natchez, but why at Walnut Hills? There was not a single inhabitant within five hundred miles of that place.

These deductions would make a saving of six companies. In the next place, the four companies proposed for Otsego, Franklin, Pittsburg, and Washington, were unnecessary. These, he said, were settlements, and stood in need of no military to defend them. The only plea for some of these posts was to keep up a communication between the Ohio and the Lakes; but this might be done by a storekeeper, as he hoped it would not be thought necessary to have a post with troops wherever they fixed a store.

Mr. G. said, he should not enter into detail with respect to any of the posts already in possession of the United States. He would take it for granted that the statement was right. It was enough to say that those which he had mentioned might be done without.

The gentleman from Maryland had made a small misstatement with respect to the artillery. He had stated the present artillery at 764 men, whereas they consisted of 992 non-commissioned officers and privates. It was from thence it resulted (to which he alluded the other day) that our establishment, if reduced to three regiments would be greater than it was in 1792. It was then two regiments of 960 men each, and one battalion of artillery, whereas at present we should have had three regiments of infantry of 480 men each, and four battalions of artillery.

He should not make any further observations at present, as his only intention was to remark upon the statement which had been laid upon the table.

Mr. COOPER said there seemed to be a mistake in confounding Oswego with Otsego; the former was a settled place, but not the latter.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was sorry to hear the gentlemen persevere on this occasion to keep up a military force. As for his part, he said he was a rough son of nature, and should not pretend to dictate to gentlemen of information; but he must be permitted to deliver his sentiments in his own plain way. Where, said he, are the great characters of 1776? How are we changed in the space of fourteen years! Then, every man was ready to defend his country; but now we were calling out in the tone of women, "Save this great Confederation, by the skeleton of a fourth regiment of infantry and two troops of horse!" When we can raise 200,000 generous Republicans, and 100,000 on horseback! when the people are double and treble to what they were during the revolution, and yet shall we cry out, "O, save us, with a few hired troops!"

How would Warren and Mercer, with a long train of heroes, now no more, blush for their degraded sons, were they now to behold them in their cry for a Standing Army! The people loathe the idea of such a thing; and when it is considered what a scene of idleness and its consequent vices such an establishment furnishes, all good citizens ought to loathe it.

Mr. HOLLAND said, four reasons had been urged for the present motion; the first was, as being necessary to defend our frontiers against the savages; the second, for the purpose of keeping up military discipline; the third, in order to keep up an experienced set of officers; the fourth, as it respected our Chief Magistrate elect. As he had been anticipated in some of his observations, he should be as concise as possible in what he offered to the consideration of the Committee.

With respect to defending the frontier, it was altogether matter of opinion as to what number of troops were necessary for that purpose. No two gentlemen seemed to agree on this point. The gentleman from Maryland had presented them with a list of the posts necessary to be garrisoned, and the number of men requisite for each; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania had shown several of them to be unnecessary; and he must own that he coincided in opinion with that gentleman, because, knowing him to live upon the frontier, he believed him to be a much better judge of what was necessary for its defence than any gentleman who lived at a distance. Arguments, for increasing military strength on our frontier, did not come with a good grace from gentlemen who lived far removed from danger. If gentlemen who were inhabitants of the frontier were satisfied, he thought those who lived at a distance might make themselves easy on the subject.

When the question was before the House the other day, the gentleman from Georgia voted for the reduction of the four regiments to three. Georgia had an extensive frontier; yet, it seemed, they did not think this additional regiment necessary. South Carolina had no frontier. The State of Tennessee had a large frontier, and he believed the member from that State had voted for the reduction. Kentucky was also surrounded by savages. That State was also interested in the keeping up of a standing force, as it afforded a market for their produce—yet one of the gentlemen from that State voted against the fourth regiment. The States of Pennsylvania and New York had frontiers, yet the gentlemen living upon them had voted for decreasing the military force. This evidence was so strong to his mind that the three regiments would be sufficient, that he should certainly vote against the present motion.

With respect to discipline, troops placed at such a distance from each other as these would be, could answer but little purpose in this way.

In reference to the officers, which a reduction would displace, it was true some derangement would be occasioned; and he supposed they might not altogether be satisfied with it; but the question was, are they necessary? If not, they ought to be dismissed, and they should rather rejoice than otherwise that the country is in a state to do without them. He should think no man of spirit would choose to receive his country's money, when he was sensible his services were not wanted.

With respect to what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland, as to the effect a reduction of the military force might have upon our new President, viz: that if any disaster were to happen to this country, it would be said, if GEORGE WASHINGTON had been at the helm, such a misfortune would not have happened—who would say this? Only such as took a superficial view of the matter. This was a strange kind of reasoning. He did not think it necessary to keep up a fourth regiment on this ground.

Taking these four reasons together, they amounted to nothing but that a large Military Establishment was wished to be kept up in time of peace; and he believed any military they might conclude to have, might as well remain in the seaports as go upon the frontiers, as they were of little use in protecting the frontiers. Men placed in such posts seldom went further from their station than the length of their gun-shot, whereas the Militia pursued an Indian when he had done injury to himself or neighbor. But some gentlemen, perhaps, think the Militia should not pursue the Indians in this way when they commit murders on the frontiers; but, for his own part, if an Indian were to come into his neighborhood, and do him a material injury, he should pursue him.

Mr. H. said they ought, at this time, to be very careful how they expended the public money. On this account, he thought it was unnecessary to occupy several of the posts which had been mentioned; those at Detroit and the Natchez might be necessary.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COOPER] had said all the posts should be garrisoned as strongly as they were garrisoned by the British; and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MURRAY] had compared our situation with Russia. He did not think it necessary to compare this country with either of those nations, nor draw our necessities for military force from them. Our citizens were always ready to defend themselves, and wanted not the examples of other nations to urge them to their duty.

Mr. HEATH said, he was not in the House when this subject was formerly under discussion. He should wish, therefore, to give a few reasons why he should vote for striking out this clause. The only reasons given for retaining it were two—one on account of public economy, and the other because it was not necessary to occupy all the posts which had been mentioned.

Economy, he said, was of great consequence; he was an advocate for it. He knew the distressed situation of the United States for money, and he would grant that it was a good argument against unnecessarily spending money; but he was afraid, lest while they were talking about peace on the frontier, that peace should be broken. For, he would ask any gentleman who had ever attended at all to Indian affairs, whether ever a permanent peace could be had with savages? Nay, it could not be expected, since even European nations kept peace no longer than whilst it suited their interest.

On account of the accession of territory which we had gained by Treaty, it was necessary it should be defended. Perhaps it would be better for us if we confined our dominion; but, having unfortunately extended it, it was necessary to take care of it. Since 1792 we had gone down the Mississippi more than five hundred miles, and, in consequence, posts were necessary to be kept up there. Let us advert to this circumstance, and say whether, when four regiments were necessary before this accession of territory, they were not necessary now; if they were necessary, whether, merely from a squarish economy, they would reject one of them? If they were to do so, it might prove an ill-timed parsimony, which they might have cause to repent of.

He detested a large Military Establishment as much as his colleague when in peace, and would watch over it with as much jealousy; but he would not on that account refuse to keep what was absolutely necessary. If four regiments were agreed to be kept up, they would never be full; and, if they were reduced to three, not more than two-thirds could be expected to be always in readiness. And were these sufficient for the defence of the United States? He denied it, and thought the time an extremely improper one to think of reducing the Military Establishment. If it were, indeed, to increase it, he might object to the measure; but when it was merely to leave it in statu quo, he had no doubt on the subject. Indeed, were they to make the proposed reduction, it was probable the Indians might hear of it, and it might have the effect to encourage them to make war upon the frontier—as no peace could be said to be held with them; at best, it could only be called a truce.

Mr. HARTLEY said, as he was one of the committee, he thought it necessary to say a few words more on this subject. The gentleman who had been up had said, it was very strange that the Militia was not relied upon. This subject had frequently been brought forward; but it had been thought necessary to have regular troops on the frontiers, and that the posts should be extended into the Indian country, for the purpose of cultivating harmony with the Indians. He spoke of the advantages which would be derived from the fur and skin trade, and of the necessity of keeping up posts to protect that trade. It had been said, that the posts at Pittsburg and Washington were unnecessary; but, as he had before observed, the men could be employed in working the batteaux.

The establishment last session, he said, was considered as a Peace Establishment. The PRESIDENT, since that time, had organized the troops; the officers and men had been ordered to their stations, and some of them had already reached their destination in the frozen regions of the North, not apprehending that as soon as they were fairly arrived there, they would hazard being discharged from their service, and left to get home as they could.

He was for economy, but he was also for supporting the Government of our country; such a number of troops as were convenient, and which prevented our citizens from being too often called upon, he was for supporting; and it was a little extraordinary that gentlemen from the frontiers should be so much in favor of calling out their fellow-citizens to the frontiers for the purpose of defending them against the savages.

If the reduction took place, the deficiency would be made by Militia at three times the expense. As to the expense of the regiment in question, he doubted not our citizens would be ready to pay it, and if a land tax was found to be necessary, he would rather pay it than have an Indian war.

The question for striking out was taken, and carried 42 to 41. The Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 7.

THOMAS SPRIGG, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Hannah de Neufville, reported that the services and sacrifices of the deceased John de Neufville, during our Revolutionary war, as stated in the memorial, constituted a reasonable claim in behalf of his distressed widow and children, on the justice of the United States, but it would be impossible to ascertain and liquidate the same in a precise sum; but the committee proposed as equal and right that 3,000 dollars should be allowed to be equally divided amongst them. This report was read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday.

Mr. HARPER laid on the table a set of resolutions as to the method of taking evidence in contested elections.

Mr. HARPER called up a short resolution relative to striking out of a resolution, which he laid on the table the 6th of January last, that part which directs the salaries of officers to be stated: on a division—ayes 27, noes 40.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they had agreed to the resolutions for calling upon the debtor States, with amendments, to which they requested the concurrence of the House of Representatives; it was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

INCREASE OF SALARIES.

A bill was also received from the Senate for increasing the compensation of the members of the Legislature and certain officers of Government; which was read, and, on motion that it be read a second time, it was carried, 33 to 30. It was accordingly read a second time.

The bill contemplates an advance of $5,000 to the present salary of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and $2,000 to the VICE PRESIDENT, to commence on the 4th of March next, and continue for four years; and that the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, Attorney General, Postmaster General, Assistant Postmaster General, Comptroller of the Treasury, Auditor, Register, Commissioner of the Revenue, Accountant of the War Department, the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and the principal clerks employed by them, the Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, the Door-keepers and Assistant Door-keepers of both Houses, have an advance of 25 per cent. upon their present compensation.

Mr. PARKER moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till the first Monday in December next. He said they had lately had the subject of augmenting the salaries of all the officers here mentioned, except the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT and themselves, under consideration; and as they had resolved to refuse an advance to others, he trusted they should also refuse it to themselves. He thought the present an improper time to go into the subject.

Mr. HARTLEY wished the gentleman would consent to some day next week. He could not say he was ready to agree to the whole of the advances proposed, but he wished the subject to be taken into consideration, and perhaps by the time he had mentioned they might have some further information on the subject of our finances.

Mr. MACON said, the most regular way for the gentleman from Virginia to obtain his object, would be to move to have the bill committed to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for the 4th of March.

Mr. PARKER made that motion.

Mr. HARTLEY hoped this motion would not be agreed to, as it was a sort of manœuvre to get rid of the subject, which he did not approve. He would either have the bill negatived at once, made the order of some day in the present session, or postponed till the next.

Mr. AMES said gentlemen had no doubt a right to govern their own votes according to their own notions of propriety. No man had a right to prescribe to another. His conscience was no rule to any other man. But he thought he was authorized to say, they neither had nor claimed a right to do a right thing in a wrong way. To agree to the motion proposed, would be an insincere way of putting a negative upon the bill. He trusted gentlemen who wished this would do it in a more direct way. The compensation of the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT could not be augmented, he said, after they had entered upon their office; and to say they would take up the subject for consideration at a time when their powers would not exist, was an evasive manner, which he approved not. It was an easy thing for gentlemen to say no on the question, without taking this circuitous way of putting an end to the subject.

Mr. VENABLE thought the view of his colleague would be answered as well by a postponement to the 3d of March as to the 4th, and it would be more orderly. Nor did he think this way of disposing of the business called for the censure which the gentleman from Massachusetts had thrown upon it. It was a question upon which that House had already decided by a considerable majority. No new light had been thrown upon the subject, and he thought it by no means disrespectful to postpone it. It was well known that the effect of this motion would be a postponement for the present session. This was what he wished; and if his colleague would consent to alter his motion to the 3d of March, he should not hesitate to vote for it.

Mr. PARKER had no objection to the motion standing for the 3d of March, though he did not consider the motions for the first Monday in December or the 4th of March as unparliamentary. He thought the salaries of the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT high enough. The salaries of some of their public officers might at present be somewhat too low, but the time would soon come when the price of living would become lower, and then they would be fully adequate; and therefore he did not wish to see them advanced at present.

Mr. BUCK was opposed to putting off the question till the time contemplated by the present motion. To get rid of the subject in such a way, would be descending from that state of independence which they ought to preserve, and would have the appearance of a slight cast upon another branch of Government. If they were prepared to meet the question, they might as well meet it now as then. To agree to the motion proposed, would show a degree of cowardice, and effectually put it out of their power to consider and determine upon the subject. The Senate, he said, had found sufficient reason to originate this bill, and he thought, if it were only out of complaisance to them, the subject should not be treated in the way proposed. It was said that this subject had already been decided, but he did not think so. There had been no general proposition for augmenting compensation. They had had the subject under view partially, but he knew there were some members (he knew of one at least) who voted against any partial advance, because they thought it should be general. This was his motive. He thought all the officers of Government were upon an equal footing, and therefore he voted against advancing the salary of one and not of another—not because he thought they were already sufficiently compensated; he did not think they were. He wished, therefore, the subject for a general augmentation to come under discussion. If he should be convinced an advance was improper, he should give it up, and should be against putting the subject off to a time when it could not be considered.

Mr. HARTLEY again urged the propriety of postponing for a shorter period: he mentioned the 17th instant.

Mr. MACON said he was opposed to the bill in toto, and he considered the motion of the gentleman from Virginia as meant to try the question. He wished it to stand for the 4th of March, as at first proposed, because, if it stood for the 3d, the subject might be called up and acted upon on the last day of the session. He should therefore renew the 4th of March, because, if there were a majority who wished the bill to be rejected, it was desirable that as little time as possible should be lost upon the subject.

The question for postponing till the 4th March was put and negatived, 46 to 45.

Mr. PARKER then moved to have it postponed till the 3d of March.

Mr. HENDERSON thought it more proper to postpone till the 3d than till the 4th. He was ready, he said, to meet the question, either in a direct or indirect way. He had made a calculation, and found that the advances proposed would amount from $100,000 to $110,000. Mr. H. believed our finances were not in a state to admit of this addition to our expenses; besides, he trusted every necessary of life would soon be reduced in price, so as to render any advance of salary to our officers unnecessary.

The question was put and negatived, 57 to 32.

On motion of Mr. HARTLEY, Friday week was proposed and negatived, there being only 35 votes for it.

Mr. GALLATIN moved that the subject should be made the order for this day. He said he had voted for postponing it till the 4th of March, with a view of getting rid of it; but since it must be considered, he wished it to be disposed of as soon as possible.

Mr. SITGREAVES proposed that it be made the order of the day for Monday.

The sense of the House was first taken for Monday and negatived, there being only 41 votes for it. It was then put for this day and carried, there being 58 votes for it.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the act regulating the Military Establishment, and went through it, without further amendment or debate. The Committee accordingly rose, and reported the bill with the amendment. The House took it up, and the amendment being under consideration—

Mr. HOLLAND called for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. FINDLEY said, it would be recollected by a number of members in that House, that he had always heretofore been in favor of increasing the Army, as well as the rations and pay of our troops. It might be thought, therefore, when he now voted for reducing it, he should not act consistently; but he believed himself perfectly consistent. His object in increasing our military strength was, by increasing our force, to put a more speedy end to war. Heretofore, he said, they had generally had estimates from the proper departments, which shared a part of the responsibility with them; but, on this occasion, they were groping in the dark. Every information which had been given, had rather been matter of opinion of individual members, and of the Secretary of War, than official; therefore, every one was at liberty to exercise his own opinion.

FEBRUARY, 1797.]

Military Establishment.

[H. OF R.]

As far as he was acquainted with the subject, he believed there was no necessity for all the posts which had been mentioned. There was no occasion for any troops at Pittsburg, and very few at Franklin or Presqu'Isle. It had been said, the men might be employed in the batteaux. If this were to be the case, it should be so said in the law, as it had not been usual, nor did he believe the men would be willing to be so employed. Besides, he believed it would be much better to hire men for this purpose when they were wanted. And if the supplies were to be transported by land, persons could always be hired for the purpose. There was no need of guards, he said, in that country, as it was settling very rapidly, and no danger was apprehended from Indians. He believed half the number which had been mentioned would be sufficient for Fort Franklin. If, indeed, it was made a depot, a larger guard would be required. The only danger from the Indians there, was, when they came across the Lake; when they did this, they did it very suddenly.

But gentlemen seemed to have mistaken the object of these troops. They were spoken of as if they were necessary to defend the country. They were not wanted to defend anything but the posts: they were of little use in defending the frontier. They sometimes, indeed, gave information of an attack, and sometimes not. But the defence of the frontier must always rest upon the people themselves, either in the form of militia or of rangers. This was the way in which settlements must be protected in case of war. Where there were settlements, there was, therefore, no need of posts. And a small force was only necessary at the posts, as the Indians would seldom attack a post, knowing the force which was in them. The greatest danger of posts was from the Indians surrounding and starving them out. He remembered an instance of this kind at Fort Lawrence.

It had been said that the number of men in service would always be one-third less than the nominal number, from a variety of causes. He should wish to provide against this by raising the wages of the men, or by any other way. He did not want skeletons of regiments; but if this evil existed, he should wish to cure it. He should vote for the reduction, because he thought three regiments would provide men enough for all the purposes for which they were wanted.

4th Con.—68

Mr. RUTHERFORD again entertained the House on this subject, and in the course of his remarks he said, "he loved a soldier—he had been a soldier himself, and had long marched and fought in his country's cause for nothing a day and found himself."

The motion was, to strike out the following words, viz:

"And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States cause to be arranged the officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, of the four regiments of infantry, and two companies of light dragoons, now in service, in such manner as to form and complete, out of the same, three regiments of infantry; and the supernumerary officers shall be considered, from and after the last day of June next, discharged from the service of the United States."

The question was taken, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in the said amendment, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 50, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Theophilus Bradbury, Gabriel Christie, Joshua Coit, Wm. Cooper, William Craik, Samuel W. Dana, James Davenport, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, George Ege, Abiel Foster, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glen, Chauncey Goodrich, Andrew Gregg, Roger Griswold, George Hancock, Robert Goodloe Harper, Thomas Hartley, John Heath, Thomas Henderson, William Hindman, John Wilkes Kittera, George Leonard, Samuel Lyman, James Madison, Francis Malbone, John Milledge, Frederick A. Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Alexander D. Orr, John Page, Josiah Parker, John Patten, Elisha R. Potter, Francis Preston, Samuel Sewall, Samuel Sitgreaves, Nathaniel Smith, Isaac Smith, Samuel Smith, William Smith, Thomas Sprigg, Richard Thomas, Mark Thompson, John E. Van Allen, and Peleg Wadsworth.

NAYS.—Theodorus Bailey, David Bard, Thomas Blount, Nathan Bryan, Daniel Buck, Dempsey Burges, Samuel J. Cabell, Thomas Claiborne, John Clopton, Isaac Coles, William Findley, Jesse Franklin, Nathaniel Freeman, jr., Albert Gallatin, James Gillespie, Nicholas Gilman, Christopher Greenup, William B. Grove, Wade Hampton, Carter B. Harrison, John Hathorn, James Holland, Andrew Jackson, George Jackson, Matthew Locke, Samuel Maclay, Nath'l Macon, Andrew Moore, Anthony New, John Nicholas, John Richards, Robert Rutherford, John S. Sherburne, Thompson J. Skinner, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, Richard Sprigg, jr., John Swanwick, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Joseph B. Varnum, Abraham Venable, John Williams, and Richard Winn.

Mr. S. SMITH said several members who had wished to reduce the number of troops had said they should have no objection to make an allowance to officers, when they were discharged, to pay their expenses home. He would propose a new section, therefore, to this effect, viz:

"That every commissioned officer who may have been deranged under the act for ascertaining and fixing the Military Establishment of the United States, or under the present act, shall be allowed — dollars."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide for the assessment and collection of direct taxes; also a bill for laying a direct tax upon the United States. They were twice read, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole on Monday.

REVENUE STATEMENT.

Mr. PARKER moved that the House should go into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, respecting an augmentation of compensations; but he gave way (after giving notice that he should call up the subject to-morrow morning) to the taking up of Mr. HARPER's resolution, laid upon the table some days ago, proposing to rescind that part of a former resolution, which had passed the House, calling for certain annual statements from the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting the duties laid on each separate article, which related to a list of revenue officers, with the allowance paid to each. He alleged that the furnishing of these lists would prove troublesome to the office, and could be of no real use, as the sum total would be furnished, and as they might at any time get the particulars by an application to the office.

Mr. GALLATIN differed in opinion, and thought it very necessary to have these statements; and he said there could be no difficulty in furnishing the individual sums paid to each officer, since they must be known to make up the total.

The motion was put, and negatived—40 to 27.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

Mr. SWANWICK, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petition of sundry manufacturers of chocolate, who complain of the heavy duty upon cocoa, as being an injury to the business, and recommended a resolution to the following effect:

“Resolved, That the additional duty of two cents per pound imposed on cocoa, by an act of the 7th of June, 1794, ought to be repealed after the — day of — next.”

The report was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the resolutions on the subject of indirect taxation.

The bill in addition to the act for fixing and establishing the Military Establishment of the United States, was read the third time, the blanks filled up, and passed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the hour was come at which they had appointed to meet the Senate, for the purpose of counting the votes for, and declaring the election of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and that the Clerk would inform the Senate they were ready to receive them.

The Clerk accordingly waited upon the Senate, and the PRESIDENT and members of the Senate, soon after entered and took their seats, the PRESI-DENT on the right hand of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the members of the Senate on the same side of the Chamber; when the President of the Senate [Mr. ADAMS] thus addressed the two Houses:

*Gentlemen of the Senate and
of the House of Representatives:*

The purpose for which we are assembled is expressed in the following resolutions. [Mr. ADAMS here read the resolutions which had been adopted by the two Houses relative to the subject.] I have received packets containing the certificates of the votes of the Electors for a President and Vice President of the United States from all the sixteen States of the Union: I have also received duplicates of the returns by post from fifteen of the States. No duplicate from the State of Kentucky is yet come to hand.

It has been the practice heretofore, on similar occasions, to begin with the returns from the State at one end of the United States, and to proceed to the other; I shall therefore do the same at this time.

Mr. ADAMS then took up the packet from the State of Tennessee, and after having read the superscription, broke the seal, and read the certificate of the election of the Electors. He then gave it to the Clerk of the Senate, requesting him to read the report of the Electors, which he accordingly did. All the papers were then handed to the tellers, viz: Mr. SEDGWICK, on the part of the Senate, and MESSRS. SITGREAVES and PARKER on the part of the House of Representatives; and when they had noted the contents, the PRESIDENT of the Senate proceeded with the other States, in the following order:

All the returns having been gone through, Mr. SEDGWICK reported that, according to order, the tellers appointed by the two Houses had performed the business assigned them, and reported the result to be as above stated.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate then thus addressed the two Houses:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives :*

By the report which has been made to me by the tellers appointed by the two Houses to examine the votes, there are 71 votes for John Adams, 68 for Thomas Jefferson, 59 for Thomas Pinckney, 30 for Aaron Burr, 15 for Samuel Adams, 11 for Oliver Ellsworth, 7 for George Clinton, 5 for John Jay, 3 for James Iredell, 2 for George Washington, 2 for John Henry, 2 for Samuel Johnston, and 1 for Charles C. Pinckney. The whole number of votes are 138; 70 votes, therefore, make a majority; so that the person who has 71 votes, which is the highest number, is elected President, and the person who has 68 votes, which is the next highest number, is elected Vice President.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate then sat down for a moment, and rising again, thus addressed the two Houses:

In obedience to the Constitution and Law of the United States, and to the commands of both Houses of Congress, expressed in their resolution passed in the present session, I declare that

JOHN ADAMS is elected President of the United States, for four years, to commence with the fourth day of March next; and that

THOMAS JEFFERSON is elected Vice President of the United States, for four years, to commence with the fourth day of March next. And may the Sovereign of the Universe, the ordainer of civil government on earth, for the preservation of liberty, justice, and peace, among men, enable both to discharge the duties of these offices conformably to the Constitution of the United States, with conscientious diligence, punctuality, and perseverance.

The PRESIDENT and members of the Senate then retired, and the House came to order; when Mr. SITGREAVES made a report on the business, which was read and ordered to be entered on the Journals.

THURSDAY, February 9.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

Mr. SITGREAVES, from the joint committee appointed to confer with a committee of the Senate on the subject of the election of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, made a further report, viz: that they had agreed with the committee of the Senate to recommend to the House of Representatives the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to give, by letter, to the Vice President elect, a notification of his election."

This resolution was agreed to; but some time afterwards, Mr. PARKER (one of the committee) wished it to be rescinded, as he understood, though the committee from the Senate had concurred in this mode of notifying the VICE PRESIDENT of his election, the Senate would not agree to it, but wished to follow the mode adopted on a former occasion, viz: a message was sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate, directing that the persons elected should be notified in such a manner as they should direct. He wished, therefore, to prevent delay, the resolution might be rescinded and a different one agreed to. This motion occasioned a good deal of conversation. It was observed by the SPEAKER that the resolution was already before the Senate, (where it seemed it was not intended to be sent, as it was a distinct resolution of that House, a similar one to which was proposed for the adoption of the Senate by the joint committee.) It was at length, however, agreed to be rescinded. Immediately after which a message was received from the Senate, informing the House that they had disagreed to the resolution, and appointed a committee of conference. The House accordingly took up the message, and also agreed to appoint a committee of conference.

UNITED STATES TITLE TO LANDS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that he had, some time since, laid a resolution on the table for an inquiry into the title of the United States to lands west of Pennsylvania; that a minute investigation of the business had convinced him, that however the title might ultimately be found to stand, yet it was of a nature that would require more time than could properly be given to its determination during the session. In the mean time, he said, it had been suggested to him, that the interest of individuals might suffer while the business was before the House, and, therefore, under these circumstances, candor required that he should withdraw the resolution; which he accordingly did.

MILITIA BILL.

Mr. DEARBORN wished the House to go into a Committee of the Whole on the Militia bill.

Mr. PARKER was apprehensive that subject would require more time than they should have to give it this session. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would waive his motion, and suffer the bill from the Senate for augmenting the compensations of the members of the Legislature and certain officers of Government, for a limited time, to be taken up.

Mr. SWIFT spoke against taking up the Militia bill, and Mr. HARTLEY in favor of it; when the question was put for going into a Committee of the Whole on the Militia Bill, and negatived—42 to 26.

COMPENSATION TO PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. PARKER then renewed his motion, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting compensations, Mr. MÜHLENBERG in the Chair; when

Mr. PARKER moved to strike out the first clause. He thought it necessary to make some additional allowance to the PRESIDENT, but he would do it in a different way from that proposed. When the present PRESIDENT came into office, he said, he had a quantity of furniture presented him, which might now be nearly worn out, and be of little value. It might be proper, therefore, to purchase new furniture for the gentleman just elected. It would be also during the period of the present Presidency that Government would remove to the Federal City, which would be attended with a good deal of expense to the PRESIDENT. He should wish, therefore, that a provision should be made for defraying that expense, and also for the purchasing of new furniture, but he should be opposed to the making of any addition to the salary at present.

Mr. HARTLEY spoke in favor of retaining the clause.

Mr. R. SPRIGG said he should vote against the proposed advance of salary, and could not consent to any other mode of augmenting the present compensation allowed to the PRESIDENT. He could by no means agree to the plan proposed by the gentleman from Virginia; for, if they were to renew the furniture of the PRESIDENT every four or eight years, it would be found a pretty expensive business. That gentleman had also mentioned the removal of the Government, as taking place during the next Presidency; but, he said, the new election would happen about the time of removing the Government, and provision for paying that expense might be made at that time. He thought the salaries were already sufficiently high, and that it would be with difficulty that money was found to pay the present expenses of Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS was of opinion, on the score of economy, that it would be better to advance the compensation of the PRESIDENT in the way proposed by the present bill, and let him purchase his own furniture, than to purchase new furniture, which, perhaps, when the Government was removed, would not be suitable for his house in the Federal City. Mr. W. said he was one of the committee on the subject of compensation, and they endeavored to ascertain whether the twenty-five thousand dollars allowed to the PRESIDENT were an adequate compensation. It was generally believed it was not. They ought, he said, to enable their First Magistrate to live in a style becoming his situation. All their Executive officers should receive such salaries as would enable them to see company agreeably to their rank, otherwise the respectability attached to those offices would suffer greatly in the public opinion. He hoped, therefore, the section would not be struck out.

Mr. BUCK said, as the motion now made was to try the principle, it would be well to go into an examination of the subject. He said he had never been a champion for raising salaries, or a stickler for lowering them; but, as the subject was brought before them, he should cheerfully declare his sentiments upon it. He conceived the true question to be, whether it was right and just that they should augment the salaries of the officers of Government and the members of the Legislature, or whether the present compensations were just and adequate to the sacrifices which they made in undertaking the business of Government. Because he did not believe, with some other gentlemen, that they were to estimate the compensations of their officers in proportion as money was scarce or plentiful in the Treasury, nor did he believe there was a real distress in Government for want of money; but their difficulties arose from a difference of opinion in that House on the mode of raising money. He believed there were persons who thought Government squandered away the public money; that its officers divided the loaves and fishes amongst them; and that the only way in which this profusion of expense could be checked was by pursuing a system of direct taxation, which would make the people feel the amount which they contributed to the support of Government. He should not undertake to examine this principle, nor deny that such facts might exist. It would be enough to look at existing circumstances in our country, and see how far they would apply. Our Government, he said, rested on public sentiment for support, and must always be regulated by it. He was willing, he said, to go all lengths with gentlemen in adopting a system of taxation calculated to raise a permanent revenue. Nor was he apprehensive for the result, when dictated by reason and justice.

Contemptible must be that state of government, said Mr. B., where its public officers are starved for want of a proper spirit in the people to support them. Is America, said he, arrived at this melancholy state? If she were, God forbid she should ever experience another revolution! Is this all our boasted acquisition, in return for the struggles we have made for our country? No; he denied the fact. America was not reduced to that state which will not allow her to pay the expenses of her Government, nor is she unwilling to pay them; neither is public sentiment so debased as not to approve of any measure which shall be taken to secure a handsome maintenance for our officers. There was no occasion for hypocrisy in the business; he was willing to state the whole truth plainly to his constituents. He should not think of telling them they were giving too high salaries for their officers, when he knew, that, owing to their insufficiency, they were diminishing their own private fortunes. Nor did he wish to intrench on his own property in serving the public; he believed there was no occasion for this. He should, therefore, speak plainly to them.

Mr. B. said, he would inquire whether the present salaries were a reasonable and just compensation for the services performed? In respect to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, it was said that he had already a large salary. He knew that twenty-five thousand dollars had a great sound in the ears of many, but he trusted the people of the United States not only possessed just views of Government, but that they also possessed virtue to support the just measures of Government, and would not consent that their Executive officers should be placed on such a footing as to be looked down by officers from foreign countries who moved in a lower sphere. Therefore, when they looked into the reason of the thing, and found their present salaries were unequal to their support, not in the style of splendor observed in foreign courts, but according to the manner of living in Philadelphia, would they not be willing to increase them? He believed they would.

The present PRESIDENT, he said, was a man of fortune, and never took from the Government more than would support his table, either during the war or during his Presidency. And what, he asked, did these expenses amount to? To the whole sum allowed him by law. But were they always to expect to have a PRESIDENT who would give his services to his country? Or had the PRESIDENT set a bad example, by living in a style of extravagance and splendor? He believed this was not the opinion of Americans, or that of foreign countries. If, then, the present PRESIDENT had lived upon his own fortune, and the whole of his compensation had gone to defray the expenses of his table, if this compensation was not advanced, how were future Presidents to come forward, to support the same style? They could not do it without infringing on their own fortunes. And do the citizens of the United States, he asked, wish their First Magistrate to be placed in this situation? He could not think so. He believed they meant to make ample provision for his support; and if the present provision was found inadequate they would condemn their Representatives; they would say they did not support the dignity of their country, if they neglected to advance it.

The same observations, Mr. B. said, would apply to the VICE PRESIDENT, and to other officers of Government. He did not wish the salaries of their officers to be such as should enable them to make fortunes out of them, but he would have them sufficient to afford a handsome living. Were they so at present? He believed not. It had been said, the other day, that they could not afford to live in the same style with persons who stood on the same footing with them before they went into office. He could not say whether they were obliged to intrench on their own private fortunes; if it was so, he asked if it were reasonable or just that they should be so placed? It certainly was not; and, therefore, convinced as he was that the people of the United States were willing and able to support the expenses of their Government, and that they wished their officers to have a just and reasonable compensation, which should not only enable them to make a respectable appearance in the eyes of their own citizens, but in those of foreigners, he should have no scruples in giving his consent to the advances proposed.

As to the compensation allowed to the members of that House, here he had knowledge; he could speak from experience. He could say that he had diminished his income one thousand dollars a year since he had a seat in that House. Did his constituents, he asked, wish this? He believed not. They did not wish him to intrench on his private fortune while he was serving them. They did not expect him to squander away their money in profusion, nor did he; he lived in the most economical style; but they wished his reasonable expenses to be paid. Besides, said Mr. B., were the rates of compensation, when first established, established upon this principle? He thought not. They were then thought to be a just and reasonable compensation; and, if it was not then unreasonable, it could not now be reasonable. Was it right, he asked, when every kind of labor was higher by one-third or one-half than at that time, that the compensations allowed to persons employed by Government should remain stationary? He could not conceive that this was either just or proper, or that the citizens of the United States wished it.

If any conclusion might be drawn from the practice of individual States, they would be warranted in making the proposed advance, since many of their Legislatures had advanced the pay of their members. Indeed, he believed the people were generally convinced of the necessity of advancing the compensations allowed to the officers of Government and members of the Legislature, under the present circumstances.

Mr. B. said he was not for making a permanent increase of salaries, except to the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT. He did not conceive that the members of the Legislature ought to have more than was sufficient to support them, without obliging them to infringe upon their own fortunes. He wished the advance thereof to operate no longer than until the present existing circumstances were removed; he should move, therefore, to have the duration of this regulation for one year, instead of two, as it was possible in the mean time the price of living might be so reduced as to make the additional allowance no longer necessary.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said, if gentlemen reasoned together for a moment, they would be convinced this measure was altogether improper and unjust. Our present PRESIDENT, said he, is looked up to with reverence, as to Cincinnatus, as a good republican. When the Commissioners from the Republic of Holland went to treat with Spain, they went in a style of such simplicity as to command the greatest respect. They afterwards appointed a Stadtholder, a man of great reputation and patriotism doubtless, like our PRESIDENT; but, as soon as they suffered themselves to lose sight of their simplicity and plainness of manners, and got into the policy and splendor of Courts, they were enslaved by their Stadtholder; for, within these few years, the office of Stadtholder has been declared hereditary. What an extravagance is this; that a man should be born a Stadtholder or a King! While the Roman people maintained their simplicity of manners, while Cincinnatus was amongst them, they were a happy people; but when they lost sight of their plainness of manners, they lost sight of their happiness. Let us look at our sister rising Republic, and observe how they are doing away all pomp and pageantry in their Government and country, and aiming at a simplicity of manners; but, said he, I fear we have not lost sight sufficiently of kings, priests, and courts. This was his dread. It was necessary to bound these ideas. Patriotism could not be purchased, and should they despair of getting a man to fill the office of PRESIDENT without they increased the salary? Must they hire a man for this purpose? No, they should not be obliged to do this; there would always be found men of abilities and patriotism to fill that office, without any view to pecuniary advantage.

Mr. DENT said the question was to make an amendment by striking out the first section. Being in favor of that part which contemplated the addition of five thousand dollars to the salary of the PRESIDENT, and opposed to any addition to that of the VICE PRESIDENT, he wished the question divided, in order to accommodate his vote.

The Chairman said the motion was to strike out the whole section, and it could not be divided.

The motion for striking out was then put and carried—56 members being in favor of it.

Mr. PARKER then moved to strike out the second section, which, if agreed to, would destroy the whole.

The motion was put and carried—ayes 53.

The committee then rose, and the House took up the business.

Mr. HARPER hoped the report would not be agreed to. He said he had voted to strike out the additional allowances to the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, because whatever necessity there might be to advance the salaries allowed to them, yet the 7,000 dollars proposed would be more properly divided among numerous officers who require bounty. He thought the same as to compensations to members of the House and Senate. Many of your officers have but just means to exist. If anything could be spared he hoped it would be applied where it was most wanted. He hoped and trusted the House, before they increased the salaries of that description of people (Executive officers, &c.) would first be well satisfied they wanted it. He thought upon examination it would be found some of those officers did need an advance. He mentioned the Comptroller of the Treasury, and some others who were inadequately paid. He would wish it to be divided so that a just distinction might be made, as some part he should support and some reject. If the question could not be divided, he should vote against the whole rather than agree to the addition proposed. Mr. H. thought it very necessary that some parts of the bill should pass. He could give his reasons, but he did not wish to recapitulate all the arguments that could be adduced to show the propriety of his ideas, that men of talents be employed in offices of trust, some of which were not sufficiently paid to invite such characters. He hoped, before the decision, gentlemen would look over the list of officers included, and think whether, from recurring to their present allowance, there was not some danger of losing them without additional compensation. If, on going over them one by one, there should be but one valuable officer in this situation, he hoped that one would be attended to. He should have mentioned some of these ideas before, but for the rapidity with which the vote passed the Chair. He hoped they should disagree to the report of the Committee of the Whole, so as to go over the whole of the items.

Mr. PAGE said, from a view of our revenue and expenses, this was not the time to increase salaries. He thought, in proportion to the hardness of the times, every officer in the Government should conduct his mode of living; every person feels in proportion. If the salaries of the officers of Government were to be increased because living was more expensive, it was proportionable as to those people who would have to pay the proposed addition. He would rather lose a good officer than agree to this bill in any form. He thought it would have a very mischievous tendency. The household expenses of those officers had better be retrenched than that additional taxes should be laid to increase their salaries.

The question was agreed, by one-fifth of the members, to be taken by yeas and nays, "That

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that the VICE PRESIDENT had laid before them the following communication:
Gentlemen of the Senate:

In consequence of the declaration made yesterday in the Chamber of the House of Representatives of the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, the record of which has just now been read from your Journal by your Secretary, I have judged it proper to give notice that, on the 4th of March next, at 12 o'clock, I propose to attend again in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, in order to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States to be taken by the President, to be administered by the Chief Justice or such other Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States as can most conveniently attend; and, in case none of those Judges can attend, by the Judge of the District of Pennsylvania, before such Senators and Representatives of the United States as may find it convenient to honor the transaction with their presence.

The Clerk of the Senate also communicated the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to consider whether any, and if any, shall measures shall be adopted for the further accommodation of the President after the 4th of March next;

and that Mr. Sedgwick, Mr. Tazewell, and Mr. Reed, be a joint committee on the part of the Senate."

Mr. GALLATIN, from the committee to whom was recommended, for the 5th ult., the report of the Attorney General on the memorial of John C. Symmes, made a report, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. HARPER moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the method of taking evidence to be adduced in the trial of contested elections for this House shall, hereafter, be as follows:

First.—The party intending to contest an election, shall give notice of such intention to the person returned. If it be an election in the usual course, this notice shall be given at least ——— weeks before the time when the said person is to take his seat; if not in the usual course, but to fill a vacancy, then the notice shall be given within ——— days after the persons appointed to hold the election shall have made known publicly the state of the poll. The notice shall be delivered in writing, at the usual residence of the person returned; and if he be absent, shall be left there open.

Secondly.—Either party intending to take examinations shall then apply to some Justice, or Judge of the Courts of the United States, or some Chancellor, Justice, or Judge of a Supreme, Superior, or County Court, or Court of Common Pleas of any State, or some mayor or chief magistrate of a town or city, and shall obtain a notification, under his hand and seal, directed to the opposite party, and requiring him to attend, by himself, or his attorney, duly authorized, and cross-examine the witnesses. This notification shall state the time and place of examination, and the names of the witnesses; and it shall be served on the opposite party, or his attorney, duly authorized, as either may be nearest to such place, provided either is within one hundred miles of it. For attendance, after serving the notification, one day, exclusive of Sundays, shall be allowed for every twenty miles.

Thirdly.—In all cases where either party shall give notice to the other of his having appointed an attorney for the purposes aforesaid, it shall be necessary to serve the above mentioned notification on the attorney.

Fourthly.—Every person deposing shall make oath or affirmation to testify the whole truth, and shall subscribe the testimony by him or her given, which shall be reduced to writing only by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by the deponent in his presence. The deposition so taken, together with a certificate of the notices, and proof of the service of them, shall be sealed up by the magistrate who took it, and transmitted to the Speaker of this House.

Resolved, That the examinations of witnesses, taken in this manner, and no other, shall hereafter be admitted on the trials of contested elections.

Resolved, That copies of any papers recorded in any office of record, provided those copies be attested under the hand and seal of the recording officer, shall be admitted at all such trials in the same manner as the originals would be, if produced. In like manner copies of any other papers of a public nature, and remaining in the possession of a public officer, shall be admitted when attested under the hand and seal of that officer.

Resolved, That ——— copies of those resolutions shall be forwarded, forthwith, to the Executive of every State, with a request that they will cause the managers of every election, in their respective States, to be furnished with at least one copy."

Mr. HEATH moved that the consideration of these resolutions should be postponed till the 3d of March next, as they would take up too much time. It would be better for the next Congress to discuss them.

Mr. HARPER said that it would be of no use to meddle with them unless it were done immediately. They were designed to operate previous to the next session. Any mode of taking evidence was better than to have none at all. In the present state of matters, people came here from Maine or Virginia to ask the House what were the rules of taking evidence. A late instance occurred from Georgia. The people waited here for a considerable time, and then went back with instructions how to proceed.

Mr. SITGREAVES argued that this remedy would not answer the defect. The resolutions, if passed, would not bind the next Congress. This could only be done by a law passing through both Houses. Hence it was needless to vote for them, as our successors may disagree to them.

Mr. MURRAY differed from Mr. SITGREAVES. If rules are not made now, they will be too late. In a case so distant as Georgia, a year would at any rate be spent before there could be a decision.

Mr. SITGREAVES said that a position had been assumed that the rules made in this House would regulate the next. This he denied. They were not binding on the succeeding House, unless they saw fit. He said that contested elections were a growing evil. There was very little encouragement for people coming from the country to contest them.

On a division, whether the resolution should be deferred till the 3d of March, there were, ayes 34, noes 40.

The resolutions were then referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

STATEMENT OF EXPORTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 9, 1797.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States during one year prior to the 30th of September, 1796.

Of the whole value of said exports, (being $67,064,097,) it is estimated that about $26,300,000 has arisen from the exportation of foreign goods and merchandise.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Register's Office, February 7, 1797.

Mr. GALLATIN reported a bill for allowing a drawback on domestic distilled spirits exported in vessels of less burden than thirty tons by the Mississippi. The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday.

The House took up the consideration of the disagreement of the Senate on the mode of notifying the VICE PRESIDENT of his election; and Messrs. SITGREAVES, PARKER, and J. SMITH, were appointed a Committee of Conference.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1797.

Mr. W. SMITH called for the order of the day on the bill granting appropriations for the year 1797; and the House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on that subject, which was proceeded with until they came to the item for foreign intercourse, without any amendment, except allowing the Purveyor a clerk, which had before been struck out.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that he was a careful man. He had saved to the public, within the last year, twenty thousand dollars, by going about to vendues and buying articles cheaper than they otherwise could be had. Mr. S. learned this from the Secretary of the Treasury. He had not himself seen the person. If deprived of a clerk, he might not think it worth while to take so much trouble, and the public would be losers.

On a division, the clerk was kept in—ayes 30, noes 28.

Mr. GALLATIN moved that the Committee might rise, as the subject would create considerable discussion, and it was then too late an hour to enter upon it. The Committee accordingly rose, and had leave to sit again.

EXPENSES OF FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

Mr. GALLATIN moved a resolution to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a detailed Statement of the expenditure of any sums which have been appropriated for defraying the expenses attending our intercourse with foreign nations, excepting such statements as have been laid before the House in any confidential communication by the President of the United States."

The resolution was agreed to.

FRIDAY February 10.

Mr. SITGREAVES, from the joint committee appointed on the subject of the election of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, reported a resolution to the House, in conformity to that passed eight years ago, on a similar occasion, viz: requesting the Senate to notify the VICE PRESIDENT of his election in such a way as they shall think proper, which was agreed to.

Mr. W. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for repealing, in part, the act laying a duty on spirits distilled in the United States, passed in May, 1792, and for imposing a duty on the capacity of stills of certain descriptions; which was read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

NAVAL EQUIPMENTS.

Mr. PARKER wished the unfinished business relative to appropriations to be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the report on the Naval Establishment; as it was necessary to determine, before the appropriations were gone through, whether the House would complete the frigates, or take the means recommended with respect to the establishment of a navy-yard, and for the security of a future supply of timber. The following is the report of the committee:

The committee appointed to inquire into the state of the Naval Equipments, ordered by former acts of Congress, and whether any, and what other Naval force is necessary for the protection of the commerce of the United States and the support of their flag, report:

That in consequence of the act of the 20th of April, 1796, the President of the United States directed that the frigates building at Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore, should be completed; that the building of the frigates at New York, Portsmouth, in Virginia, and Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, of course were discontinued. Upon inquiry, the committee find that the frigate building at Philadelphia, of 44 guns, and called the United States, is in such forwardness that she may possibly be launched in April, and that in two months after she may be made ready for sea; that it will require to finish this frigate, so as to receive her crew and stores, $55,950.

The frigate building at Boston, called the Constitution, of 44 guns, is not in such forwardness as the United States; and by the accounts from the proper office, it is not supposed she can be launched till July, and that it will be two months after before she can be put in a condition for sea. To complete her, exclusive of men and provisions, will require $96,671 71.

The frigate Constellation, building at Baltimore, of 36 guns, it is supposed by the officers of the Department, may be launched in May next, and that in two months after she may be so far finished as to be ready to receive her crew and stores. For this ship the sum of $47,375 is required.

The committee beg leave to observe that the foregoing report is made from statements in their possession from the Department of War; but the committee do not believe that either of the ships can be ready to launch by the time mentioned, on account of the severity of the weather; but, admit they should, a further sum of money will be necessary and must be speedily supplied, as it appears by the report of the Secretary of War that all the money hitherto appropriated has been expended, except $24,133 71. In order that the House may have the necessary information on this subject, the committee give the following statement:

Appropriated 9th of June, 1794, for the purpose of building six frigates -	$688,888 82
For the purpose of building galleys or other vessels, by the same act, and applied to this object -	80,000 00
Appropriated by act of June 1st, 1796, to pay Captains -	5,000 00
Total of appropriations -	773,888 82
Required to finish the United States -	55,950 00
Required to finish the Constitution -	96,571 71
Required to finish the Constellation -	47,375 00
	973,385 53

Out of which deduct so much

unexpended -	$24,133 71
Materials sold, per report -	4,214 05
	28,347 76
	945,437 77

Thus it appears, by official statements, to your committee, that to build the three frigates ordered by the act of Congress of April 20th, 1796, it will cost the United States, with the materials now on hand, the value of which they have no estimate, the sum of $945,437 77, exclusive of fitting, manning, and providing them with provisions and stores. That the House may have all the information as to the probable cost and yearly expenditure the committee have on this subject, they state it as given by the Secretary of War, which will accompany this report.

That each frigate of 44 guns will cost for wages, per month, $4,096. Estimate twelve months' pay—

For two frigates of 44 guns -	$98,304
For one frigate of 36 guns, $3,513 per month -	42,516
Twelve months' subsistence for three frigates, 400,770 rations, at 20 cents, is -	80,154

Annual expense of two frigates of 44 guns, and one of 36 guns -	220,974
In addition to this, for the salary of two persons to take care of the naval yards at Portsmouth and New York -	1,000

partment, to show the timber on hand in the different yards, as well as what has been sold, the value of which they have no estimate, except as to what has been sold, nor have they been furnished with an estimate of the naval stores which are on hand; but if the House should require those documents, they may be had at the proper officé.

The committee beg leave to report, as their opinion, that the sum contemplated by the War Department as necessary to man the ships will be insufficient, under existing circumstances, as the rate of seamen's wages are estimated much lower than has been given by merchants for their ships within the last two years, and but little more than the usual wages in the most tranquil times; but from all circumstances, especially from the forwardness of three of the ships, and most of the materials being ready, they think it would be proper to finish them as speedily as possible, as an aid to our commerce and a support to our flag: therefore,

"Resolved, That — dollars be appropriated to finish and equip for sea the frigates United States, Constitution, and Constellation."

Your committee further report, as their opinion, that a sum of money should be appropriated for the purpose of purchasing and fitting up a naval yard; and also, that it would be expedient for the United States to secure some of the lands in South Carolina and Georgia, well clothed with live oak and red cedar timber, for the purpose of building ships of war: therefore,

"Resolved, That — dollars ought to be appropriated for the purpose of buying and fitting up for the United States a proper site for a naval yard."

"Resolved, That — dollars ought to be appropriated for the purpose of purchasing live oak and red cedar timber, or lands stored with it, for naval purposes."

The first resolution having been read—

Mr. PARKER said, it would be seen that the report of the committee did not contemplate the manning of the frigates; and though it was their wish to have them manned and equipped for sea, yet, on account of the present embarrassed state of the finances, it was judged most proper only to ask $172,050 to finish them; that sum would put them in a state to be ready to man and equip when necessary, which would come better under a future appropriation, as it was probable Congress would again meet before this necessity occurred. He supposed no objection could be made to that; because, if it was proper to begin them, it was as proper to finish them, else the whole sum already expended would be to no purpose, upwards of $700,000 having been sunk in them; he had no doubt, therefore, that the House would order them to be finished, and not let them rot on the stocks, and remain monuments of the versatility and folly of the Government. As this subject had been frequently under discussion, it was not necessary to say anything upon the utility of these vessels; the Committee were already well acquainted with the business. He said, the sum wanted for this purpose would be $171,000.

Mr. CORT did not know but he might agree to complete the frigates in the way proposed by the Chairman of the Committee; but he did not think the resolution conformable to the wish expressed by that gentleman. He thought the frigate-building business an unfortunate one; but, having gone so far with them, he believed it would be best to have them finished. He should, however, be unwilling to go further. He would not equip and man them, but lay them up in port; but if the resolution remained in its present form, the PRESIDENT would doubtless go on to officer and man the vessels. He thought, therefore, they should repeal that part of the act which authorized the PRESIDENT to man the vessels. Some gentlemen might think it would be sufficient to withhold the appropriations for this purpose; but he did not wish to rely wholly upon this check. He would, therefore, move the following addition to the resolution as reported:

"And that all such parts of the act for providing a Naval Armament as relates to the appointing and commissioning officers and manning the said ships ought to be repealed."

Mr. W. SMITH doubted whether this motion was in order, it seemed to be a substitute for that under consideration, and unconnected with it. The question under consideration, he said, was a grant of money for finishing the building of the frigates; whether they were to be equipped and manned was another consideration altogether. It was contrary, he said, to the proceedings of that House to bring forward one question as a substitute for another. After a decision on the original resolution had been had, the gentleman might bring forward his proposition.

Mr. S. SMITH said the gentleman might try his question in a shorter manner, by moving to strike out the words "and equipped for sea."

Mr. CORT said, if his amendment was agreed to, the words just mentioned might be struck out. He did not think, with the gentleman from South Carolina, that his motion was a substitute for the original. It was merely a qualification of it. He was willing to vote for the finishing of the building of the frigates, but not for their manning and equipment. The gentleman from South Carolina wished the question first to be taken on the original; and then on this amendment; but that would not answer his purpose.

Mr. PARKER said, he had already observed that the frigates were not intended to be equipped for sea at present, and he had no objection to the words relative to the equipping for sea being struck out.

The Chairman gave it as his opinion that the motion was not in order; but if the words "and equipped for sea" were agreed to be struck out, it might then be introduced.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved to strike out those words.

Mr. GALLATIN said, the equipping and manning were two distinct things. In the act, provision was first made for the construction and equipment, and then followed the clause respecting manning. He considered the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut as applicable to the latter. Indeed, it was uncertain whether that part of the act was yet in force. The act declared, that when a peace took place between the United States and Algiers, that part of the act should cease. The act passed last session directed three frigates to be equipped, anything to the contrary notwithstanding. The amendment proposed went to settle the business.

Mr. SEWALL said he had no great objection to striking out the words in question; but as to the addition proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, it was an independent resolution altogether. The finishing of the frigates was a distinct thing from the manning and equipping; and if the gentleman's motion was to obtain, when the resolution came before the House it would be in the power of the House to divide it.

He said they ought not to vote for finishing the frigates, and at the same time repeal the act respecting the manning of them. There were existing laws authorizing the PRESIDENT to build, equip, and man them; and they must have the approbation of the other branches of the Legislature before they could do away any part of that law. If it was necessary to finish the frigates, he thought it was the express duty of the Legislature to provide the means of manning and equipping them. But he thought it was not fair to connect them together, so as to make the agreement to one a condition for an agreement to the other. No gentleman wishing to build the frigates could decline voting for the original resolution, when the words "and equipped for sea" are struck out. They might afterwards refuse to appropriate for the manning.

The motion for striking out was put and carried.

Mr. CORR then renewed his motion, with this addition, "except so far as appertains to any officers already appointed under the said act."

Mr. NICHOLAS wished the gentleman from Connecticut to inform the House what officers were appointed.

Mr. CORR said he had no accurate information; but he believed a few Captains only were appointed, who would be necessary to attend to the building of the frigates.

Mr. PARKER said, if his colleague would look into the report, he would see there were only three Captains appointed.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped this motion would not be agreed to. He thought it very improperly introduced here. It looked like a design to constrain the Senate to agree to this proposition, or give up the frigates. The gentleman's own opinion, viz: that it was improper to defeat a measure in an indirect way, was against him. They had passed an act that the PRESIDENT should build and equip these vessels; but this motion proposed to annex a condition to the grant, viz: that that part relative to manning should be repealed. He thought the question should be kept distinct. It was in the power of the House to withhold the appropriations for manning them; under such circumstances the Executive could not effect it; but this would be repealing a law of the land. We send the bill up to the Senate with a grant of a certain sum to finish the frigates, and in the same bill we say they shall not be manned. Mr. S. thought they would be of no use lying up in our dock yards. He was of opinion the vessels should not only be built but manned. He thought they would be of great service in protecting our coasts, in keeping off the piccaroons which at present infest them; and would also prove as an academy for instructing young officers in naval tactics. He should be sorry to pass a resolution to lay them up as hulks, after being at the expense of building them.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, the gentleman from South Carolina had made an extraordinary discovery, viz: that if the present motion passed, it would be a restriction on the Senate. If he understood the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CORR,] he declined voting for completing the vessels, except this provision was annexed to the resolution. This was his opinion; and it was extraordinary that the gentleman from South Carolina should think this improper, when he himself had done the same thing. Did he not vote for the striking out of the words "and equipped for sea?" And if they were obliged by law to appropriate for the manning, they were equally bound to provide for the equipping, and yet that gentleman had dispensed with the one, and blamed him for dispensing with the other. Indeed, if they had not full liberty to grant or to refuse an appropriation, he could see no reason for annual appropriations; they might as well be made perpetual. If they could not check the improper expending of money by appropriation, that boasted power was a mere deception; but he was convinced there could no doubt on the subject.

Though the resolution was passed together, two separate bills might be brought in, which might be sent up to the Senate separately.

The building of these frigates, he said, had been an unfortunate business. The law had been passed by surprise, at a time when members could scarcely think for themselves, and was carried by a small majority. He did not think a Naval Establishment could be of any service to this country. How could it operate? Unless it was such a force as to intimidate an enemy, it could have little effect. And could we man a Navy of this kind if we were possessed of it? He believed not. The time at which such a force could be of any use would be when other Powers were about going to war, and he believed at such a period it would be impossible to find men for the purpose of manning a Navy of any considerable size. There was no time, he said, since the commencement of the present European war, at which they could have manned a fleet. With respect to the Navy at present contemplated, he could see no real use it could be of; for, if they were in sight of an enemy's privateer examining one of our ships, they could not resent it for fear of a war. Indeed, going into a Navy at this time, was in effect going to war with one of the contending Powers; for one of the effects of such an establishment would be to give them such an high idea of their own strength as would be certain to lead to war sooner or later. And the misfortunes of one war, he said, would infinitely exceed all the advantages which could be derived from a Navy.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he did not know whether it would not be the best policy to stop where they were with the frigates; but, with the provision proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, he would agree to finish the building of them, because he did not know but the vessels when finished, might be disposed of, so as to bring back a part of the money which had been expended.

Mr. S. SMITH said, the gentleman last up was mistaken when he said the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. W. SMITH] when he voted for striking out the words "and equipped for sea," had done the same as he had blamed the gentleman from Connecticut with doing. He thought the words an unnecessary tautology: what he meant by "equipped for sea," was having the sails bent, water on board, &c.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, it would save time to set the gentleman right. He meant to say that the equipment was provided for by law equally with the manning.

Mr. S. SMITH said it only amounted to this, that gentleman explained the same thing differently from him. He had said this law was passed by surprise. It was no such thing; it underwent a very full discussion. That gentleman had asked, of what use a Navy would be to them? If they had had a Navy during the present war, he would have told the European nations, we will throw our weight into the opposite scale, if you continue to insult and injure us. But that gentleman was afraid of this; he had no fear, he only wished they had the power.

One nation, he said, had committed spoiliations on our property to the amount of three millions, and another had done the same from five to six millions. This would have supported a Navy, which would have kept us from a situation in which we are subject to indignities and insults from every Power who chooses to commit them against us.

The same gentleman had always said, that at no period since the passing of this law could they have manned these frigates. He was of a different opinion. The present high wages arose in part from so many of our seamen having been taken from us by the British, on board whose ships as many have been pressed as would nearly have manned the frigates. That gentleman talked of finishing the vessels and selling them, to defray a part of the expense incurred in building them; but he could assure him they would not all three sell for so much as one of them cost in building, as they were too large for even the East India trade. The only question was, whether they could be got ready in time to send them to sea during the present year? If the select committee convinced him they could, he should vote for money to man and equip them; but if not, there was no necessity for doing so.

Mr. PARKER wished the report to be read. He had no doubt but the three frigates would be finished by October. If they had been completed at the time originally proposed, they might have been very well manned, as he believed we had more men in the British Navy than would man six ships. If these vessels were ready, they might be used so as greatly to annoy the vessels of those nations who might think proper to injure us, going to and from the West Indies, as they were obliged to come within seven days' sail of our coast, and the season of the year at which they made their voyages being well known, there would be no difficulty in falling in with them. We might be to them in these parts what the Algerines were to us in the Mediterranean. These ships, though few in number, would have a very considerable effect in protecting our commerce; but at present, said Mr. P., we are the sport of all nations, because they can insult and plunder us with impunity. If, indeed, we were to adopt the Chinese policy, and give up commerce altogether, there would be no necessity for ships of war; but if we were to have commerce, it must be protected. We are in a better situation now, in a commercial view, than Spain or England were a century ago, as neither of these kingdoms had at that time seven hundred thousand tons of shipping; and this quantity of shipping, he said, was employed in carrying out our own produce. If our commerce were not protected our merchants would be ruined, and we must depend altogether upon foreigners to carry away our produce. There was only this alternative, either wholly to give up commerce, or else determine to protect it. He thought it would be disgraceful to abandon the finishing and equipping of the vessels, and nothing would have led him to have given up the equipping but our present embarrassed finances. Indeed, if they were to act thus, their constituents would consider them as no better than fickle boys, having first agreed to build the ships and then to talk of burning them.

This country, Mr. P. said, was able to build and man six ships and six frigates. It was farcical to suppose the contrary; but they had acted as if they were afraid of calling out their resources; they gaped at gnats, and, on some occasions, swallowed camels. Mr. P. said, he was not afraid of calling upon the people for direct taxes; they were able and willing to pay much heavier taxes than were contemplated to be raised for the purpose of national defence, or for paying our National Debt.

Mr. SEWALL said, he had a strong objection to the proposition, as it would embarrass members in their votes on this occasion; but, when considered in another point of view, it was very exceptionable, unless gentlemen had adopted the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS,] that the House had a right to refuse an appropriation for a purpose established by law. This doctrine, he believed, would not be agreed to by the mover of this question.

The effect of the amendment would be to apply to the Senate to repeal an act; which, if they did not think proper to do, this House would prevent any appropriation to carry it into effect. The Senate might agree to, or differ from, the proposition; but it would not appear well to attempt to force them.

Much had been said on the uselessness of a Navy, which he should desist from repeating;

H. OF R.]

he wished the resolution so to stand as that every gentleman might have an opportunity to avow his sentiments on the subject without any obstruction; he therefore hoped the gentleman would vary it accordingly. Mr. S. said he thought it absolutely necessary the frigates should be manned: if they were to be finished it was proper they should be used in some form or other.

The gentleman had agreed that the captains were to be retained in pay; but what use were they if there were to be no men when the ships are finished? At least, it was necessary that some men should be employed, if only to take care of the vessels. He hoped the motion would be withdrawn, that fair opportunity may be left to vote, and the Senate not be subjected to that disagreeable situation which must necessarily attend this way of doing business.

Mr. COIT had no doubt in his own mind that when there existed a law, it was, in general, the duty of the different branches of Government to carry it into effect; but he was not prepared to say there could be no instance in which he might withhold appropriations. He believed there might be such instances, and he deemed the present one of those cases; because he thought the evils which would attend the manning these vessels so great as to require him so to act. He did not say he would not vote for completing the vessels if his motion did not pass, though he felt inclined to do so; but he trusted his difficulties would be removed by this amendment being agreed to. Gentlemen had said, that many advantages would arise from this fleet. This was uncertain. It was his opinion they should not want officers at least for the ships, but he much doubted whether men could be got. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] was more likely to be acquainted with the subject than he was, being a mercantile man, and his opinion would of course have more weight with that committee, but it was his own opinion they could not be manned; for, besides the present high price of labor, men were not so ready to go on board ships of war as merchantmen. He, therefore, supposed the frigates would be fully officered, would just have sufficient men to wait upon the officers, and that they would never leave our ports. But if manned and ready for sea, though he believed his views were as patriotic, and his wishes as earnest for the welfare of his country as those of any other member, he could see no real service on which they could be employed. If he could see all the advantages which some gentlemen had dwelt upon, as likely to arise from their going to sea, he should wish it as much as they; but he did not; he saw the expense was certain, and the advantages doubtful. He therefore hoped his amendment would pass.

Mr. DEARBORN could see no reason why the present motion ought not to pass. In other instances they had thought it right to curtail their appropriations to what was really necessary for the object. There had already been very liberal appropriations towards the building of these vessels. They were originally to have cost one hundred thousand dollars each, but three hundred thousand had been expended, and more was now called for.

Mr. D. said, he was so far from wishing to see large sums given for this purpose, that he could wish the appropriations to be confined to completing the hulls of the vessels only. He believed it would have been a happy thing if they had never been begun. What the expense of the rigging and sails of the frigates might be, he did not know; if a considerable part of the expense had already been incurred, he should not object to completing them, otherwise he thought, if they judged in respect to the future by the past, and that the vessels which should have been built in four months were now going on for four years, the hulls would be as much as would be completed before the meeting of the next session of Congress; he therefore wished to furnish only as much money as would effect that purpose. These vessels, he said, would cost double the price that vessels of the same kind would have cost in England, and he believed there must have been great want of attention to economy in the business. It was not possible that men well acquainted with ship-building should have been so far mistaken in their calculations. He thought, therefore, they should begin to confine their appropriations and grant money only as it was wanted. As to manning, equipping, &c., it would be time enough to provide for these a year or two hence; for he believed if the vessels were now ready, it would be found very difficult to man them; and if manned, he did not see any use they would be of, except to join in war with some foreign Power.

The question was then put upon the amendment, and carried—there being 58 in favor of it.

The question was about to be taken upon the resolution as amended; when

Mr. DEARBORN said, before the question was put, he wished to amend the resolution by inserting the words "to finish the hulls," instead of "to finish the vessels."

Mr. PARKER said, if this amendment was agreed to, it would be necessary to say what was to become of the masts, spars, sails, canvass, rigging, &c. By this proposition, it would appear as if the gentleman did not mean to finish the vessels at all. If this was his intention, the question had better be tried in that way.

Mr. DEARBORN said his object was not to prevent the ultimate finishing of the vessels; he only meant to confine the appropriation to what was likely to be wanted this year. He did not contemplate any loss therefore by sails, masts, &c.

Mr. COIT hoped the motion would not prevail. He believed the contracts were made for most of the articles necessary for the completing of the vessels.

Mr. GALLATIN said, that it appeared to him that the law passed last year had provided against the inconvenience mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARKER.] The law provides that the materials shall be safely kept for the use of the United States; therefore, such materials as would not be wanted for the use of the hulls would be safely kept under the provision of the law. No objection could be had to the motion on that ground.

Mr. PARKER said the materials for completing the vessels were mostly on hand, and only 171,000 dollars were wanted to complete them. It was true that these vessels would cost more than any other he had heard of. The common price in the British Navy, he believed, was £1,000 sterling a gun. These ships cost more on account of the very high price of labor; but they were also larger than ships carrying the same number of guns in other countries; another deck would have made them as large as seventy-fours, and if they had been built as seventy-fours, they would not have cost more than £74,000 sterling, but they had been built in their present form because they were best suited for service. When finished, he believed these vessels would be an ornament to the country. He had seen ships of almost every nation, but he had never seen vessels equal to these.

Mr. SITGREAVES said, if he understood the question, the argument of his colleague was sufficient to prove that the amendment ought to be adopted. The question was not what was to become of the materials when procured, but whether they were to be procured. It appeared that contracts were made for every part, so as to complete the ships, but this motion went only to have the hulls finished. If the House wished the Department to fulfil their contracts, they should appropriate for that purpose, else it would leave the Executive in an awkward situation. After every thing necessary to fulfil that contract to the completion of the ships had been purchased, it could be stored, or placed on board ship. He hoped the question would be decided, whether an appropriation should be made for finishing them according to former acts.

Mr. DEARBORN did not know whether he understood the extent of the report of the committee. He would by no means wish to embarrass the Executive, or prevent his fulfilling every contract. He understood that, after every contract which had been made, there would be 24,000 dollars remaining on hand; he supposed every contract was included in the report as money expended. His design was only to confine the appropriation merely to the sum absolutely necessary for the present year. If he understood it wrong, and the committee would inform him, he had no objection to withdraw his motion. As to the putting up the masts, rigging, &c., he had not heard mentioned whether it was contracted for or not. He supposed, however, that it would not be done in the course of the present year. As he observed before, he would not object to the appropriation, if existing contracts absolutely required it.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that the expression in the resolution was "that ——— dollars should be appropriated for finishing the vessels." The gentleman from Massachusetts was afraid of unnecessary expense, and proposed to insert "hulls," instead of vessels. He believed this alteration would operate a very considerable injury to the United States; for, by the time the hulls were finished, all over head would be ready. If these ships were got ready for service, they might be used or not. When he left Baltimore, the coopers were at work on the water casks; but, if this motion passed, they could not be completed, and the same with respect to cables, and other materials which were in hand. Instead of this kind of proceeding being economy, it was downright waste. If they were his vessels, and he were building them for purposes of commerce (dead as all trade was at present) he would finish them, to be ready against a more favorable change. Indeed, if these vessels were not soon finished, more money would soon be wanted for Algiers.

He acknowledged that these ships had cost much more than was expected. But if any one had made a calculation four years ago of the expense of building a house, he would find that it would now cost double. He believed that they had cost too much, but he believed this was no rule why they ought not to be finished. Until they were finished, he believed we should never have any certain peace with Algiers. They would make new demands, and if they were not answered, would again seize our vessels, and carry our citizens into bondage. No treaty would bind them while we were without armed ships.

The question was put for striking out "vessels," and inserting "hulls," and negatived, 51 to 22.

The next resolution which came under consideration, was that proposing the purchase of a site for a navy yard.

Mr. PARKER doubted, from the spirit which seemed to be shown on this occasion, that this resolution would not pass.

Mr. W. SMITH hoped this would be agreed to. Whatever gentlemen may now think or determine on, it was probable we should at some time become a naval Power; and even with the most distant prospect of that, it would show economy to prepare for it. He said it never could be too soon to begin the business, and the most effectual method of procuring live oak, and preserving it, was to take the earliest means to obtain, and secure it, when obtained, for seasonable use. He read an extract from the Secretary of War's report in support of the plan.

Mr. CORT said he was alarmed at the expense of this business. He saw in the report the salaries of two persons already at Norfolk and Portsmouth, for taking care of the timber, at 500 dollars each, 1,000 dollars. If they were to pay at this rate for overlooking the timber for one ship, what might they expect would be the expense of a navy yard?

Mr. PARKER said, the persons to whom these salaries were paid, took care of the timber at Norfolk and Portsmouth. It was necessary that some person should look after it, or it should be disposed of; but, in case the present resolution was agreed to, there would be no occasion in future to pay these persons, as all the timber and other materials would be stored in the navy yard. He said he had received an estimate from the War Office of the expense which would be likely to attend the establishment of a navy yard. The expense of 100 acres of land, and all the necessary buildings, was estimated at 37,210 dollars.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, after having squandered so much money in getting timber for these vessels, he thought some change of habit should take place before they embarked largely in this matter. They had given twice or thrice as much as the timber was worth, yet they were now called upon to go on in the same course. It was not a time for going into this business. If such a thing was even proper, two or three years could make but little difference, and there could be little doubt but everything could then be bought at half price. This, however, was not his principal objection. It was this: he did not want to see any such establishment; a Navy would never do any real good to this country, but would increase the unhappiness of it. It would require large sums of money to support it; its benefits were doubtful, and it might be of very mischievous consequence to the nation.

Mr. SWANWICK said he entirely agreed with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] that there was a necessity for some change of habit; they appeared to be getting that change at present, and whatever their habits were at present, he supposed they would come right at last. Whatever might be their opinion of the necessity of a naval force, the European nations, he believed, would convince them of the necessity of it, if they only gave them time enough.

It was an extraordinary thing to look at the progress of economy in that House with respect to these frigates. In the first place, six frigates were necessary; they were afterwards reduced to three, and because an officer was appointed to take care of the timber left on hand, a gentleman from Connecticut wondered that $500 should be so employed. A motion had been made to confine the Executive to finish the hulls of the ships only. This would have been a strange economy. Indeed, such attempts were made at economy on this business as were never introduced upon any other. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] had observed, there was no use for ships at all. If the House were of that opinion, such a resolution had better at once be come to; but the strange sort of hesitating conduct which was adopted, exceeded all that he had heard of in legislation.

Had gentlemen who declared these vessels to be of no use, contemplated the situation of this country; that it depended wholly upon commerce for revenue; that that commerce was now put in jeopardy, and that no substitute had been found for the revenue thence arising? And would not all this hesitation, whenever the subject of a Navy came under consideration, tempt European nations to continue their unjust depredations upon our property at sea? It certainly would.

But even gentlemen who wished to confine themselves merely to the finishing of the vessels at present, would not surely think it improper for them to establish a navy yard, and to secure timber for future use. Did those gentlemen consider what it was to deprive the country of a rich mine of ship timber? If they hesitated on this subject, they surely did not.

Mr. S. said, when gentlemen voted for an additional regiment to defend our frontiers, when it was acknowledged by those who lived upon them that they were unnecessary, they did not show such caution. He thought gentlemen should preserve a consistency in their votes; but whilst they were very liberal on some subjects, they were wonderfully economical upon others. And on what object, could they bestow expense, that would make them so good a return as commerce? Upon none; for, after every deduction of expense which may be gone into for its protection, a large surplus will remain.

What had been said by the gentleman from Maryland on the subject of Algiers, was very just; and the want of a navy power would have a similar effect upon all our negotiations, as foreign nations would rise or fall in their demands, according to our power at sea. The money thrown away upon Algiers to purchase peace, would have been much better employed in building ships; for if we had a few ships, that Power would not have committed the depredations upon us which she had done. And whether the money was paid to Algiers or expended in building ships, it was in both cases for the same purpose, viz: the protection of commerce. But there was this great difference between the two expenditures. In the one case, the dollars were shipped off to a foreign country, and in the other, they were paid to our own citizens. The iron used was from our own mines; the guns from our own manufactories; the hemp, and every other material, were of our own growth and manufacture, so that the money went into the hands of our artisans, manufacturers, and farmers. And, therefore, though the frigates had cost a great deal of money, it was some modification of the expense to consider that the money was gone into the pockets of our own citizens. But, he asked if the loss we sustained for the want of a naval power could be estimated? He said it could not. We not only lost our property, but our seamen, and they were not only lost to us, but were probably in the service of those countries which were committing depredations upon us. The loss of property might be recovered; but a hardy race of seamen once lost, could not be recovered.

What an affecting spectacle had we the other day of sixty of these unfortunate men returning from Algerine slavery! They were received into the arms of their country with all the sympathy which the occasion called for; but could gentlemen help feeling, at the same time, for the impotence of our Government, when they recollected that the liberty of these men had been purchased at a very high price from a petty despot? And shall we continue to go on thus, and encourage the Barbary Powers to enslave our seamen by showing so great a reluctance to enter upon any measure which might afford a defence against their depredations?

He wished gentlemen to pause a little before they determined to reject the present proposition; except, indeed, they were determined to turn a deaf ear to the distresses of commerce, by saying we will shut ourselves up in our cells, and if our citizens will go to sea, let them abide the risk: we will have nothing to do with ships of war; we will lay a direct tax, from which we will be able to raise a revenue independent of commerce, and live in peace. If this were their determination, experience would show whether it was wise or otherwise.

Mr. MURRAY believed it would be a very prudent measure to secure the ship-timber in question; for if we did not, it was probable some foreign nation would get possession of it. He did not know whether the laws of Georgia would permit foreigners to purchase the land upon which this timber grew; but if they would not, it would be no difficult thing to get possession of it through the medium of an individual. If this country were to become a maritime Power, and no one who considered the subject for a moment could doubt it, this was too rich a mine to be neglected. What had been said about adopting the Chinese policy, might serve to amuse them; but when they looked at the commerce of the country, it was impossible they should not see the necessity of a naval force to protect that commerce against the depredations of any nation who chose to attack it. Indeed, it was come to this, they must either provide for the protection of commerce, or deny the utility of it, and give it up altogether.

But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] was afraid if these frigates were sent out to sea, they would involve us in a war. What! said he, can it be supposed that three frigates would give us that ridiculous kind of spirit which would induce us at any rate to go to war? This would be a species of insanity which he did not think it was probable we should fall into. No: these vessels would serve to protect our coasts, and preserve our commerce from attacks, at least, within a small distance from our own ports. How far they might serve to render us of some importance in the eyes of foreign nations, he could not tell; but he believed that three frigates would have a greater effect in this respect with us, than ten to Sweden, Denmark, or Holland. We lie, said he, near the high road of commerce to the West Indies, and these three frigates, backed by national wealth, would show a disposition to become a maritime Power, and would have their effect upon European nations.

Besides Mr. M. said, these vessels would be the foundation of a future Navy. He was for shaping our means of defence to the means of offence employed against us by other nations; for until the European nations became wise enough to cease from war, it was necessary to provide means of defence, against their attacks. He should, therefore, always give his support to every means of national defence. He wished our nation to stand upon a respectable footing as a nation, since the most magnanimous conduct was no security against the attacks of foreign Powers. He should, therefore, be in favor of a naval yard, and of providing ship-timber for future use.

Mr. HARPER said, the two resolutions respecting a naval yard and a provision for timber should come under consideration together; because, if no provision was made for purchasing timber, a naval yard would be of no use.

This question, he said, was capable of being considered under two points of view; the one whether the measure was proper; the other, if the measure was proper, whether it would not be better postponed for the present. Both of these points required a considerable degree of attention. There was a variety of considerations on both sides of the question, and it remained for them to determine for the best.

Was it proper for this country, he asked, to turn its attention towards marine strength? Did not our situation, and the circumstances in which we stand; compel us to turn our attention to this object? He thought they did, and for one or two reasons which he would submit to the consideration of the committee.

It appeared to him out of the question that any kind of commerce should be continued without some ships-of-war to protect it. This was the dilemma in which we were placed. It was said by some gentlemen that this dilemma might be avoided, by suffering commerce to go on unprotected, and subject it to all risks; and that even then, there would be sufficient benefit arising from it, to induce its continuance. This he did not believe. If persons engaged in commerce could have no dependance upon the protection of Government, a very few years, perhaps a few months more, might convince them that the business could not, and ought not to be continued.

The present Government, he said, had only been in existence eight years, and for nearly four of them commerce had been subject to every kind of depredation. The usual calculation with respect to Europe was, that, during every ten years, it would be subject to war, and that these wars would have a duration of from six to eight years, in the course of which our property and citizens would be subject to the same violations and injuries which they had for the last four years experienced, if no provision was made, by a naval power, to prevent it.

Besides, he said, persons finding the inefficacy of Government to protect them in their persons and property (for which purpose Governments were alone instituted) would, in time, lose all respect for it. And this disposition would extend to all classes of citizens; for, though at first the merchants in seaports were the persons who experienced this want of protection, it would, by degrees, spread over the whole Union; and, he said, after a Government shall once become contemptible in the eyes of its own citizens, from its being unable to protect them, it was but another step for them to wish to drop it, and to hope for some new system under which they might receive that protection which they could not receive under it. He believed, therefore, commerce could not exist without a naval establishment.

Brought to this dilemma, said he, which side will you take? Will you give up commerce, or build a Navy to protect it? Besides, he said, a great part of our citizens who had been trained up in commerce from their infancy, could not be driven from that kind of employment to which they had always been accustomed. They could not be induced, like the Chinese, to stay at home; they would be engaged in commerce, their favorite pursuit. If they, then, were compelled to protect commerce, he asked if there was any other way of doing it, than by a Navy? He believed not. Treaties afford a feeble and very inadequate protection; they were broken whenever it suited the interest of a nation to break them. Letters of marque might afford some protection; but this would operate as a heavier tax upon the people than even the support of a Navy. The money which a merchant expended in this way would eventually come upon the people in the price which they would be obliged to pay for their merchandise, and the means would be very inadequate to protection.

In China and the East Indies, Mr. H. said, the inhabitants could shut themselves up within their own territory, and avoid any intercourse with foreign nations. In countries so far removed from Europe, as to prevent any one nation from making a monopoly of its trade, this policy might exist. But could America lay up her ships, and say she would open her ports to all nations? No; that very instant you give up your trade to that nation which has the greatest power at sea; for she will immediately block up your ports, and oblige you to trade with them only. In order, therefore, to trade with all nations, we must be the carriers of our own produce, for other nations would not leave us at liberty to do so. The strongest Power would say to the others, you shall not trade with these people, you shall do so and so, or we will go to war with you. You must, therefore, said he, protect your own trade.

Will these resolutions, then, said he, if adopted, tend to this point? He believed they would. To provide a dock-yard, and to take care of a supply of timber suitable for the purpose of ship-building, were very essential steps. Much expense, he said, would be saved in carrying on the building of several ships together in one yard, instead of having them scattered in different parts of the Union. Timber might also be laid up to season in this yard, so as always to be ready for use; for, he believed, that much of the delay which had attended the building of the ships now on the stocks, had been owing to the difficulty which had attended the procuring of proper timber. Besides, Mr. H. said, its being known to foreign nations, that you had provided a dock-yard, would have some weight; it would at least have the appearance of an intention of building a Navy.

With respect to the purchasing of land clothed with live oak timber, he thought it a very desirable measure. It was well known that this timber was confined to a few spots—a few sea islands on the coast of South Carolina and Georgia, and some small strips along the sea shore; and in each of these places there were only a few trees of a sufficient size for building large ships. The land upon which these trees grew, since the cultivation of cotton had been introduced into those parts, was become valuable land for that purpose. This induced the people to cut down the timber and burn it, for the sake of getting the land, and there was no way of arresting this practice, but by securing the land; and, being of so good a quality, when the trees were cut down, it would probably sell for a greater price than was originally given for it.

But, it might be asked, was this a proper time for going into the business? He believed it was. It was his opinion, if they did not speedily lay hold of this timber, it might get into the hands of a foreign country. And, if the timber was secured, it was necessary to have a dock-yard. He believed it important to go into the business at this time, when our commerce was in a very embarrassed situation; for, if this subject was not now entered into, our citizens would despair of any thing being done for them. It was time, he said, they should show a disposition to repel the injuries which were loaded upon them by foreign nations; for, if we did not show this disposition, we might expect continual repetitions of these injuries.

He was, therefore, convinced that this was the proper time to begin a business of this kind. He believed it would have been a fortunate thing for this country, if it had been begun five years ago. If this had been the case, he believed the frigates would long since have been finished. The sooner, however, they now begin the business, the sooner it would be completed. And when a dock-yard was once established, a small expense would keep it up.

These considerations had appeared to him of sufficient importance to induce him to vote for the measure, and he trusted they would form some apology for his having taken up so much of the time of the Committee.

Mr. GALLATIN saw no connexion between the two resolutions, which the gentleman who had just sat down thought it necessary to connect together. The last resolution proposed the purchase of land clothed with live oak; the present proposed the appropriation of a sum of money for purchasing the site of a naval yard, &c., as a foundation for a Navy. The last went only to the securing of timber for the building of a Navy, if at any day it should be thought necessary; he believed he should vote for the last, but certainly against the first.

They had been told that no commerce could exist without protection, and that that protection must be a Navy; from whence it would follow, that if a Navy was necessary to protect commerce it must be a Navy competent to vie with the navies of other nations. He would here ask, how gentlemen drew their conclusion, that commerce could not exist without the protection of a Navy. He wished they would show from the example of any nation in Europe, or from our own example, that commerce and navies had gone hand in hand.

FEBRUARY, 1797.]

Naval Equipments.

[H. OF R.]

There was no nation, except Great Britain, said he, whose Navy had any connexion with commerce. No nation, except England and Holland, had more to do with commerce than this country, and yet we had no Navy; and though for the four last years this commerce had been subject to continual depredations, it was not exceeded by any nation, except the two he had named. And if they looked to Europe, they would find there was no connexion between navies and commerce. Russia and Sweden had considerable navies, but little commerce; whilst Holland, whose Navy was by no means large, ranked next to England with respect to commerce. Hamburg, he said, was one of the first commercial States in Europe, yet she had no Navy. Navies, he said, were the instruments of power, more calculated to annoy the trade of other nations, than to protect that of the nation to which they belong.

The gentleman last up told them commerce could not exist without a Navy, yet, he said, it was impossible to prevent persons who had been brought up in this way from pursuing it. The gentleman seemed here to admit of a contradiction. If it were impossible to prevent the people from following their commercial pursuits, notwithstanding all the injuries their commerce sustained, he did not see how the position could be established, that it could not exist without a Navy. As to what had been said about Chinese policy, he did not understand it. If they meant the Chinese had nothing to do with commerce, they were certainly wrong, for they had much commerce. It was true, from their ignorance, they did not undertake long voyages, either to Europe or America; they confined themselves nearer home, but they had, notwithstanding, very considerable commerce.

But there was another position which he should take in opposition to gentlemen who supported the creation of a Navy, viz: that however useful or desirable a Navy might be, this country was not equal to the support of one. We might have two or three frigates indeed, but, when he said we could not support a Navy, he meant to say we could not support such a Navy as should claim respect, in the sense which those gentlemen spoke of it; such as being an object of terror to foreign nations. If they calculated what the three frigates had cost, considered the scanty manner in which this country was peopled, our inability to raise any very large revenue, and the high price of labor, the truth of this assertion would appear evident.

Again, if such a Navy were created, how was it to be manned? He wished gentlemen to point out any mode in which a Navy could be manned in this country without having recourse to the abominable practice of impressment. If the nations of Europe found it impossible to man their fleets without having recourse to these violent means, he believed it would be impossible, without breaking down those barriers which secured the liberty of every citizen, to man a Navy in this country.

Perhaps he might be asked, if we were, then, to be left without protection? He thought there were means of protection which arose from our peculiar situation, and that we ought not to borrow institutions from other nations for which we were not fit. If our commerce had increased, notwithstanding its want of protection; if we had a greater number of seamen than any other nation, except England, this, he thought, pointed out the way in which commerce ought to be protected. The fact was, that our only mode of warfare against European nations at sea, was by putting our seamen on board privateers, and covering the sea with them; these would annoy their trade, and distress them more than any other mode of defence we could adopt.

In his opinion, there was a much more effectual way of securing the respect of foreign nations than by building a Navy; this was by applying all our resources to the payment of our Public Debt. Two thirds of our present revenue, he said, went to the payment of the interest of this debt. If we were therefore, first to exert ourselves to pay off that debt, a few years hence, he said, we should be infinitely better prepared to attempt a Navy.

He judged for himself on this occasion, and he wished every member to do the same. He thought it impossible for this country at present to support a Navy, and as a naval yard would be of no use, except it could be employed, he should be against granting any money for that purpose. He wished, however, if they possessed any advantages for ship-building, which might be desirable twelve or fifteen years hence, when our means were increased, to transmit those advantages to the next generation unimpaired. He was, therefore, willing to appropriate a small sum for the purchase of live oak; not because we wanted it now, but to secure resources for a future day, if it should be wanted.

The Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS.

Mr. W. SMITH said, yesterday, when the subject of appropriations was under consideration, some objections were made to the 50,000 dollars estimated as necessary for the purposes of foreign intercourse, and information was called for upon this subject. He had received some information on this head; but as he had it not officially, he would propose a resolution to the House for obtaining it. The following was proposed and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information as he may possess, or be able to obtain, relative to the expense of prosecuting the claims of our citizens whose property may have been captured by the belligerent Powers, for which the sum of $50,000 is estimated as necessary for the present year."

Mr. W. LYMAN, from the committee appointed on the 16th of December last, to inquire into the actual state of the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States, and whether any, and what further provision is necessary to be made on that subject, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SATURDAY, February 11.

Ordered, That the report of the committee appointed on the 16th of December last, to inquire into the actual state of the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States; and whether any, and what further provision is necessary to be made on that subject, which lay on the table, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

Mr. D. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the petition of the Corporation of Rhode Island College, and a report of the Secretary of the Treasury thereon, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle all such necessary expenses and reasonable demands as have been occasioned by the prosecution and trial of persons for offences, during the late insurrection, to be paid out of the fund appropriated by the act of last session; and that the said committee report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. GALLATIN, Mr. SWIFT, and Mr. NICHOLAS, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

NAVAL EQUIPMENTS.

On motion, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee on the state of the Naval Equipments, when the question was put upon the following resolution, and negatively, there being only 23 votes in favor of it:

Resolved, That — dollars ought to be appropriated for the purpose of buying and sitting up for the United States, a proper site for a Naval Yard."

The last resolution, in the following words, then came under consideration, viz:

Resolved, That — dollars ought to be appropriated for the purpose of purchasing live-oak and red cedar timber, or lands stored therewith, for naval purposes."

Mr. W. SMITH hoped this resolution would be agreed to, as, although that House was now disinclined to go into the building of a Navy, it might be the wish of a future Congress to protect our commerce by an adequate naval force; it would be prudent, therefore, to secure any advantages which we at present possessed for building ships of war. On this account it was proposed to secure certain lands covered with valuable ship-timber. This, he said, was a subject of considerable magnitude. It was to be regretted that measures had not been adopted sooner to get possession of this land, as it would have been got cheaper than at present, but it would be got cheaper now than if it were longer delayed. He thought it a desirable measure, and trusted it would be agreed to.

Mr. W. LYMAN said, he wanted some information on the subject before he could vote for the present measure. He wished to know how much land was necessary, and whether all the land proposed to be purchased was covered with large timber. He supposed if this land was purchased they must appoint foresters to take care the timber was not carried off. But, perhaps, on inquiry, it might be found to be of more benefit to the country to have the land for cultivation than to have it covered with timber. He wished these things to be made clear before he appropriated money for this purpose.

Mr. VENABLE thought this measure premature. It was necessary to have information on the subject; for, if he was ever so much disposed to purchase the land in question, he did not know what money would be necessary for the purpose. He neither knew the quantity of land, of timber, or the price of land in that country, and they had no kind of estimate before them. He had no objection to an inquiry being made on the subject, as to the quantity of land and of timber, and the probable price of it. This might be useful to the House, and enable them to form some estimate on the subject; but, without such information, he did not know how gentlemen, who were strangers to the country, could vote. Doubtless, as soon as any law passed to purchase this land, it would be made a matter of speculation, and land which might be purchased low now, would then be charged a very high price.

Mr. PARKER said, he had made some inquiry on the subject, and found that there were large tracts of land in the State of Georgia covered with this timber, and he had no doubt but a sufficient quantity might be got at from three to four dollars an acre. He had received an estimate from the War Office, of a tract of land on the island of St. Mary's, in Georgia, which might be purchased for $64,000, and would be sufficient, by successive growth, to serve the United States for centuries to come; but if advantage was not taken of this land now, some European Government might get possession of it. In Great Britain they had not sufficient timber for their Navy, without having recourse to foreign countries; they were also similarly situated in France, and if their resources in the north of Europe failed, they would doubtless have recourse to America, and they would find no difficulty in getting possession of it. If, therefore, it was the object of this Government at any time to have a Navy, it was of consequence to secure this timber; it would be one of the wisest measures which could be adopted. As to this land being wanted for cultivation, that was scarcely probable, as there was land enough in that State to sustain four millions of inhabitants, and they had not at present more than 100,000 white people in the whole State.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was in favor of the measure, as proper and prudent; for, though he trusted we should never have a large Navy, yet it was proper to have a reserve of this sort, as it might be sold for at least as much as it cost, if it was not wanted.

Mr. MILLEDGE said, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARPER] had made a correct statement with respect to the ship-timber growing in Georgia; there was a considerable quantity of it along the coast, extending three or four miles from the shore. In collecting the timber for the frigates, there had been considerable difficulty, he said, in procuring timber large enough; almost the whole of their sea-islands were examined for the purpose. Previous to the Revolution, he said, the King of Great Britain directed a survey to be made of their coast on the subject of ship-timber, and there was one island in particular which was reported to contain the finest timber on the coast; this was the island of Isepaw. Since the introduction of the growth of cotton the soil had become very valuable, and every year great quantities of this timber were cut down for the purpose of clearing the ground for the cultivation of this article. This land, he said, sold for two or three guineas an acre. He thought, if the United States were possessed of this island, it would be sufficient for building any number of ships for which they might have occasion.

Mr. HOLLAND said, the gentleman from Georgia had informed them that there had been great difficulty to procure timber sufficiently large for the frigates; the price of the frigates was a sufficient evidence of that difficulty. He had made a calculation, and found that five ninety-gun ships, built of Mediterranean timber, would not cost so much as our three frigates. It was not necessary therefore, to take any means to secure our timber, because, if it should fail, it might be procured from the Mediterranean upon better terms, it seemed, than from our own forests.

The gentlemen from Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia, differed considerably with respect to the value of the land on which this timber grew. Besides, he said, it was not yet determined that a Navy would ever be desirable in this country, and, therefore, it was not necessary to go into a speculation of this sort. He thought they had much better pay their debts than go into speculations of purchases of islands for the sake of timber which might never be wanted. We should first be just and pay our debts, and then, if anything remained, it might be appropriated to purchase timber islands.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, he was at a loss how to vote on this occasion. He did not know whether the land was good or bad, or whether the timber growing upon it was in large quantities or small. The gentleman from South Carolina had said the land was of the best kind, and that the timber would be cut down for the sake of cultivation; the gentleman from Virginia believed it very indifferent, and the gentleman from Georgia thought it worth three guineas an acre. In order to get some more accurate knowledge on the subject, he wished the PRESIDENT to be authorized to make inquiry on the subject, and proposed a resolution to that effect; but the Chairman informing him it was not then in order, it was withdrawn.

Mr. HEATH said, it would first be proper to know whether there was a desire for increasing the Navy, before they went into any scheme like the present. He believed there was timber enough on hand for the three frigates, and he saw no necessity for providing more. The gentleman from South Carolina was apprehensive that if we did not purchase this land the timber would get into the hands of foreign agents. He wished they would purchase it; he would rather have their money than the timber; he thought it would be of greater service to the country. He should be glad if they would purchase all our forests. He was sorry to see an appetite in that House for a large Navy; to increase our ships of war, he said, would be to increase our folly, and disgrace our councils to posterity. Were this law to be passed, they might expect to have forty or fifty persons employed for one purpose or another; and they should have a quantity of timber lying in their naval yards rotting, for he hoped it would never be used for ships of war.

He said he was sorry to see such a desire to imitate the practice of monarchical Governments; he wished to stand aloof from European politics and European broils; and could almost wish, with an eminent philosopher [Mr. Rittenhouse] now no more, that "Nature would raise her everlasting bars between the new and the old world, and make a voyage to Europe as impracticable as one to the moon."

Mr. S. SMITH said, he was not in favor of the bars which the gentleman last up wished to be placed betwixt us and European nations. The resolution before them, he said, proposed to secure timber for the purpose of building ships of war at a future day.

It had been said by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] that all the advantages which were derived from commerce would not counterbalance the evils which a Navy would introduce. It would be proper, therefore, to inquire into this matter. Our commerce he said, had grown up and surprised the world, and ourselves, without protection; but would this commerce continue to prosper unprotected? He supposed not. Our commerce, he said, had produced, from the establishment of the present Government, a revenue of seventy-five millions of dollars. And how, he asked, had this been expended? It might be supposed, from the arguments of gentlemen, that it had been lavished on commerce. Had this been the case? If it had, commercial men had no right to complain; but if it had not they had a just right to complain that no protection was held out to them. Of this sum, there had been expended, he said, on the Western frontier, and to quell the Western insurrection, between twelve and fifteen millions; and the rest, how had it been applied? It had been applied to pay the interest and part of the Public Debt, to pay the Civil List, and other expenses of Government. Except about seven hundred thousand dollars, which had been appropriated for the frigates, all these seventy-five millions had been expended on objects foreign from commerce. But gentlemen said these seven hundred thousand dollars had been thrown away. Grant this; he trusted they should learn wisdom from it in future. Was, then, one-eightieth part of what had been produced by commerce too much to have been expended upon it? Some gentlemen seemed to be of that opinion; and wished the vessels sold. None of those gentlemen whose property of every kind had been increased by the plenty which commerce had introduced, were willing to hold out a hand to protect it at a time when it was oppressed.

But, it might be said, commercial men did not pay this money. He knew they did not; he was well aware the people at large paid it; but it was derived from commerce, and without which it would not have been paid.

He had said that only one-eightieth part of the revenue produced by commerce had been expended upon it; but, was this revenue alone the only benefit derived from commerce? No: there were advantages everywhere to be seen in the prosperity and independence of the country. Whether, said he, we look in the large cities, in the villages, or upon the plantation of the farmer, all carry the cheerful appearance of plenty, as a consequence of commercial enterprise. Go where you will, said he, throughout the whole continent of America, and you see wealth, independence, and happiness, arising from the prosperity introduced by commerce.

The nations of Europe, Mr. S. said, had long looked with envy on the American commerce, and if it were to be left unprotected they might seize upon it at pleasure. Had not this been the case? Had not Great Britain taken three millions of our unprotected property? And what did we say to them? We stood aghast, looking at one another. One man proposed one thing, and one man another; we rested satisfied with sending an Envoy to treat; a Treaty had been made, but a single shilling had not been received, and the other day, when fifty thousand dollars were proposed to be appropriated to pay the expense of prosecuting these claims, many objections were urged against it. Indeed, it seemed as if some gentlemen would have no objection to see the commerce of the country wholly destroyed.

Another nation, seeing the spoiliations committed upon our property with impunity by the British, had followed her example, and had seized to the amount of from five to six millions. They had no commerce, and therefore it was out of our power even to retaliate upon them. They say, "you suffered the British to take your property to our disadvantage, therefore, we will take it to theirs." And so, said he, we are buffeted and abused on all sides.

He supposed, however, it was to no purpose going into arguments on this subject, as he doubted not the minds of members were determined upon it. In the course of twenty or thirty years, when it shall have been lost, we shall have learnt to know the value of commerce, upon which the happiness of the United States, in a great measure, at present depends.

They had been asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] in what nation, besides Great Britain, their Navy went hand in hand with commerce. He would ask that gentleman in what nation commerce had flourished, to any extent, without a Navy? He knew of none; and the commerce of this country could not be brought as an instance, as unexampled depredations had been committed upon it for the last four years. It would be needless to show to that gentleman, that the commerce of all nations, from the earliest period of time, which was not protected by a Navy, had been constantly kept in a state of depression. His own reading had, doubtless, furnished him with the information.

In the dark ages of European history, Mr. S. said, the Hanseatic League (of which Hamburg was a port) rose up in the commercial line; they protected their commerce; they forced respect to their ships; though single cities, they stood against all the Empires which surrounded them, until navies were raised against them. The Dutch afterwards rose into consequence, and extended their commerce to distant parts of the globe. At that period the commerce of England had scarcely a name. But, during the Long Parliament in England, the famous Navigation Act passed, after which the commerce of that country began to extend itself to every part of the globe. The waters of Holland, he said, would not admit of large ships, and, in consequence, their trade was depressed, and America, at this time, possessed more shipping than Holland.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said Hamburg was without protection; but did not that gentleman know that she owed her safety to the constant jealousy of Denmark and Prussia. And what was this trade, he asked? It was not carried on by their own ships. America did much to the support of that trade. When did you see, said he, a Hamburg vessel? Scarcely ever. Their trade was principally carried on by the vessels of other nations. It was true that, at present, it was a city of great commerce; but its liberty depended upon the jealousy of two great Potentates, and the moment they agreed, it would fall to that Power which possessed the strongest naval force.

It was ridiculous, he said, to think of supporting any considerable commerce without a naval force; but gentlemen say, if we had armed ships, they would lead us into war; so, we could not have power, but we must abuse it. This was paying us no compliment; but he differed widely in opinion from gentlemen on this subject; he was of opinion that, if we had twelve ships of war, no European Power would commit the depredations upon us which they did at present.

Great Britain seized upon the ships of Denmark; what did she do in return? She armed, and said she would not submit to be so treated, and restitution was made. But what, he asked, was done to us? We were put off by a trial; and, after gaining our causes, we were sent to the West Indies, to seek redress from the Captain who committed the injustice against us; and, if he were not able to pay, then we had to return again to Great Britain for satisfaction. If, said he, we had twelve ships of war, they would not treat us thus.

To him, he said, the conduct of gentlemen was very extraordinary. There were five large seaports, from which came most of the revenue of the United States; these ports, for the good of the whole, joined heartily in the Federal Government; before that time they were in the habit of raising revenue from other States, but they joined the General Government, in hope of meeting with protection from it. They now saw how they were to be protected. Fifteen millions of property had been expended in the defence of one part of the Union, and yet the Representatives from that quarter seemed to rise, as in a mass, to vote against any protection being given to commerce. He was astonished to see such conduct from men so well informed on other subjects.

They had been told by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS,] that it was necessary they should correct their habits. They were frequently told so from the pulpit; but prejudices, he said, grew up with them, which it was difficult to shake off. In some parts of the Union, commerce was carried on by means of foreign agents and factors, who took their produce at an under value; and being so brought up, persons were prejudiced in favor of that way of doing business. Perhaps the mind of the gentleman from Virginia might have a prejudice of this kind; if so, he could have no just idea of an independent commerce. He hoped gentlemen would endeavor to get clear of these kind of prejudices and join heartily in supporting and protecting an honorable and independent commerce.

Mr. CORR said, if the gentleman last up was possessed of a spirit of prophecy, he might, doubtless, foretell the events he had mentioned; and if eloquence was to effect his point, he might, perhaps, be successful; but eloquence was not argument; and he thought the gentleman had wandered greatly from the question, which was, whether a quantity of timber land should be purchased for the future purposes of Government.

It was not surprising, that gentlemen who wished a Naval Establishment should lay hold of everything with avidity which led that way. For his part, he hoped the United States would not, at present, go into a Navy. He believed the United States would be more prosperous without a Navy than with one. They, therefore, differed in opinion, and, except he should be convinced he was wrong, he should certainly vote against the present question.

But it was said, this timber might be wanted at some future period, when it could not be had. He thought the arguments on this point totally inadequate. No business could be undertaken by the public upon such good terms as by individuals. So soon as you open the door of the Treasury, you cannot tell the amount which will be wanted out of it. When the land was purchased, it must be taken care of; what further expense would be necessary, he could not say. Perhaps it would be said, when they were in possession of timber, that, since they had the timber, they ought to proceed with building ships.

Besides, he said, there was no business so uncertain and ruinous as that of speculation to an individual, and if ruinous to individuals how much more so would it be to the public? The expense being certain, and the advantage very contingent, he should, therefore, be opposed to the resolution.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he would not have troubled the Committee again on this subject, had not the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] attacked gentlemen from the frontiers, with being less inclined than others to give protection to commerce.

On this ground, he had before stated, that the commercial interests of this country were so connected with those of agriculture, that any protection which it was in the power of the United States to give them, he would always be ready to give. He conceived that the protection given to commerce would tend to increase the price of produce; and though the farmers were not so immediately injured by any mischief which befel commerce, yet, in the end, the loss was pretty equally felt.

It was unnecessary, Mr. G. said, to examine into the truth of the statements which the gentleman from Maryland had produced with respect to the amount of revenue produced by commerce, or the expense of defending the frontier; because it would not be denied, that the whole of our revenue was produced from commerce, and that the expense on the frontier had been very considerable; yet, he was mistaken in his assertion: the amount of our resources, including loans, did not amount to seventy-five millions. He had no papers by him, and he could not trust his memory in respect to figures; yet, he would assert that, instead of seventy-five, the duties arising from commerce since the establishment of the Government, would fall short of thirty-five millions. He believed they would not exceed thirty. Again, when the gentleman spoke of the expense on the frontier being from twelve to fifteen millions, he was mistaken. He could speak with certainty on this subject. The expense of the Military and Militia was eight millions, and the last year the amount of expense was one million two hundred thousand dollars; therefore, this expense was only nine, instead of twelve or fifteen millions.

He would observe, that this money was not expended solely for the protection of the frontier, nor at the request of the inhabitants, but for other purposes; and that gentleman must do him the justice to say, that when the question was before them for providing a defence for the frontier, he was as much for saving expense as upon this occasion. He had no particular view; his wish was to save expense, and thereby promote the general interests of the Union.

Mr. G. said, he was still of opinion that a Navy was not essentially necessary to the protection of commerce. Nothing he had heard on that subject had at all tended to change his opinion. It might, to a certain degree, be convenient; but he thought the expense greater than the advantages to be derived from such an establishment. In this assertion, he would say, he was warranted by the example of all other nations. No nation, except Great Britain, had any Navy in proportion to its commerce; and that Navy was erected more for the purpose of extending her power, than for the protection of her commerce. He would assert, from an investigation of the most authentic official documents, that the amount of tonnage employed in foreign trade in this country was equal to that employed in any other, except Great Britain. The object of a Navy, he said, was not so much to protect commerce as to augment the power of a nation. But, if we were to be dazzled by the conduct of Great Britain in this respect, so as to desire to imitate her example, because she is a powerful nation and has an extensive trade, it would be well to consider the consequences of this policy. It was true, they had three hundred ships of war. And what, said he, is the price they have paid for them? Their Public Debt is upwards of three hundred millions sterling, and this debt had been chiefly produced by this Navy. This was not merely his opinion, he would refer to Sir John Sinclair, the author of a treatise on the revenues of Great Britain, who proves that it had been owing to the Navy that their debt was at the enormous amount he had mentioned, and that extensive navies had been the ruin of every nation which had possessed them.

But, Mr. G. said, he might be told that this was a mere theoretic opinion of his own, and that a Navy was essential to this country. He said, he did not presume to judge for generations to come; but he would repeat that we were not at present capable of supporting a Navy; our situation would not admit of it; our revenues were not sufficient; and men could not be got, without recourse to arbitrary and unwarrantable measures to raise them.

He had said, when he was up yesterday on this subject, that if we were in possession of any resources for ship-building, he should wish them to go unimpaired to posterity, and that he was therefore willing to do something towards the purchase of land; but, from the information which he had received that day, on that floor, he thought the resolution premature.

They had been told by the Chairman of the Committee that sixty-four thousand dollars would be sufficient to purchase sufficient timber land for the purpose in view; a gentleman from Georgia had told them that a certain island must be the object, which was worth from two to three guineas an acre; but he had also told them that it was with great difficulty that timber was found sufficiently large for the frigates now building. It followed, that those islands did not produce timber sufficiently large for ships of war, though it might be large enough for merchantmen. Though this timber might be very good, yet, if its size did not answer, the business was premature. He thought they ought not to go further, therefore, at present, than to empower the PRESIDENT to make inquiries on the subject.

Mr. CHRISTIE said, he was far from thinking commerce was not worthy of protection. He would give it all the protection he could; but he thought it might be more economically protected than by a Navy. Four years ago, an effectual protection was proposed, but it was then called a paper, chimerical protection; but it would have been found a better protection than frigates. He trusted he should never see a single armed vessel belong to the United States; he hoped, also, that his posterity might not. He did not wish to see so much of the property of the people of the United States engaged in this business; it would be the saving of pence, at the expense of pounds.

It was an extraordinary thing, he said, that, at a time when they had not money to pay for a house for Congress to sit in, gentlemen should wish them to go into a speculation like the present. It was said this land might be purchased for sixty thousand dollars, but he was certain they should not purchase it for £30 an acre. He knew it had got into the hands of those who would make money by it. He thought, if the object was to keep it from foreigners, it would be much better to pass a law to prevent the exportation of the timber, than to purchase the land. But, said he, if by sowing an acorn, it would grow up into a first-rate ship of war every year, I would not give a dollar for that acorn, if it must be employed in the service of the United States. When the vessels were finished, he should vote for selling them. Indeed, he would much rather they were burnt, than that they should be manned; for, so far from their being a protection to commerce, they would certainly involve us in a war. The moment they went out, they would be treated with indignity by the British or French; and then, said he, we should have another Envoy to send to Great Britain or France, to beg of them to accommodate the business. He had voted against the frigates from the beginning; and would continue to do so.

Mr. PARKER thought it necessary to remark upon what had been said with respect to the different estimates which had been made of the value of the timber-land in Georgia. It was true, that the island mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia was worth three guineas an acre, but there were others which might be purchased for four dollars. In searching for timber for the frigates, the whole of that coast was ransacked; but he believed, on every part of that shore, plenty of timber was to be got for the sum which he had mentioned.

Mr. MILLEDGE said, the timber in the southern part of the State of Georgia was not so good as in the northern. Land in the South might be got at three dollars an acre, but he thought it would not be found to answer the purpose so well as the timber in the more northerly parts.

Mr. W. SMITH said he did not expect that the consideration whether this country was likely to become a Naval Power would have come into consideration on this question; but as it had been introduced, it would be necessary to say a few words on that subject.

It had been said by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. CHRISTIE] that he was opposed to the purchasing of land, but that the timber might be secured by prohibiting the exportation of live-oak; but he immediately said, he should not wish to see this timber in ships-of-war; and if he did not wish to see it made use of in this way, there was no occasion to prevent its exportation.

Mr. S. said, as it had been made a subject of inquiry whether this country should become a Naval Power or not, they should consider how much our revenue depended on commerce—how much the habits of our citizens were commercial—and learn, from the histories of other countries, that commerce cannot be protected but by a Navy. He said he was not singular in his opinion. He could produce the opinion of a man from the State, whence much of the opposition to this measure proceeded—an opinion which would doubtless have considerable weight in that House: he alluded to Mr. JEFFERSON's Notes on Virginia. [Mr. S. here read a pretty long extract from Mr. JEFFERSON's book, in favor of a Navy for the protection of commerce in this country.]

If the resources of the United States were such, (and Mr. JEFFERSON said they were, or might be in a few years—that a moderate assessment from the different States would enable them to build eighteen ships in one year,) gentlemen should not be so alarmed at the measure of a naval force. It was true, there were many objections to going into a subject of this kind at present, the greatest of which was the present high price of labor. The price which the frigates now building would cost was very great, but the expense of every undertaking was at first large. The exploring for timber, &c., produced an expense which would not again occur. Mr. JEFFERSON seemed fully of opinion that this country was equal to the building and the supporting of a Navy. This opinion was further confirmed by his report made to that House some years ago. [Mr. S. read an extract from this report, and also an extract from a speech of some member in a former Congress on this subject.]

Mr. S. said he could not conceive why the United States were not as competent to a Navy as European Powers whose resources were not equal to ours. He could name three Powers who were in this situation, viz: Sweden, Denmark, and Holland. He enumerated their resources to be as follows:

In Sweden, the population in 1772 was 3,000,000, revenue 11,000,000, national debt 60,000,000; she had 30 ships of the line, 12 or 14 frigates, 50 galleys, and from 15,000 to 17,000 seamen.

In Denmark, the population at the same time was 2,200,000, revenue 7,000,000, and but little debt; she had 31 ships of the line, 9 frigates, and 21 frigates.

In Holland, the population in 1772 was 2,000,000, in 1785 2,700,000; but in 1796, it had been so reduced by the revolution as only to be 1,880,000. The revenue of the seven United Provinces was 4,500,000, debts 2,000,000,000 of florins, or £200,000,000 sterling; owing by other countries to Holland, 585,000,000 of florins. The Navy in 1782 was 42 ships of the line, 43 frigates, and 10 cutters.

Mr. S. said, these resources were inferior to those of the United States, and therefore insured that we were equal to the maintaining of a fleet, particularly, said he, when a much smaller one would serve us (according to the opinion of Mr. JEFFERson) than served them, since European Powers could never send out more than a detachment against us, which, from so long a voyage, would always be liable to accident or injury.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had made some observations with respect to the Navy of Great Britain, in which he could not concur. That gentleman did not take into consideration, that it was to her Navy that that nation owed its independence. Admitting that her debt had been greatly increased by her Navy, did not every gentleman see, that if it had not been for her Navy, she would have been subject to other Powers? A great part of her debt was, however, incurred by land-wars on the continent of Europe.

It was observed yesterday by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] that the law for building the frigates was passed by surprise, and very properly answered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S. SMITH] that it underwent a very full discussion. But, said he, what occasioned this law to be passed? They found their commerce injured by foreign Powers, and wished to prevent those injuries in future. The majority was then in favor of a Navy, and what could have occasioned a change of opinion in that House he could not tell.

Gentlemen had exclaimed, What will three frigates do? Every Power, he said, must begin with a small force at first. He mentioned a remarkable fact on this subject last session, which he would repeat, viz: that the privateers fitted out in Liverpool alone, in the course of the late war, carried as many guns as the whole naval power of England consisted of in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and it was at that time thought very considerable. Besides, he said, those gentlemen who advocated the building of the frigates, were not to blame for their number being so small.

Six were originally proposed to be built, but they had been reduced, contrary to their wish, to three. If there was any instability in this, it was not chargeable upon them. Another thing should be considered, when gentlemen spoke of the power of these three frigates so lightly. It should be recollected that these frigates were nearly as large as ships of the line, and might easily be converted into 74-gun ships. We might, therefore, in a few years, have a Navy sufficient to protect our commerce. Mr. S. said they should not then have to spend their time in a waste of words in abusing foreign countries; whereas, at present, they were one day declaiming against Algiers,* because our peace with that country had cost a great deal of money. At another time it was said we must not have frigates, because the expense was great. Some gentlemen would not have a land tax, because the expense of laying the tax would be considerable. But, for his part, he was for having revenue as fast as he could raise it, and he was for having a Navy as fast as he could get it. He believed the country would cheerfully bear the expense of it. At any rate, said he, let us secure timber for a future day. It was known that foreign agents had taken surveys of the land upon which this timber grew, and it was no more than prudent to take means to secure it. The observations he had read from Mr. JEFFERSON proved this. As to making the inquiry which had been mentioned, that would defeat the object, according to gentlemen's own arguments, as it would doubtless promote speculation; and therefore he thought it would be much more prudent to give the PRESIDENT power to purchase, whenever he could do it to advantage. Admitting (as had been hinted) that speculators had already bought this land, they must sell it. There were times when speculators wanted money, and when they would sell anything they had.

Another difficulty had been mentioned, that if the land was purchased, persons must be employed to take care of it. Suppose that were the case, what then? If $500 or $600 were paid for this purpose, it would be no great object; but he believed there would be no necessity for this expense, as the officers of Government in that quarter might be charged with the care of it.

Upon the whole, Mr. S. said, he thought it was their duty to authorize the PRESIDENT to purchase this land, as he was convinced the timber would be wanted at a future day.

Mr. HEATH wished to cite a passage from Mr. JEFFERSON's book, which the gentleman from South Carolina had thought proper to omit. [He read the extract, which recommends above all things the cultivation of peace, and that it would be better to abandon the ocean altogether than be perpetually in war.] He charged the gentleman from South Carolina with perverting the author's sentiments by reading a part only of his sentiments; but, said he, it is a little lawyer-like—the case was in point.

He noticed what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. S. SMITH,] with respect to their doing business by means of foreign agents. He said that time was past; they were now indebted to their brethren in the Northern and Eastern States for doing their commercial business, and they did not envy them of it.

Mr. MURRAY justified the fairness of the quotation made by his friend from South Carolina from Mr. JEFFERSON, and said the two quotations were perfectly consistent with each other.

Mr. PAGE said, he would not have troubled the Committee of the Whole with what occurred to him on the subject before them, had not the member from South Carolina [Mr. W. SMITH] quoted authorities in favor of his opinion, from Mr. JEFFERSON's Notes on Virginia, and used expressions which, whether intended or not, might appear to those who heard them like insinuations that those who differed from him on the present question were inconsistent with themselves upon a former occasion, and that, too, from motives of partiality to those who were now making depredations on our commerce. As to Mr. JEFFERSON's opinions, they were the opinions of a friend whom he highly respected; but he confessed he could not agree with him in the points alluded to. Mr. P. always differed from him respecting the equipment of a Navy, and the giving bounties to the fisheries, as an encouragement to a nursery of seamen. He always thought that his friend's ideas of the necessity of having a Navy were borrowed from British writers and the example of Britain; but the cases of America and Britain were totally different. America had done well hitherto without a Navy: she never could want one more than now, and it was evident to him, if she had at the time we were promised them the six frigates originally intended, they could not have protected her vessels against British depredations, but would most probably have involved her in a war with Britain; and much less could three frigates protect them now against the two nations harassing her commerce. It was the interest of the United States to avoid wars, and the jealousy of maritime Powers—to encourage agriculture and domestic manufactures—and to leave commerce to itself. That commercial spirit of enterprise which it has been said is peculiar to our fellow-citizens will make its way into the commercial world without a Navy—ay, better without it than with it; for one frigate would deprive thirty ships of their sailors, and, by its expenses, oppress commerce. But Britain could not have existed as an independent nation without a Navy: it is necessary to the protection of her commerce, situated and circumstanced as she is; but it has been well observed, that it cost commerce more than its protection was worth. As to the inconsistency with which those with whom he should vote were charged, he was not sensible of it; for he, in particular, had from the beginning opposed the building of the frigates; he had objected to them as improper and useless as a defence against the Algerines. And as to preparations for defence against the nation alluded to, he had declared that he thought none necessary, and that if we had a fleet, when at sea, it would be such an object of our anxious attention, that it would be to certain Powers a pledge for our good behaviour, and the United States would be liable to be wounded in a tender part. If destroyed by an enemy, or by storm, we should scarcely prevail on Congress to vote appropriations for another fleet; and that, in our rivers and bays, proper galleys with large guns in their bows, and heavy guns and howitzers on traveling carriages on our shores to support them, with a well-armed militia, whether well trained or not, would be a sufficient protection for the United States; that he had said it would be better for the United States that an enemy's army should get into the centre of our country (because we could get rid of it as we had done) than that the country should be perpetually taxed to guard against a possible invasion; and that he and those now charged with inconsistency, he thought, had relied on commercial retaliation, and not on naval equipments in the case alluded to, and therefore were not inconsistent in voting now against preparations for a Navy; that, being deprived by Treaties of the right to make use of commercial retaliations, he was willing to rely on a pacific disposition and negotiations to adjust differences now existing; that the wished-for Navy, small as it was, if it could possibly have any good effect, could not be equipped before the present war would probably be ended, and possibly all wars be abolished; for, without looking for the Millenium, we may well suppose that the nations now engaged in war have had enough of war, and will long, and if possible forever, avoid wars hereafter.

The United States, in his opinion, by cherishing peace, might render themselves amiable in the eyes of the world; and, by a proper use of peace, they might become great and powerful. They might, even now, without a Navy, hope to teach the world that they must, if they will go to war, in future suffer her vessels to pass free from the depredations of which they now complain. That, for these reasons, he saw no occasion for putting the United States to the expense of purchasing the timber on lands proposed; that he thought with his colleague [Mr. HEATH] that they had better be left to their present proprietors to make the most of them out of the foreigners who, we are told, wish to purchase them; that, if every tree would spring up into a full-rigged ship-of-the-line, (as the member from Maryland had said,) he would not wish to purchase the land on which they grew, unless it was to sell the ships. We are told, indeed, that we cannot sell the three frigates; but, said he, I make no doubt but that some of the maritime Powers will be willing to buy them. Indeed, if I were permitted, said he, I could name a certain person who will be willing to purchase them as fast as we can build them. Indeed, I do not think this a proper time to make preparations for a Navy. The United States seem already too much an object of the jealous attention of the great maritime Powers of Europe; let us not make it their interest to pursue these measures, now so ruinous to our commerce. If France believes what we are told in this book she does, of our partiality for Great Britain, (holding up the PRESIDENT's late communications,) it will be the interest of that Republic to cut off all our hopes of becoming a maritime Power; and, even if it were true, it must be the interest of Britain to diminish the number of your merchant vessels and sailors, and to furnish you with arguments for the equipment of a Navy. Let us, therefore, not attempt at present to lay even for posterity the foundation of a Navy; let us show the world that we can be happy without one, and let us show to the Powers who now insult us that if they desist not from their insults we can make them repent it, without having recourse to war.

Mr. NICHOLAS complained of the unfairness of the quotation made by the gentleman from South Carolina, and said, that that book having been written during our struggle with Great Britain, what was there said could scarcely be applicable to our present circumstances. In speaking of the capabilities of the United States to support a fleet, Mr. JEFFERSON says that Virginia was able to furnish a million of dollars. But, said Mr. N., has not this been raised, and is it not all gone, and more wanted, in a different way? Mr. JEFFERSON was also of opinion, Mr. N. said, that one million of dollars would build vessels to the amount of 300 guns; but they found, from experience, that that sum would not build 120 guns. These estimates, he said, were vastly dissimilar.

The gentleman from South Carolina seemed to think there would be no difficulty in finding money for all the objects he contemplated. Mr. N. said, he believed that gentlemen knew less of the disposition of the people with respect to paying taxes than he did. He thought the $1,200,000 which must be raised would be heavily felt by the people. He relied that it would be paid; but his reliance was founded more upon the virtue and attachment of the people to their Government than of the lightness of the burden. In the part of the country from whence he came, he knew this additional tax would be very sensibly felt.

Mr. N. said he did not understand the quotation which the gentleman from South Carolina had given them from a speech. If he had known whence it came, and heard it distinctly, it might have had its proper weight; but as he did not, he could not be influenced by it.

They had been told by that gentleman that Denmark, with a revenue of seven millions, had 31 ships of the line; from whence he argued that we might also have that number. But, said Mr. N., that gentleman should have recollected that, to support 31 ships of the line, according to the estimates which had been made to them, would, in this country, consume the whole seven millions annually.

Would not this fact alone show the gentleman the great difference of our situation from that of the European Powers which he had named? If it would not, he thought he must have turned a deaf ear to conviction.

That gentleman supposed he had lessened the weight of the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] with respect to the British Navy, when he said their independence had been secured by it. He did not see it in that light. He had said no nation went into a Naval Establishment for the purpose of protecting commerce; but the gentleman from South Carolina said their independence required it. This, he said, was the understanding of every one, and acquitted Great Britain of doing a thing for less than it was worth; but the gentleman could not have supported the argument of his friend from Pennsylvania more effectually than by this assertion.

Much had been said, Mr. N. observed, upon what fell from him yesterday respecting the law having been passed by surprise for building the frigates. He still was of the same opinion, and what had fallen from the gentleman from South Carolina, he thought, corroborated that opinion; for he had said it passed under an impression of danger. Was it begun, he asked, for any of the purposes which had been named in the course of this debate? He believed not; for Algiers had not been mentioned in the course of it. Indeed, this convinced him of what he always thought, that protection from the Algerines was a mere pretence to set the building of a fleet on foot.

As an apology for the enormous price which these frigates had cost, they were told they were much larger than 44-gun frigates were generally built. Mr. N. said, that time after time they made strange discoveries. It was somewhat extraordinary that, after they had ordered 44-gun frigates to be built, the Executive should have caused vessels to be built almost equal in size to 74's. This was effectually defeating all their precautions—it was legislating without their consent, and accounted, in some degree, for the excessive expenditure. Indeed, he confessed that he had seen the expenses of Government, in all cases, go so greatly beyond what was at first calculated, that he was not willing to go into any scheme of which he could make no tolerably correct estimate. He should, therefore, be opposed to the present. He had always found that the expense doubled, at least, the estimate, and in future he should reckon upon this as certain; and since they could not check the execution of the laws, it became them to be careful how they made them.

Mr. N. concluded by observing, that the protection and happiness of this country depended more upon economy and a discharge of the Public Debt than upon Navies or Armies; he should, therefore, be opposed to the latter, and promote the former all in his power.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to defend himself from the charge of having drawn unjust inferences from the quotations which he had made from Mr. JEFFERSON'S book. It appeared clearly that it was the opinion of that gentleman that it was necessary this country should have a Navy, and that our resources were equal to the support of one. Indeed, a gentleman from Virginia, on his right, [Mr. PAGE,] had confirmed this by saying that, on that subject they had always disagreed. But it was objected against this extract that it was written during the war, and that it was not now applicable; but gentlemen forgot the extract which he had read from a report made by that gentleman some years afterwards. [He again read the extract.]

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] had cast censure upon the Executive for having exceeded their authority in making the vessels larger than were intended. The reason they were made of their present size was, because they were intended against Algiers, and if they had been smaller they would not have been equal to the business. If the expense was greater than estimated, it arose from circumstances out of their power, viz: the high price of labor, &c.

But the gentleman complained that Algiers had never been mentioned in the course of the debate. The gentleman must know that there was prudence in that, since it was a subject that could not properly be introduced there. When this subject was formerly under discussion, though many gentlemen mentioned the Algerines as the immediate cause of the frigates, he always looked upon them as the foundation of a Navy.

Mr. FINDLEY did not expect that in the discussion of this question so wide a field would have been taken. With respect to the building of a Navy at present, he should certainly be opposed to it; but he was not so determined against a fleet as to put it out of the power of posterity to build one, if they should judge it right to do so; but he thought they had not sufficient information on that head. Expenses were generally so much more than were estimated, that he wished to know more upon the subject before he appropriated money on the occasion, that he might calculate whether it would be better for us and for posterity to purchase the timber now, reckoning the interest of the money and the expense of taking care of it when purchased, or leave it to be purchased by posterity. He would, therefore, vote for any resolution which should direct an inquiry to be made on the subject, but not for the present question.

The motion was then put and negatived—55 to 31.

The Committee then rose and reported the first resolution, with the amendments, and a disagreement to the other two. The House then took them up. A considerable debate took place on the propriety of coupling the provision respecting a repeal of the law relative to equipping and manning the vessels with the resolution providing an appropriation for the finishing of them. It was urged that gentlemen who wished to vote for completing the vessels, but not for the repeal of that part of the law which respects the manning of the vessels, could not vote agreeably to their wish, and so as to convey their sentiments to their constituents. It was also objected to as an improper tack to be sent to the other branches of Government, as it would oblige them either to agree to two things, or neither. It was answered, that gentlemen might show their opinion on the occasion by voting for or against the amendment to repeal the law. The impropriety of the tack was denied, as it was only upon that condition they would allow money for the frigates to be built, as some gentlemen said they would rather see them burnt than manned.

The first resolution being again read, the first amendment thereto, reported by the Committee of the Whole House, for striking out the words "and equip for sea," was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The other amendment to the said first resolution, reported by the Committee of the Whole House, for adding thereto the following words, "and that all such parts of the act, entitled 'An act to provide a Naval Armament,' as relate to the appointing and commissioning of the officers and manning the ships, in and by the said act directed to be provided, ought to be repealed, except so far as may relate to any officers already appointed under said act," was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House—yeas 63, nays 28, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. PARKER, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. HARPER, do prepare and bring in a bill or bills pursuant to the said first resolution, as amended.

MONDAY, February 13.

Mr. PARKER reported a bill appropriating money for finishing the frigates United States, Constitution, and Constellation.

Also, a bill to repeal so much of a former act as relates to the officering and manning the fleet of the United States.

Both which bills were twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. HAVENS, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Directory of the Mint, made a report thereon, directing a sum to be appropriated for the purchase of gold bullion and coin, and a sum to make good deficiencies occasioned by coining bullion put into the Mint of an inferior quality. Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. BRENT proposed a resolution to the following effect, which was also ordered to lie on the table:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of incorporating the Commissioners of the City of Washington, and to report by bill or otherwise."

MESSRS. BRENT, GREENUP, and COIT, were appointed.

PURCHASE OF LIVE OAK LANDS.

Mr. HARPER said, that though the House had declined coming to a resolution to authorize the PRESIDENT to purchase certain lands in Georgia, clothed with live oak and red cedar timber, as a reserve for future naval purposes, yet there seemed to be a disposition to cause an inquiry to be made on the subject. He therefore proposed a resolution to the House to the following effect:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized and requested to cause to be made and reported to this House as early as may be after the meeting of the next session of Congress, an inspection of lands furnished with live oak and red cedar timber, with the relative advantages of different situations with respect to their fitness for naval purposes, and the rates at which purchases may be made."

Ordered to lie on the table.

JOHN DE NEUFVILLE.

On motion of Mr. MADISON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the following report of the committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Anna de Neufville, widow of John de Neufville, deceased. They report—

"That the services and sacrifices of the said John de Neufville to the United States, during the war of their Revolution, as stated in the said memorial, and vouched by the testimonies herewith reported, constitute a reasonable claim, in behalf of his, at present, very distressed widow and children, on the justice of the United States. That it being impossible, from various and peculiar circumstances incident to the services rendered, to ascertain and liquidate the compensation due into a precise sum, it is necessary for Congress to decide on and provide for such allowance as may be deemed equitable and right. That, in the opinion of the committee, the sum of three thousand dollars may be a proper allowance. They therefore propose the following resolution:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for granting to the widow and two children of John de Neufville, the sum of three thousand dollars, to be equally divided among them."

This report was advocated by MESSRS. HARPER, W. SMITH, SWANWICK, HAVENS, HEATH, THATCHER, VARNUM, and RUTHERFORD. They stated that the husband of the petitioner, John de Neufville, was an eminent merchant at Amsterdam; that he was an influential character there, and, at an early period of our Revolutionary war, entered with great zeal into the interests of America; that, meeting with Mr. William Lee, the Commissioner of the United States, he endeavored to bring about a treaty between the United Netherlands and the United States, which being discovered by the British, that Court used its influence with the Government of that country to harass and drive him out of the country; that during his residence at Amsterdam, his house was a constant asylum for American citizens; that he had made large advances in money for the service of the United States, which obliged him to extend his credit beyond what was warranted by the regular course of trade, and a failure in the payment of which (owing to the embarrassed circumstances of the United States at that time) had greatly injured him, and left him to the mercy of his creditors. The consequence was, he was reduced from affluence to poverty at an advanced period of life. Some years ago he arrived at Boston with his wife and two children, where he subsisted in a very humble manner upon the bounty of his friends in Holland; those friends having, by the reverses occasioned by the Revolution, been much injured in their property, could afford him but a scanty pittance; but Mr. de Neufville being dead, the petitioner was deprived of this assistance; and, to add to her repeated misfortunes, the son of her late husband, from their multiplied sufferings, had been deprived of his reason. Under this pressure of grievances, the petitioner was come from Boston to lay her case before Congress, and pray relief. This peculiarly distressing case was supported with great zeal and feeling by its advocates, particularly by Mr. HARPER.

The claim was opposed by MESSRS. COIT, SWIFT, and NICHOLAS. An application, it seems, was made by Mr. de Neufville, during his lifetime, for redress; upon which the then Secretary of State [Mr. JEFFERSON] reported. This report, after stating all the facts upon which the claim was founded, gave it as his opinion, that the petitioner had no real claim on the United States. This report, it seems, had never been acted upon. The reading of it, as well as of all the documents relative to this claim, was called for, and were accordingly read. The opposers of this claim acknowledged the distressed situation of the petitioner, but denied the justice of her claim upon the United States; the treaty which Mr. de Neufville proposed to enter into with Mr. Lee, they supposed, was a treaty which he believed would prove beneficial to his country, and not to the United States: that there were many claims in our own country from persons who had been injured by the war, the justice of which was less equivocal, and the distress at least equal. Mr. NICHOLAS said, a few days ago only, a poor man, whose health had been so much impaired in the war, that he was unable to earn his living, had applied to him to bring his case before Congress, yet, as the pension law affords no relief to any person, except he had been wounded, he was obliged to inform him that he could do nothing for him. There were multitudes of such instances, equally distressing with the present, to which no relief could be afforded.

Mr. THATCHER moved to have the three thousand dollars struck out, and five inserted. This was negatived—45 to 37; but the resolution was agreed to as reported—yeas 63, nays 25, as follows:

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. PARKER, Mr. COOPER, Mr. EGE, and Mr. WADSWORTH, do prepare and bring in the same.

SON, Mr. PARKER, Mr. COOPER, Mr. EGE, and Mr. WADSWORTH, do prepare and bring in the same.

TUESDAY, February 14.

JOHN DE NEUFVILLE.

Mr. MADISON reported a bill granting certain sums of money to the widow and children of the late John de Neufville, which was twice read, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for this day. The House, on motion of Mr. HARPER, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject; when

Mr. THATCHER said, as the widow had been at very considerable expense in the journey to this city to make her claim, and as this expense would wholly fall upon her, it would put her in a worse situation than her children (for the bill proposed 1,000 dollars to each.) He moved, therefore, that 1,000 should be struck out, and two inserted, for the widow.

This amendment was negatived, there being only 23 votes in favor of it. An attempt was made to add 200 to the 1,000 for the widow, but it was also unsuccessful.

The Committee rose, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. HARPER proposed a resolution to the House directing that the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred the bills on the subject of direct taxes, should be discharged, in order that they might go to the same Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the proposition respecting indirect taxes, that both subjects might come under consideration at the same time. The motion was objected to, as it was said the two things were in different stages, the one being in a bill, and the other merely a proposition, and that it would not be proper to embarrass the discussion of the bill, by the proposition alluded to, since the advantages of one or the other mode could be shown without such a connexion. The motion was negatived.

EXPORTATION OF SHIP-TIMBER.

Mr. W. SMITH said, it must be acknowledged of great importance that the large ship-timber growing in this country should be kept out of the hands of foreigners, as, at some future day, we might have occasion for it for our own use. He wished, therefore, to lay a resolution on the table relative to this subject. He proposed one to the following effect:

“Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of ship-timber of certain dimensions.”

Ordered to lie on the table.

HUGH LAWSON WHITE.

Mr. A. JACKSON moved that the unfinished business be postponed, for the purpose of going into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee on the petition of Hugh Lawson White and the report of the Secretary of War thereon.

H. OF R.]

Duties on Distilled Spirits.

[FEBRUARY, 1797.]

Mr. CORR wished to know what was to become of the appropriation bill. He thought it was proper they should go into that.

Mr. W. SMITH said he consented to a postponement of that subject until the information which had been called for from the Secretary of State, relative to a certain item, had been obtained, which, without that information, might occasion considerable debate, and which, with it, he trusted, would pass without opposition. He alluded to the fifty thousand dollars for the prosecution of the claims for spoiliations committed on American vessels by the British.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the petition of Hugh Lawson White, Mr. DENT in the Chair. The report, which was a very long one, was read. The subject was in relation to the expedition of Gen'l Sevier into the Cherokee nation in the year 1793. The report, which proposed that provision should be made by law for paying the expense, was agreed to without debate, and was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, to be introduced in the appropriations for the expenditure of 1797.

DUTIES ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. W. SMITH moved that the House go into a Committee of the Whole on the bill repealing in part the act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, passed May 8, 1792, and imposing certain duties on the capacity of stills of a particular description. The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole accordingly; Mr. DENT in the Chair.

This bill proposes to repeal so much of the present act as allowed stills at any other place than a city, town, or village, or at any distillery in a city, town, or village, at which there are one or more stills, which singly, if only one, or together, if more than one, were of less capacity than four hundred gallons, the option of paying a duty of seven cents a gallon, and to direct, in lieu thereof, certain sums to be paid according to the capacity of stills, and according to the time taken out, from one month to six months.

Mr. KITCHELL wished to know the precise meaning of the word village; he did not know whether two or three houses lying together were to be considered as a village, or what number of houses were necessary to form one. He objected to the whole of the bill, as, instead of being of service to the revenue, he believed it would be an injury to it. He thought if the duty was laid upon the gallon in every instance, a much larger revenue would be raised than at present; for he believed that many who paid a duty according to the capacity of their stills, did not pay one-half of what they would otherwise pay. To lay the tax upon the capacity of the stills might diminish the trouble of collection; but he believed it reduced the revenue. In order to try the principle, he would therefore move to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the gentleman's objection to the word "village," came rather late, as the expression "city, town, or village," had been used in all the laws passed upon this subject. He believed the expression was well understood both by the revenue officers and the public, and it was not therefore necessary to go into a definition of it. The Secretary of the Treasury had given it as his opinion, that, so far from reducing the revenue, it would considerably augment it. The objections against this regulation arose, he believed, from an idea that it would be injurious to small stills; but, he had received information from the supervisor of his district, that, instead of being injurious, it would be beneficial to them. Mr. S. said, he thought the principle of this bill had been agreed to, and was surprised, therefore, that a motion was made to strike out the first section. He hoped the gentleman would consent to let the bill be proceeded with, as it was probable that such amendments might take place as would render it more acceptable than it might at present appear.

Mr. DAYTON hoped that his colleague would withdraw his motion for striking out the first section, that opportunity might be given to amend the bill in such a manner as to afford not only protection, but encouragement to the numerous small distilleries throughout the country. This valuable purpose, Mr. D. said, might be attained by the amendments and alterations which he should propose to be made in the second section, as soon as it could be done consistently with their rules of order. If his propositions should not meet the approbation of a majority, it would still be in the power of all those members who united in the wish to preserve the small distilleries, to reject the bill, and in that case he should join them readily in doing so.

Mr. KITCHELL withdrew his motion for striking out the first section; and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole having read the second section,

Mr. DAYTON said that he should offer an amendment in that place, which would ascertain with certainty whether the destruction or preservation of the country distilleries was the object, and would be the effect, of the bill. As it stood at that moment, their discouragement and ruin was inevitable; for it deprived them of the option they had heretofore enjoyed, of paying either upon the capacity or by the gallon, and held out to them no equivalent advantage. So far was it from compensating them for the privation of that privilege, that, on the other hand, he found in the latter part of the same section a provision which compelled them to commence every license with the beginning of some calendar month; and thus rendered their situation far more discouraging than it was at that moment. He should therefore, when they came to that part, move to strike out the words following, viz: "And all licenses as aforesaid shall commence and bear date from the beginning of some calendar month." But, as preparatory thereto, and as a compensation to small distilleries for being deprived of the option, he should first move to insert the words "for and during the term of two weeks," for the purpose of admitting the possessors of such stills

FEBRUARY, 1797.]

Duties on Distilled Spirits.

[H. OF R.]

to take out a license for that short term, if they thought proper. It was well known that the existing laws did not admit of any license to be taken out for a shorter term than one month. Distillers, therefore, who had materials to employ them for two weeks only, were compelled to pay for four weeks, or to pay, at their option, seven cents for each gallon distilled. If deprived of this choice, they would have reason for complaint, unless permitted to enter for less time than a month. He was sensible that many advantages would be derived from the abolition of the duty upon the gallon distilled, and not the least, would be the greater facility and certainty in the collection of revenue from this source, the diminution of the number of oaths already too much multiplied, and the exoneration of the people from the most odious part of the provisions, viz: the frequent visits and inspections of the officers of Government. Although these benefits were acknowledged, they could fortunately be secured to the public, without injury to the distilleries of fruit, or any other materials. They might even be protected and encouraged, and the revenue from them improved, and he trusted that the amendments he had proposed would establish the fact, that those two objects were perfectly consistent and attainable.

Mr. W. SMITH wished a Letter, which had been received from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject, to be read. It was read accordingly.

Mr. GALLATIN was in favor of the amendment proposed. The Letter, which had been read, was written to him, in answer to some inquiries which he had made on this subject of the Secretary of the Treasury. The object of this bill, he said, was, in the first place, to secure a due collection of the revenue at less expense than it at present costs; in the second, to prevent an evasion of the duty; and, in the third, to remove one of the most important objections to the tax.

It tended to secure a due collection of the revenue at less expense, by taking away those provisions which furnished an apology to collectors for not settling their accounts, or placing them in such a state as to prevent their being settled. Gentlemen might say the duty was well collected at present, and that the accounts were well settled; they gave this as their opinion; but, when they had proof of the contrary from official facts, those assertions could have little weight. In order to show the magnitude of the evil, he would refer to the last official statement made to them in December last, which contained the last accounts made by the supervisors. By this statement it would be seen how far the supervisors were able to bring these collectors to account. It would be noticed that the States of Vermont and New York were the only States whose accounts were settled up to December, 1795; the States of Connecticut and Georgia were settled up to September 30, 1795; the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Delaware, North and South Carolina, were settled to the 30th of June, 1795; the State of Virginia to the 30th June, 1794; the State of New Jersey was only brought up to the 31st of March, 1793; and the State of Pennsylvania had not settled at all. In addition to which, in Kentucky, Tennessee, and the Northwestern Territory, the tax had not been even mentioned.

This, he said, was the situation of the revenue at present. The supervisors found it impossible to bring the collectors to account. The fault was in the law itself. Distillers in the country took advantage of the option which was allowed them of paying by the gallon. This was always the pretence, and sometimes the true reason, why the collectors did not make their returns. In a scattered country like America, collectors could not come at the quantity of gallons distilled by every individual; but if the duty was laid by means of a license on the still, according to its capacity, it would be easy to collect the duty, to have the accounts settled, and for the Treasury to check those accounts. No pretence could then be made for not settling the accounts regularly.

The next consideration was, the evasion of the duty. This arose from some individuals, and many, not returning their accounts as they should do; some could not do it; and not a few gave in false accounts. In respect to large distilleries in the country having the option of taking out a license, and of paying fifty-four cents per gallon on the capacity of their stills, no one, except they wished to defraud the revenue, would desire to pay by the gallon; and if the amendment was agreed to, the same remark would apply to small distillers; for, it would be found so much easier and advantageous to pay by license, than by the gallon, that no one, except he intended to defraud the revenue, would choose to pay by the gallon. The present rate of ten cents per month per gallon would in some cases be more than the duty would amount to, if paid by the gallon, as some stills were not employed more than half the time; but the proposed amendment would remove that objection; and though less duty would be paid by some individuals than they heretofore paid, as all evasion would be prevented, the revenue would be increased. It was true, that when they took off one advantage, they must give another; if they gave small distillers the option of taking out a license for a fortnight, they should give the larger distillers the option of taking out a license for two, three, or four months. It was the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury that the licenses for a month should be increased from ten to twenty cents; but he thought differently. He hoped the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey would prevail, and then he should afterwards propose to fill up the blanks of licenses for a month with ten cents; for two months with eighteen; for three months with twenty-four; for four months with thirty; for five months with thirty-six; and for six months with forty-two cents per gallon. This scale, he said, was on the same ground with that which was proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury; except that he had changed the two estimates for a month and for a year. They might now be thought too low, and to give too great advantage to small stills. In the opinion of the Treasury they did; but if, upon an experiment, it was found to be so, the rates might be augmented hereafter.

Finally, he believed these regulations would remove some of the strongest objections to the law itself. These objections were well known to be the reluctance which men felt to have their houses searched and conduct watched, when they were in the pursuit of their honest occupations. These objections would be wholly removed. A person would take a license for any term he chose, and there would be an end of the business. He would neither be obliged to keep an account nor to make a return; neither would there be any visiting of officers to inspect his conduct in carrying on his business.

Mr. G. said, it was of importance to remove these objections; particularly as the law had not extended to the parts he had mentioned, and as it was desirable the laws should operate equally and satisfactorily throughout the Union. He hoped, therefore, the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey would be agreed to, and that the bill would pass.

Mr. NICHOLAS was satisfied an alteration was necessary in the present law to make it tolerable and equal. He had heard, from an intelligent collector, that there were distillers who made their spirits double proof, and then turned them over to another person to retail them out, who brought them down to the common standard, by this means paying only one-half the tax. And yet, though this practice was known, it could not be remedied, according to the present law, because the spirits were out of the hands of the distiller.

He was satisfied that no tax should be so laid as to injure the manufactory upon which it fell; and it appeared to him that the very existence of this law would depend on the acceptance of this amendment. He had, indeed, thought of a different way of regulating the business, but perhaps the one proposed might be as well. He thought that if a license should be taken out for a term, and it was not wanted for the whole time, a deduction should be made for the difference. He said he was perfectly satisfied with the general modification; but, if the amendment should not prevail, it would operate injuriously upon small distilleries. He therefore trusted it would be agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON hoped the amendment would obtain. After rainy months, the fruit washed from the trees could not be distilled within a month from which a license was taken. The bill would go to diminish the revenue; besides, it would be extremely unpopular, which would produce an evasion of the law, and the duties would be less. Indeed, without the addition, it could not be agreed to.

The question was put, and carried unanimously. The blanks were afterwards filled up with the rates Mr. GALLATIN had mentioned, and with six cents for licenses for two weeks.

Mr. DAYTON then moved to strike out the words "and all licenses, as aforesaid, shall commence and bear date from the beginning of some calendar month."

The fourth section of the bill having been read, Mr. HARPER thought it would be proper to amend the latter part of the clause, which was as follows:

"And every owner or possessor of any still, who shall not have taken out a license for at least — months during the six months preceding the first days of January and July, in each year, shall be chargeable with, and shall pay a duty equal to, that demandable for a license for six months, unless such owner or possessor shall make oath or affirmation that no spirits have been distilled in his still during any time for which a license has not been previously obtained:"

by adding betwixt the words "any still" and "who shall" the words "in a state of preparation for distilling." This alteration, he said, would make the oath proposed unnecessary, and he was very much against multiplying oaths, as they held out strong temptations to dishonesty and perjury.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) rose to state an objection which presented itself to his mind against the latter part of this section. He might possibly misunderstand the duty therein enjoined, and he hoped, if he did, that the committee who reported the bill would explain and set him right. It appeared to him, Mr. D. said, to intend and require that the owner or possessor of every still which had been unemployed for six months should make oath or affirmation that no spirits had been distilled in his still during any time for which a license had not been previously obtained, or be subject to a considerable penalty. Cases might and would frequently arise in which it would be highly improper and unjust to impose such an oath. He instanced those in particular where stills should be sold and transferred from one person to another, and perhaps through many hands, whilst they were unemployed, and of course unlicensed. How was it possible, Mr. D. asked, for the man who has possessed it for a few weeks or a few days to take such an oath, especially if, as might happen, the former owners were not even known to him? If no explanation should be given from the committee nor any amendment made that should be satisfactory, he should think it his duty to move to strike out the whole of the last sentence or clause.

Mr. KITCHELL said, he had great objection to the clause as it stood, but he had a greater to the alteration proposed. He also was against multiplying oaths, if any better mode could be pointed out of preventing frauds; but, if the present amendment took place, it would only be necessary to strike off the cap from a still and carry it into the cellar, and then it would not be in a state of preparation for distilling. He wished gentlemen who brought in the bill would consider the matter, and propose some amendment to this clause.

Mr. ISAAC SMITH thought the matter might be rectified, by obliging the person who sold a still to give notice thereof to the Inspector, with the person to whom he sold it.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he understood that part of the section which related to an oath to apply to the time during which a man was owner and possessor of a still. If a still was transferred, a person would be answerable for the duty only whilst in his possession; but if it was thought the expression was not sufficiently clear, it might be made more so by adding, between the words "in his still" "and during," "whilst he has been owner of the same."

FEBRUARY, 1797.]

[H. OF R.]

Mr. NICHOLAS said it was necessary that some alteration should take place in the clause.

Mr. DAYTON said, that being by no means satisfied with any of the explanations or amendments that had been offered, and believing that it would be very improper to retain such a clause, he should, as he had before given notice, move to strike out the following, viz: "and every owner or possessor of any still who shall not have taken out a license for at least — months during the six months preceding the first days of January and July, in each year, shall be chargeable with, and shall pay a duty equal to, that demandable on a license for six months, unless such owner or possessor shall make oath or affirmation that no spirits have been distilled in his still during any time for which a license had not been previously obtained."

The Committee then rose, the amendments were agreed to in the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

ACCOUNTS OF RECEIVERS.

Mr. W. SMITH moved for the order of the day on the bill to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and the Receivers of Public Money, and the House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on that subject, and having gone through the same, the Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

ACCOMMODATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SITGREAVES, from the joint committee appointed to consider if any, and what, measures should be adopted for the further accommodation of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, for the term commencing on the 4th of March next, reported a resolution authorizing the PRESIDENT to cause to be sold such part of the furniture presented to him on his coming into office as may be decayed and out of repair, and that $14,000, together with the proceeds of such sale, be presented to him. The report was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

The following Communication was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you an official statement of the expenditure to the end of the year 1796, from the sums heretofore granted to defray the contingent charges of the Government.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 15, 1797.

The Message and statement were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A bill for granting a sum of money to the widow of John De Neufville, was read a third time and passed.

The bill for providing more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and the Receivers of Public Moneys, was read the third time and passed.

A letter was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a report from the Secretary of War, requesting that an appropriation may be passed to make good the appropriations in the Military Department for the year 1796, of $201,312. Laid on the table.

DUTY ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The bill for repealing in part the act for laying a duty on spirits distilled within the United States, and for imposing in its stead certain duties on the capacity of stills, was read the third time, when—

Mr. NEW called for the yeas and nays on the passing of the bill.

Mr. LOCKE hoped the bill would not pass. He thought it bad policy to change laws, except considerable advantage could be derived from it. No consequence could arise from the proposed change, he said, except it were to irritate the minds of the people against Government. It was said it would increase the revenue; but he believed it would reduce it, as it would render useless many stills. Farmers who had stills for the purpose of distilling their surplus grain wished to do it at their leisure, as their cattle required it. Some of those who paid seven cents per gallon, he said, paid double what was paid by those who paid according to the capacity of their stills, but it was more convenient for them to do so. He was surprised to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] offer it as a reason for altering the method for laying the duty, that the excise officers had delayed to make due returns; that, he said, was owing to the roguery of the officers, and not to any fault in the distillers. He also observed that many parts of the United States were so thinly inhabited as to make it inconvenient for officers to collect the duty. Admitting that this were the case, (though it would only happen in few instances,) was it not, he asked, as reasonable that officers who were well paid for their service should rather be put to that trouble than the distillers themselves, which would be the case if they were obliged to take out a license? That gentleman had also observed that no man, as the law now stood, would have chosen to pay by the gallon, but such as designed to defraud the revenue. He knew that his assertion was not true. He himself kept a still for his own family, and had always paid by the gallon; but if this bill passed, he would not distil at all, and he believed many others would come to the same resolution. He should, therefore, vote against the passing of the bill.

The yeas and nays were taken, and stood—yeas 57, noes 19, as follows:

It was then

Resolved, That the title of the said bill be, 'An act repealing, in part, the 'Act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States,' passed the eighth of May one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two; and imposing certain duties on the capacity of stills of a particular description.'

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HARPER, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution from the Senate, proposing to authorize the PRESIDENT to make inquiry of certain States, whether they concurred in the amendment to the Constitution which had been submitted to them, with respect to the suability of States, reported that on 4th March, 1789, the United States, being then thirteen in number, twelve amendments were submitted by Congress to the different States, ten of which were ratified in 1789 and 1790 by nine States out of thirteen, which number not being three-fourths of the then existing States, those ten amendments did not then become part of the Constitution, one State being still wanted. The report went on to state further particulars, and concluded with proposing that as some of the States might have since ratified the whole or a part of those amendments, though such ratification had not been received, to reject the resolution from the Senate, and to adopt one to the following effect:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to make application, as speedily as may be, to all those States, who, as far as can be known by official documents, have not ratified the said twelve amendments to the Constitution which were submitted to them, to learn whether any of them have been ratified, or what proceedings have been had thereon."

Ordered to be printed.

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GALLATIN said, they had had an estimate presented to them this morning, requesting a deficiency to be made good in the Military Department, to the amount of $201,312. This estimate, he said, was made to them under three items, a fortnight only before the dissolution of Congress. He thought it should have been sent to them sooner, and more in detail. In order to obtain some further information on the subject, he proposed a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement in detail of the item respecting the military service, which, in his estimate of the tenth instant, he states at one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars; and also a statement in detail of the expenditure and application of money appropriated by law for the Military Establishment of the year 1796, from whence have resulted the deficiencies by him stated in his estimate, of forty four thousand one hundred twenty-two and thirty-two thousand dollars."

Mr. W. SMITH wished to know whether he meant to decline appropriating money for the Military Establishment, until he received this information.

Mr. GALLATIN said he had no objection against voting for the appropriations for the Military Establishment for the year 1797; whether he received the details called for, or not; but he would not vote for the deficiency stated, until the details were received. He did not think he should be justified in voting for this estimated deficiency, until he knew how it had been expended—until he knew how far he was bound to do it. It had no connexion whatever with the appropriation for the year 1797.

The SPEAKER said, he received this communication on Saturday whilst in a Committee of the Whole, and thought he had given it to the Clerk to be read, but found it upon his table this morning, so that the delay since Saturday was owing to him.

The resolution was agreed to.

SALARIES OF COLLECTORS.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill relative to the compensations and duties of certain officers employed in the collection of impost and tonnage. The bill having been read, and the first section being under consideration, which allows to the collectors of the district of Pennsylvania and New York one quarter per cent.; to those of Boston, Charleston, and Baltimore, one half per cent., and to other ports in proportion—

Mr. DEARBORN said, the compensations arising to the Collectors in some of the principal ports, was beyond measure exorbitant; he believed, after all deductions were made, they amounted from 8 to 10,000 dollars. He could see no good reason why the salaries of these officers should not be fixed by law. At present, though their duties were certainly not so important, they received two or three times as much as Heads of Departments, considerably more than even the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States. When they had determined not to increase the salaries of the principal officers of the Government, even during the present high price of living, he thought they ought not to allow such extravagant compensations to their collectors.

Salaries of Collectors.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. THATCHER thought they were legislating in the dark. Before they entered upon the business, he wished to have seen a return of the real amount of duties collected during the last year. In order to give time for the obtaining of this information, he wished the committee to rise.

Mr. VARNUM was of the same opinion. He said accounts had been received from all the ports except New York, and that they might be soon expected.

Mr. SWANWICK said, there had been a return for 1795, which the committee had judged as proper a guide as that for 1796 would be. It was the intention of the committee to reduce the compensation of the officers in the large ports, who, they believed, received too much, and to increase those in the small ports, who they were convinced received too little.

Mr. S. SMITH also said, 1795 would be a better foundation for them to estimate upon than 1796, as it might be supposed that the importations in 1797, owing to the obstructions which commerce was likely to meet with, would be much less than in 1796. If the committee were to rise, he believed the law would not get passed, and the old law would continue, which would be a loss to Government of 15 or 20,000 dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS wished to wait for the return of 1796.

Mr. CORT said, it would be necessary to regulate these salaries every two or three years, as trade was continually fluctuating.

Mr. CRAIK was against the committee's rising, as it would probably put an end to the business for this session, and he thought it was very desirable that the large salaries should be reduced, and the small ones advanced.

Mr. PARKER was for proceeding with the business. It was well known some of the compensations were too high, and others too low. He mentioned amongst the latter the small port of Tappahannoc, the Collector of which by the return in 1795, was sixty-eight dollars in debt.

Mr. DEARBORN said, as it was only two years since this business was arranged, he did not think there was much necessity for going into it now; and though some of the compensations were low, he did not believe any of those who held the offices could be induced to give them up; and if they were, there would be twenty persons ready for them. If it were not, therefore, for taking off something from what he considered as enormous sums from the officers in the large ports, he should be willing to let the business lie over this session. He could wish a resolution to the following effect to be agreed to for this purpose, in preference to the mode proposed by the bill:

"Resolved, That from and after the present year, the Collectors of Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, Boston, and Charleston, be allowed ——— dollars, per annum, in place of their present compensation."

Mr. New hoped the committee would not rise. His colleague [Mr. PARKER] had mentioned the case of an officer in Virginia, at Tappahannoc, with which he was somewhat acquainted. In the year 1795, he was brought in upwards of sixty dollars in debt. The return from that officer for the last year was for disbursements five hundred sixty-nine dollars and ninety cents, and receipts three hundred and fifty-five dollars. He doubted therefore whether, when this gentleman gave up his situation, if there would be twenty persons ready for it.

The question for the committee's rising was put, and negatived.

The consideration of the first section was then taken up, and upon an inquiry what was the compensation of the large ports under the present law,

Mr. CORT said, that New York and Philadelphia had before three-eighths of one per cent., and Boston, Baltimore, and Charleston, five-eighths of one per cent.

After a number of observations from different members, this, and the other clauses of the bill, were agreed to, with some small amendments.

After which, Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) moved an additional section, appointing a Surveyor for New Brunswick, in Jersey, to reside there; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEWALL moved also an additional section, providing that Marblehead should be a port at which vessels arriving from beyond the Cape of Good Hope may enter and unload; which was agreed to.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

THURSDAY, February 16.

EXPENSES OF FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

A report was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, in conformity to the resolution of the 9th and 10th instant, with statements of the expenditure of money appropriated for defraying the expenses attending our Foreign Intercourse, and of the money applied for the purpose of prosecuting the claims of our merchants for redress for the spoliation committed upon their property by belligerent Powers, in which report it was stated that there was a deficiency in the accounts of Mr. Randolph, the late Secretary. Referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLATIN also moved that the statement of deficiencies in the contingent expenses received yesterday should be referred to the same committee. Agreed to.

JUDGE TURNER.

The SPEAKER presented a petition from Judge Turner, of the Northwestern Territory, wishing that the charges which had been exhibited against him should be brought to a hearing, as he had come up to the Seat of Government with a view of defending himself. Ordered to lie upon the table.

BALANCES DUE FROM STATES.

The House then took up the amendment of the Senate to the resolution respecting the balances due from certain States to the United States, and having read the resolution, which proposes, instead of calling upon the several debtor States for the whole amount reported by the Commissioners to be due, to call upon them only for the sum which they had assumed over and above what proved to be their real demand against the United States; which, of course went wholly to excuse some of the debtor States—

Mr. WILLIAMS observed, that when this subject was before the House it was fully discussed, and it would only be taking up time unnecessarily to enter on the subject again. As he heard nothing to change his former opinion, he continued to think the debt, so far as it respected the State of New York, was unfounded; it therefore mattered not to him whether the amendment proposed by the Senate was agreed to or not. Although by the amendment, only a part (said to be due) was called for, yet the debtor States were not by that amendment exonerated from paying the whole; and, therefore, were the debtor States to make provision agreeably to the amendment proposed by the Senate, they might be afterwards called on for the remainder, as, by paying a part, they would tacitly acknowledge the whole to be just.

The motion was negatived, and the House resolved to insist upon the resolution as it stood originally.

JOHN C. SYMMES.

Mr. GALLATIN said, a report had been made upon the contract between John C. Symmes and his associates, and the United States, which it was of importance to pass into a law this session, as the object was four hundred thousand acres of land, which was worth about eight hundred thousand dollars.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, when the report, which was very long, having been read, the Committee agreed to the resolution reported, which was in the following words:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to authorize the President of the United States to grant, in fee simple, to John C. Symmes and his associates, that part of a tract of land, the boundaries whereof are ascertained by a survey executed in conformity to the act of Congress, entitled ‘An act for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by J. C. Symmes,’ and returned to the Treasury Department the 10th of January, 1794, which is not included within the bounds of a grant already made, on September 8, 1794, to the said J. C. Symmes and his associates; excepting and reserving out of the same the lots reserved by the original contract, entered into between the United States and the said Symmes and his associates; provided that the said Symmes and his associates shall previously, in conformity to the terms of the original contract, make the requisite payment for the tract to be granted to them, and for the 47,625 acres, part of the grant already made to them on the 30th September, 1794, for which they have not yet paid any consideration; and provided, also, that the township reserved for an Academy shall have been previously laid off and secured, according to the terms of the contract, and of the resolutions and law of Congress relative thereto.”

A committee of five was appointed, viz: Messrs. GALLATIN, VENABLE, HAVENS, AMES, and SHERBURNE.

INDIRECT TAXES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject of indirect taxes, when the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the resolutions of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HENDERSON,] and those of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HARPER,] having been read—

Mr. HARPER said, that having on a former occasion gone pretty much at length into observations to prove the superiority of indirect taxes to a land tax for this country, he should not now repeat them, but confine himself to the other branch of the subject.

On the occasion alluded to, he had gone into a calculation of the present amount of the duties arising from the several articles upon which he had proposed an advance, and compared that amount with preceding years, in order to show that the revenue upon them was in an increasing state, and that they would of course bear a small advance. As these observations depended on a statement of figures, which might not be well remembered, he would take the liberty of recapitulating them, and then proceed with some observations in favor of indirect taxes. [Mr. H. here went over his estimates with respect to the present amount of duties on the several articles, the duty upon which he meant to advance, and the probable addition which would be likely to arise from the proposed additions, in the course of which he was reminded of the question by Mr. S. SMITH and Mr. HOLLAND, but desired to proceed by the Chairman.]

Mr. H. having gone through his statement, said, in order to put our revenue in some degree beyond the reach of foreign Powers to disturb it, it was necessary to connect the two systems of indirect and direct taxes together; and the more he saw, the more he was impressed with the propriety of this—so much so, that if the House should not think proper to adopt a window or stamp tax, if no member proposed an effectual substitute for them, he should think it necessary to adopt a land tax, even if all the indirect taxes were agreed to which he had offered. He thought the money would be better raised by a stamp and window tax; but, should the House not be of this opinion, he should vote for a land tax, because he thought it of unspeakable importance to have some effectual revenue which should be out of the reach of any foreign Power.

With respect to the window tax, it had been objected to as a very odious and a very impolitic tax; that it had been very unpopular wherever it had been introduced, and that, in all probability, it would be alike objectionable in this country. He thought differently. In England it might have been so, because any new tax, where the people were so heavily burdened as in England, would prove unpopular. He was of opinion that the tax might be so laid as to become a very equal and acceptable tax.

Indirect Taxes.

The objects to be aimed at in taxation, he said, were, that a tax should fall equally, and be easy of collection. Where these two properties were combined, the tax must be a good one. He believed that a tax on windows would answer this description, as there was generally a proportion between a man's expenses and the number of windows in his house; and by graduating the tax, it would fall equally on the community at large. A tax, he said, should not fall upon a man in proportion to his capital, but according to his expenses. A man might possess a great capital, and yet not possess equal means with the man of a small capital. A man, for instance, might possess a great capital in land, but it might be in such a situation as not to be saleable, or too far removed from market to be profitable. This kind of property, he said, did not enable a man to pay taxes; but, if a man's expenses were considered, his ability to pay taxes would be discovered. There might be some exceptions; indeed, some men would spend more from vanity, and some less from avarice, than they ought, but he believed the rule would hold good in general. But, if a tax was laid ad valorem, there was great difficulty in ascertaining the just value of property; whereas, to enumerate the windows of a house, would be done with little trouble and expense, and without any intrusion into a man's house, which was an objection to a hearth tax, as it required such visits as would be disagreeable to the citizens of a free country. A window tax would have this further advantage: if laid at first for $250,000, it might afterwards be made to produce as much as the people were able to pay, without additional expense. He therefore preferred a window tax to a land tax, because more easily laid, and to a hearth tax, because it might be imposed without domiciliary visits.

Various objections, he said, had been made to a stamp tax. In the first place, it was said to be a very odious tax; but our dislike to a stamp tax arose, not because the tax was really objectionable, but because it had been attempted to be laid upon us by a foreign Power, which had not the right to lay it. Any other tax which that Power might have attempted to impose upon us would have proved equally odious; but, he said, the American people had sense enough to distinguish between a tax laid by their own Government, and the same tax forced upon them by a foreign Power. Another objection to this tax was, that it would require certain regulations to be made in the Courts of the different States in the Union, as it would be necessary to enact that no paper should be admitted as evidence which was not duly stamped. It might be asked, what power they had to do this? He said there could be no doubt that they had the power, as the State Courts and Judges were equally bound, by the laws of Congress, with the Courts and Judges of the United States, and there could be no doubt that the law would be cheerfully complied with. With respect to another objection, it required a good deal of consideration; but he doubted not it might be provided against by certain modifications in a bill, if the tax should be agreed to. It was this: that persons in remote parts of the country, unused to make their contracts in a formal way, but who applied to their neighbors to do it, and who did it in a clumsy and imperfect manner—to say that all these papers should be subject to a stamp duty, would lay such persons under the necessity of applying to an attorney to furnish them with stamps, and to do the business for them. This, he acknowledged, would be embarrassing persons so situated, without greatly benefitting the revenue: but it would be possible to make provisions to exclude contracts of a certain description, so as to prevent this inconvenience.

Mr. H. hoped, therefore, that these two modes of revenue would be agreed to, which, together with the augmentations he had proposed to the imposts, would furnish a sufficiency of revenue for every purpose of Government. If the House, however, should think a land tax preferable, he should submit.

In conclusion of these remarks, he would add what induced him to be less decided in favor of indirect sources than heretofore. At the end of four years, another augmentation of revenue will be necessary, either by indirect or direct taxes. He doubted, therefore, whether it would not be better at present to have recourse to direct taxes, and leave the imposts for our future support. At that time, he said, after four years' further experience, they should be better able to judge of what our commerce would afford, than at present; and he trusted we should be relieved at that time from any anxiety with respect to our foreign relations.

Another consideration was, that, though imposts were eventually paid by the people, yet merchants were obliged to pay the duties in the first instance. He knew the credit given to them in some cases was so liberal as to give them time to receive the duties before they were called upon to pay them. In such instances, the merchant was only a security to Government. But, though this was the case in some degree, it was not wholly so; and where it was not so, the merchant was the lender of the money to Government. Now, there might be situations, he said, in which merchants would not be able to do this. If, for instance, any part of the capital of our merchants be kept from them in foreign countries; or if, by any sudden fall in the price of produce, they have experienced heavy losses, and were otherwise pressed in their concerns, it might not be prudent to call upon them for an addition to the present duties. It was for them to determine how far our merchants were at present in this situation. He believed the amount of their property, at this time, in the hands of foreign Powers, was not less than twelve millions of dollars.

These considerations, he said, had had great weight with him in making him less confident in resources from indirect means. He supposed they would also have some weight with the House. He finished, by saying, that he trusted the Committee would pardon him for the time he had occupied, though he perceived the patience of some individuals had long been exhausted.

Mr. SWANWICK said, considerable embarrassment arose from the manner in which this subject had been introduced. They had directed the Committee of Ways and Means to report such articles of impost as would bear an additional duty. They had made a report of three, viz: brown sugar, bohea tea, and unstained cotton goods. Besides these, gentlemen had introduced a long string of other articles. The consequence, he said, had been, that the gentleman who had just sat down had not confined himself to any one article, but had extended his view to the whole, and had afterwards taken in his proposition for a tax on windows and stamps, and finished with a sort of preference for direct taxes.

Mr. S. said, he thought he saw an unwillingness in the Committee that so wide a field should be taken; he should, therefore, confine his observations to the first resolution before them, viz: brown sugar, any advance of the duty upon which, he should certainly oppose, for the following reasons:

In the first place, he considered all taxes upon articles of consumption as operating unequally; for, in spite of all that had been said about the duties falling upon the consumer, they fell very unequally upon different classes; since a poor man, in many instances, paid as much as a rich man; whereas, it was his opinion, that all taxes should fall upon men according to their ability to pay them—according to their real possessions; but, he said, in this case, a niggardly man pays too little, and a liberal man too much. But, Mr. S. said, there was another objection to the proposed additional duty on brown sugar; it was a necessary of life very generally used by the poor, the duty would, therefore, fall chiefly upon a class of the community least able to bear it. Tea, sweetened with brown sugar, he believed, was as general and as economical a breakfast as could be taken by the poor in large cities, since milk could only be had at a high price, whilst the farmer could do very well with a much smaller portion of sugar. Would it, then, be fair, or consonant with the principles of a Republican Government, he asked, thus to burden the poor of the community? He thought not.

But, it might be said, the poor man might add this additional duty paid on sugar to his labor; but this would be increasing an evil already too great, and from which cause the manufactures and agriculture of this country, at present, languished, and which would effectually destroy all the former, if further increased.

Nor was it by any means certain, Mr. S. said, that this increase of duty would produce an increase of revenue. Much less, he said, from the difficulties which were thrown in the way of our commerce, was at present imported, than heretofore; therefore, it would not follow, that because this article now produced three hundred thousand dollars, that, by laying fifty per cent. upon it, it would produce half as much more; for, as Dean Swift had justly said, two and two does not always make four in custom-house calculations. If it were so, nothing would be more easy than for a financier to calculate the certainty of revenue. The mines of Potosi, nor any other, would be equal to such means of raising money; but he believed the duties on imposts had gone as far as they could reasonably be carried.

He was not convinced that an additional duty upon brown sugar would not do an essential injury to the manufacture of refined sugar. They had seen, by a report which had been made the other day on the petition of a manufacturer of chocolate, that the article of cocoa produced more duty when it only paid two cents than now it paid four. The reason was obvious, when at two cents, the manufacture of chocolate was considerable; but since it was four, that manufacture had been considerably injured. And how, he asked, would an additional duty on brown sugar operate in this respect? Would it not cause a greater export of the raw sugar, and consequently a greater drawback to be paid, and discourage the manufacture of fine sugar? It certainly would have that effect. Whoever would look into the last report on this subject, would find that thirty-four millions pounds weight of raw sugar had been exported in the course of one year. An additional duty would have a tendency also to diminish the consumption by making the laborious poor substitute molasses in its stead.

As he had before stated, he should confine his observations at present to brown sugar; but when the other articles came under consideration, he should have some remarks to offer upon them.

Mr. GALLATIN, conceived the whole subject of indirect taxes to be before them, though the first resolution, respecting brown sugar, might be first in order.

Mr. G. said, he did not mean to follow the gentleman from South Carolina through the whole of his observations, with respect to the present or past produce of the duty upon this or that article, and infer from thence what an additional sum laid upon it would produce. That gentleman had twice already given them, in substance, the same account; it was unnecessary, therefore, to go over that ground again; yet, as he had given them a caution, which he ought himself rather to have observed, he would make an observation or two upon his statement.

Mr. G. here took some notice of what he conceived to be errors; at the same time that he acknowledged the gentleman deserved credit for the efforts he had made to become acquainted with the subject; that it was an extremely difficult one to come at with accuracy, and that the only conclusion he could draw was, that there were some articles the duty upon which might be increased, but to what amount could not be said.

Mr. G. said, he would fully agree with the gentleman that two of the articles which he had enumerated, might produce additional revenue from an increase of duty, viz: salt and sugar; but not in the proportion of the duty laid—to ascertain the amount, would require a different calculation from any which had been made.

When he rose, he said, he meant only to make a few observations, and to follow them with a motion for the Committee to rise, with a view of having it discharged from a further consideration of the subject. He meant to show that it was not necessary to increase the revenue by means of indirect taxes; at the same time, he would say that he had no expectation that the bill for laying a direct tax would pass this year. And he would go further, and say that he would not vote at all for the present bill as it now stood.

Indirect Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

He said, he would show that it was not necessary to raise any additional revenue for the present year. He had always said that the increase was wanted for 1801. The reason which seemed to induce the gentleman from South Carolina to be in favor of direct taxes, was, that, if revenue was now raised, there would be wanted a further advance in the year 1801. The truth was, that the revenue now wanted was for that year. If the fact was denied, he could call upon any gentleman to prove that the revenue of the present year will not be sufficient to meet the expenditure. They had received no estimate to this effect; nor had any hint been given from the Treasury of this kind.

Mr. G. said, he would mention the data upon which he grounded his opinion. If he should be mistaken in any particular, he hoped he should be put right.

He found that, during the present year, we had to pay an annuity on the foreign Dutch Debt, which, with the interest, would amount, he believed, though he could not state precisely, as he had not papers before him, to about three millions nine hundred thousand dollars. Now, said he, we have to add to this, the current expenses of the year, the total amount of which would be found, by the estimate, to be $2,130,852, to which must be placed the $40,000 annually appropriated for foreign intercourse not included in this estimate. These three items made about $6,100,000. Deduct from this sum a saving in the Naval and Military Establishments of at least $200,000; but, having yesterday received an estimate in the deficiency of contingent expenses of $200,000, he supposed, that one of these items would balance the other. If there were added to this sum $300,000, as an extraordinary sum for defraying the expense of intercourse with foreign nations, this would make a total of expense of about $6,400,000. In this estimate, it was true, that no provision was made for paying any instalment of debt. It went upon the supposition that money now due would continue to be due. The debts owing were the foreign debt due to Holland, and the debt due to the Banks; for the payment of the last of which they had last year provided, by empowering the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to borrow money at six per cent., and to sell our shares in Bank stock. The Bank stock had not been wholly sold, and therefore, if it were necessary to make any additional payment to the Bank, it might be made from that source; for, however great the wants of the Bank might have been, they had not thought proper to have more of the Bank shares sold, than to the amount of one million two hundred thousand dollars.

There was no other provision to be made but for the payment of the instalments of Foreign Debt, as they became due; and until the year 1801, these were from $160,000 to $400,000 a year. Supposing it to be the latter sum for this year, this would make the whole expense $6,800,000.

With respect to the revenue, whatever doubts might be entertained as to future imposts, there could be none as to what would become due this year, as these arose from the year 1796. The amount of revenue for 1796, commencing with October 1795, to the same month in 1796, was upwards of $6,800,000, viz:

For duties on imposts and tonnage	-	-	$6,135,000
For internal revenue	-	-	469,000
Postage	-	-	58,000
Interest on Bank stock, (deducting $10,000 on account of what had been sold)	-	-	150,000
			<hr/>

This, Mr. G. said, was the amount of the revenue for the year 1796, and receivable in 1797, from which it appeared that the revenue of 1797 would be at least equal to the expenses of that year. The only question was, would the revenue of 1797 be equal to that of 1796. They all knew there had been a great increase of importations. Besides, he said, some parts of the internal revenues would be more productive than heretofore, from regulations which had taken place in them. He mentioned wine licenses, auctions, and carriages. More than $150,000 additional would be received from these sources; so that, if the imposts fell short so much, the revenue would remain the same as at present.

If this statement were true, this conclusion arose, viz: that no additional revenue was wanted for the present expenses of Government this session. Whatever additional revenue was wanted, was wanted with a view to the demands of 1801, and the payment of the Public Debt. If, then, there was no immediate necessity for additional revenue, he thought it would be best not to do anything more this session than to endeavor to mature a permanent plan to be carried into effect at the next; and, therefore, that it would not be desirable to increase the duty upon any article of impost that any gentleman might, from, perhaps, whim or caprice, suggest, since this would afford no effectual source; for, said he, though we have sufficient evidence before us, that the revenue of 1797 will be equal to the expenditure, we have not sufficient information to convince us that any additional duty laid upon the articles proposed, will produce additional revenue. And, indeed, there was not time, during the present session, to determine upon any tax (if there should be a disposition to do it) such as had been proposed, on windows or stamps.

If, he said, there was an immediate want of money, and Government must stop if it was not procured, as a direct tax could not be laid this session so as to produce immediate revenue, he would have consented to an increase of duty on some articles of impost; but this was not the case.

H. OF R.]

Indirect Taxes.

[FEBRUARY, 1797.]

For these reasons, and in order, to give time to prepare the bill for laying a direct tax at the next session, when the subjects of direct and indirect taxes could be fully discussed, and that adopted which appeared best calculated to answer the wished-for end, that they might now go on and amend the bill for laying a direct tax, without passing it, he would move that the Committee rise, in order to be discharged from a further consideration of the subject.

Mr. BUCK said, it appeared now to be discovered that we had no occasion for additional revenue. It was unaccountable to him that this discovery was not made sooner. It would be recollected that, last session, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] undertook to show that there had been an augmentation of the debt to the amount of two millions, and uniformly pressed the necessity of going into a direct tax, from an apprehension that no dependence could be placed on indirect sources; but now, upon a sudden, it was discovered that no augmentation of revenue was wanted. He could not reconcile this conduct; nor was he convinced that no augmentation of revenue was necessary. On the contrary, he believed it would be necessary to augment indirect taxes as far as they would bear, and when that was done, that resort should be had to a direct tax.

It had been referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. B. said, to report upon what articles of indirect taxation an additional impost could be laid, and he had reported his opinion upon the subject. That report had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and they had reported upon it, recommending three different articles upon which an additional revenue might be raised; but, when they were about to go into a discussion of the subject, they were told there was no necessity for additional revenue. This, he said, was very extraordinary. He hoped, however, the Committee would not rise, but proceed with the business.

Mr. GALLATIN said, if the gentleman who had just sat down would advert to what had fallen from him on former occasions, it would be found that it was no new discovery that the revenue of the present year would be equal to its expenditure. The gentleman himself was on the Committee of Ways and Means last year, and must have known his sentiments on that subject. [Mr. G. read an extract from the report of that committee, on the subject of further revenue, which confirmed his opinion that the present revenue would prove sufficient till the year 1801.] Mr. G. said, it was upon that report that a direct tax originated, and he had never, from the time that he first was upon the Committee of Ways and Means, held any other opinion than that the present revenue would be equal to the present expense.

As to what he had said with respect to the increase of the Public Debt, that had nothing to do with the subject; because the revenue of 1792, 1793, and 1794, was not equal to the expenditure of those years, this could not have any effect upon the present time.

Mr. WILLIAMS believed the revenue might be sufficient to meet the expenditure; but he asked whether it would be provident to have only just enough, especially when there was an apprehension that our commerce might meet with considerable obstruction. Although he was for reducing the Military Establishment, which measure had been defeated by a majority of that House, he did not wish to prevent the collection of sufficiency of revenue. Whatever was more than the expenditure, would be well applied in discharging a part of our debt. An additional sum might be very easily raised from sugar, and from several other articles, without much trouble, and the next session there would be more time for maturing a direct tax. He hoped the Committee, therefore, would not rise.

Mr. HENDERSON hoped the Committee would not rise. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had given two reasons for the rising of the Committee; one, because no revenue was at present wanted, and that, therefore, it was not necessary to go into the subject this session. His other reason was, that they had not information sufficient upon which to ground any calculation with respect to the productiveness of any tax which might be proposed. With respect to the present revenue being sufficient, he had much doubt, as the loss from spoliations committed by foreigners upon our commerce would doubtless be great, and consequently reduce our resources. It was on this account that the propositions for augmenting the revenue had been brought forward. Every gentleman who had spoken on the subject had touched upon the necessity of meeting the defalcation, and it appeared to him that the easiest way of doing this would be by means of an addition of duty to some of the articles of import. Considerable time had been spent upon the subject, and he hoped they should go through with it. A contrary conduct, he thought, would appear inconsistent.

With respect to documents upon which to found an additional impost, he believed they had the best that could be got, though that gentleman had said particular items had not been brought forward, according to the whim or caprice of members. They had the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, giving an account of the amount of duty produced by every taxable article since the commencement of the present Government. This document not only presented a view of the amount produced by each separate article, but the comparative amount of one year with another; from which a judgment might be formed, whether the duty had checked the importations, or the contrary. This being the case, and having got the business matured, he hoped they should fully consider the subject, and not abandon it without examination.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he should be excused from the censure of the gentleman from Vermont, because he had before stated the revenue of the United States to be equal to the expenditure. He had examined the estimate which had been laid before that House by the Secretary of the Treasury, and found that, until the year 1801, the revenue would be sufficient. He was, however, for going into the system of direct taxation, to see whether the plan could be carried into execution; if it could, it would be a desirable thing. He should, therefore, be for the Committee's rising; because, if they did not go soon into the subject, there would not be time for them and the Senate to discuss the subject of direct taxes. He formed his opinion from different documents from those which the gentleman from Pennsylvania had had recourse to; he had had recourse to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of direct taxes, but he believed, in effect, they would amount to much the same thing.

Indirect Taxes.

[H. OF R.]

From this statement, it will appear, that if the revenue of 1796 can be relied on, that it will be found equal to all expenditures until the year 1800. From that period we shall require an additional revenue of £964,774; say one million, until the year 1809 inclusive; at which time the Dutch debt being paid off, the demand lessens, so as to fall within the amount of the present revenues of the United States. It will be fair to suppose that the revenues will increase equal to any ordinary rise in expense.

Mr. WILLIAMS said, with respect to the sum said to arise from the postage of letters, if the bill which had passed the House went into a law, he did not think there would be a single dollar saved from that source. In their calculations of expenditure, gentlemen had not taken in any estimate for fortifications. They had a report on that subject, and he believed it would be necessary that some money should be expended in that way. He thought there were other expenses not included in the estimate made.

Mr. DAYTON (the Speaker) said, that if the motion for the Committee to rise and be discharged from the further consideration of the plans for improving the system of indirect taxation, was the result of a conviction that it would be unnecessary to increase the revenue at this time, he should cheerfully give it his assent. Thinking, however, that the object of discharging the Committee was to smooth and better prepare the way for a land tax, he should be decidedly opposed to it. He had expressed a belief that by laying additional duties upon four or five articles of importation, which were too bulky to be smuggled, and easy, certain, and cheap in their collection, the revenues from that source would be so far improved and enlarged as to render the income equal to the exigencies of Government. It was consistent and politic in those gentlemen, however, who had composed the majority in favor of the abstract proposition for direct taxes, to advocate this motion for abandoning the attempt to improve the impost duties, which stood much in the way of their favorite system. Their arguments in favor of that system would be strengthened in the proportion that they could increase the necessities of the Government, and check the investigation and adoption of other new sources of revenue. The majority had it undoubtedly in their power to forbid by their vote the discussion and consideration of any plan which tended to counteract theirs. If they did so, and if they afterwards forced upon the minority the discussion of their own, he, for one, Mr. D. said, should think himself warranted to decline entering into its merits, and to oppose the bill upon a more general principle, of its being unnecessary and unadvisable so soon to resort to a land tax, under any modification whatever.

Mr. GALLATIN said, when he was up before, he had declared that he did not wish the system for laying a direct tax to be carried this year. He did not know, therefore, what the gentleman meant by saying it was a politic measure to get rid of the business in order to smooth the way for a direct tax. If this had not been his view, he would not have made the declaration he had made, because he considered himself as bound by it. He wished to have the bill amended, and go out to the people as a proposition; but further he did not wish to go at present. He therefore thought, after this explicit declaration, the remark of the gentleman last up was uncandid.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, the warmest friends of a direct tax did not expect it would be in the power of the House to modify the bill so as to pass it this session. He was not himself willing to vote for the bill as reported; but he doubted not it might be so amended as that he should be induced to vote for it, because he was convinced the necessary revenue could not be raised from the articles proposed. The three articles which the Secretary of the Treasury had reported as most likely to produce additional revenue, might produce a small sum; but could not be reckoned as a substitute for a direct tax, and there was, therefore, no alternative by which to supply the wants of Government.

With respect to the arguments used in favor of indirect taxes, viz: that they were certain and easy of collection, he thought they were against their adoption. The great argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, for an increase of duties upon certain articles, was, because their consumption had increased. It was strange that any gentleman should lay stress upon this, since within these few years the price of labor had nearly doubled; and if the increase of consumption were compared with the increased price of labor, it would not be found to have kept pace with it.

Another object had been mentioned for producing revenue, viz: a window tax. It was the greatest absurdity, he said, to think of making an article of caprice a mean of furnishing revenue. From what circumstance had a man a house of this or that size, but from his taste or caprice? Such a tax would fall very unequally. For instance, if one man had two thousand acres of land, and another had one thousand acres of land and the value of another thousand in money, though their fortunes were equal, they would not equally contribute to this tax. The man who had the money would immediately build himself a commodious house, but he whose property was wholly in land, might spend half his life before he got a comfortable house erected. This object was, therefore, a matter of mere whim and accident, and a very improper one of taxation.

An objection to indirect taxes altogether, was, that the expense of collection greatly counterbalanced the facility with which they were raised; for, before the money came into the Treasury, there were three collections and two insurances paid for, which would not amount to less than 50 per cent.; as, there was not only the immediate collector of these duties to pay, but also two merchants, and they must all be indemnified for the risk they run of losing the revenue, which would not be done without an adequate charge. It would, therefore, become a matter well worth consideration, whether, because this money could be drawn with facility from the people, it would warrant so much more being drawn from them than would be necessary, if the expense of collection were moderate. He believed it would not; and that the people had understanding sufficient to know that it was best to support Government in the least expensive way, since all money for its support came from them, and that 50 per cent. was too much to be paid for the accommodation of having their money insensibly drawn from them.

With respect to our revenue being sufficient to meet our present expenses, he believed gentlemen were correct in their statements; but if a tax must be laid he should be in favor of a direct tax, as the fairest and cheapest way of collecting money for the expenses of Government.

Mr. KITCHELL said, he had attended to the statements which had been given to them by the gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Maryland [Mr.

GALLATIN and Mr. S. SMITH.] It was their opinion that our present resources would be sufficient till the year 1801, and, therefore, that it was not necessary to go into a consideration with respect to additional revenue till next year. But, Mr. K. believed, if they considered the probable deficiency which was likely to take place in the imposts of this year, they could not reckon with any certainty upon the revenues to be derived therefrom in the year 1798. He was ready to acknowledge the revenues of 1796 would pay the expenses of this year, but he doubted much whether those of this year would be equal to the expenses of the next. He thought it therefore, necessary to provide additional revenue at this time, or the deficiency might overtake them before they were prepared to meet it.

But gentlemen said, at the next session of Congress they would bring forward a system for collecting a direct tax. Mr. K. said he was opposed to this mode of raising money, if it could be avoided; and, as long as other means of raising money were passed over, he could not agree to go into this measure; for, he conceived that a direct tax would fall unequally both upon States and individuals; for, as the tax was to be laid upon the States according to the last census, and since that time many States had greatly increased, whilst others had remained nearly stationary, it would be unequal in that respect; and, when they went into the bill, it would be found it could not be so laid as to fall in any degree equally upon different classes of citizens; for, though the commissioners to be appointed were to be vested with Legislative and Judicial powers, it could not be made to bear so equally as an indirect tax. It had been said that the collection of an indirect tax was expensive. He admitted it; but what should they get in this respect by adopting a direct tax. Another horde of officers must be appointed, and as great an expense would attend the raising of $1,200,000 from this source as was paid for $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 from indirect means. He could never, therefore, consent to abandon indirect taxes for the purpose of adopting a direct tax. He should, of course, be against the Committee's rising, in order that the propositions for raising additional revenue from existing taxes might be considered.

Mr. W. SMITH had no objection to the Committee's rising, as the hour of adjournment was at hand; but he hoped it would be permitted to sit again, because he thought it was right to give gentlemen, who were opposed to direct taxes, an opportunity of bringing forward every object of an indirect kind upon which they thought an additional duty ought to be laid, that if hereafter it should be necessary to lay a direct tax, they might vindicate themselves by saying they had done all in their power to raise the necessary revenue without effect, by means of indirect taxes.

Mr. S. said, there was considerable embarrassment on this subject. Gentlemen in favor of indirect taxes, from the present high duties and the embarrassments upon commerce, could have no certainty of any addition which might be made to the present duties being productive; and gentlemen who thought with him, that, however successful our commerce might be, a sufficiency of revenue to meet our wants could not be drawn from indirect sources, were unwilling to increase the duty upon the two or three articles reported as most likely to produce additional revenue, thinking the duty already sufficiently high.

There was another source of revenue which had been proposed, which would be free from the embarrassment to which a duty on imposts was liable, viz: that of stamps. This species of tax was equally freed from the objections brought against direct and indirect taxes, and had, therefore, the advantage of neither being classed with the one or the other. It would be seen whether such a kind of tax on stamps could be devised as would prove acceptable to that House.

In the course of this discussion gentlemen had doubted whether any revenue at all was at present necessary. He said he had paid a good deal of attention to this subject, but he differed from those gentlemen in opinion. There were but few things upon which to ground a certain decision; a great deal, he said, must depend upon conjecture. They had not yet passed the appropriations for the Civil List, Military or Naval Establishments; therefore no deductions could with certainty be made from these items. So with respect to our revenue; the uncertainty of what the amount of this might be, not only from the spoiliations which were committed upon our commerce by foreign Powers, but from the present embarrassments of our merchants, was great. There was no fact from which to draw a conclusion. Gentlemen made their own inferences; but, from the best information he could get, he believed the revenue would fall short of what it had been calculated. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] had stated the amount of the interest, and of our foreign debt, to be $3,000,000. He had estimated another object (foreign intercourse) at $300,000. These might be nearly right; but the same gentleman had calculated upon a reduction of the Military Establishment of $250,000. Now he had inquired of the Secretary of War, what saving could be made under this head, and he did not consider that there would be any saving at all from last year. He said, they had last year deducted from the estimate about $100,000, but they now found they had to make up a deficiency; and probably if any deduction was now made, they should have to make it good the next year. This deduction was, therefore, founded upon conjecture.

The same gentleman had estimated the instalment of the foreign debt due to Holland at about $400,000. This might be the sum we shall have to pay this year; but the Secretary of the Treasury had estimated what was necessary to be paid in each year, in order to discharge the whole till the year 1801, and he made it $1,200,000; and if only $400,000 were paid this year, the deficiency would have to be made up another.

Mr. S. said, he understood it was also the wish of the House to make provision for the payment of a part of the Public Debt as soon as possible, because it was a continual embarrassment; he, therefore, hoped some effectual means of revenue would be adopted for discharging the debt; but if only $160,000 or $400,000 of foreign instalment were calculated for this year, it would fall the heavier in future. So with respect to the Bank, the debt due amounted to six millions. The gentleman had said provision had been made for the payment of this, but, he asked, in what way? They had authorized the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to sell their shares of Bank stock, and to create a six per cent. stock, which was to be sold upon certain conditions. With respect to the Bank stock, to the amount of only $1,200,000 had been sold, and that at an advance of 25 per ct. at sixty days credit, without interest, which had since fallen ten or eleven per cent., so that if they were obliged to sell more of it, it would be at a great loss. With respect to the six per cent. stock, if they were obliged to sell it, the loss would be enormous. He, therefore, thought they should not determine on this mode of discharging the debt, but raise taxes to pay it.

He said, it was true, that the amount of imports for the year ending October, 1796, was upwards of six millions; but it would also be acknowledged that this was an extraordinary year, and that (as it had been urged on a different subject) 1795 would be a more just calculation for the future than 1796. With respect to the internal revenues, they were uncertain; he did not suppose there would be any considerable increase upon last year; and he doubted whether there would be any surplus from the Post Office, if the law now before the Senate passed. Therefore, allowing the gentleman's statement to be nearly accurate, additional revenue would be necessary, and it would not be right for the House to adjourn without furnishing it. He, therefore, wished the Committee might rise, and have leave to sit again.

Mr. DAYTON said, that the member from Pennsylvania seemed to claim an apology for an expression that he had uttered when last upon the floor, but he owed him none. He had said that a majority had been found to vote for a direct tax, and that it was very consistent and politic in them to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of indirect taxes, and thereby remove the principal obstacle to their views. That gentleman seemed displeased that his declaration had not been believed to be, not merely his own sense and intention, but that of the majority also. With what propriety, Mr. D. asked, could he put himself in their place; under what authority could he thus answer for them? Admitting that the gentleman had given assurances that he would not call for passing the land-tax bill in the session, and that he would adhere to his promise, might not other members call for and carry it through without him, and might it not be probable that they would carry the present motion with that design? Besides, Mr. D. said, he was not satisfied with any assurances confined to that session alone, and should not thereby be allured to abandon the plan which he thought far better. He wished to adopt such measures as would put a land tax at a greater distance than this year, the next year, or the year following, or until a war left them no other choice. This he was persuaded could only be done by an immediate addition to the duties on four or five articles of importation, which would well bear it, and produce about $600,000 or $700,000 annually. It might commence as early as June or July, and the impression which it would make upon the debt in three years, would be such as to liberate a portion of revenue sufficient to face the increased demands of 1801, without imposing any new tax whatever.

The Committee, on repeated calls, rose, and the House, after granting leave to sit again, adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 17.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they insist upon their amendment to the resolution respecting a call upon the debtor States for the balances due to the United States, and desire a conference, for which they have appointed Mr. Ross and Mr. STOCKTON. Whereupon Messrs. GALLATIN, COIT, and BALDWIN were appointed on the part of the House.

Mr. D. FOSTER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for placing certain persons on the pension list; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The House went into Committee upon it, but, in order to gain information on the case of a man claiming to be placed on the pension list, and not inserted, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

DRAWBACK ON SPIRITS.

On motion of Mr. GALLATIN, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, allowing a drawback on spirits exported by vessels of less than 30 tons burden by way of the Mississippi; it rose and reported the bill without amendment. The House took it up, when Mr. COIT moved to strike out the word "repeal," with a view to insert the words "to suspend for one year," the effect of which would have been to suspend the act which prevented the drawback being allowed, instead of repealing it. Mr. W. SMITH moved to have it recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, which being negatived, 40 to 35, the amendment was then negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

INDIRECT TAXES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of yesterday, viz: that of indirect taxes; and the resolution for laying an additional duty on brown sugar being under consideration—

Mr. W. SMITH hoped they should agree to this resolution. He thought there was no danger of its being felt much, it could be easily collected, and would raise a considerable sum.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, because a tax was imperceptibly felt and certain in collection, was a bad rule to judge of its propriety. If they had no choice of means, indeed, such a tax might be desirable; but they should consider whether this additional duty might not lessen the consumption. It might be said that half a cent would be scarcely felt; and it was true, that the higher the duty was raised, the less considerable would any future addition appear, and this would introduce a principle of laying taxes upon those articles upon which they could be most certainly collected, without regard to propriety or justice. And if revenue was again wanted next year, he should not be surprised to hear it said, that another half cent on sugar would scarcely be felt. But it was a serious consideration thus to tax articles of necessity, which were used by persons who could ill afford to pay any additional price for them, in a much greater proportion than persons of property. It was an article of necessity; old and infirm and sick persons would feel it very heavy. The tax would thus lie heavy on persons who could not afford it; this he thought should bear weight with the Committee, and he thought it should not be hazarded.

Mr. W. SMITH said, the proposed increase, it was calculated, would raise 110,000 dollars, and as the article was not liable to be smuggled, nor its consumption to be decreased, it would be a certain, and he thought, an eligible tax.

Mr. HOLLAND had no doubt but this tax would augment the revenue; but he knew also that it would fall more upon the poor than upon the rich, and he thought they ought not to add to their burdens. He thought there were other articles which would bear some addition, but either brown sugar or salt would be much felt. If they studied that which would be burdensome, here they might fix, but he hoped this was not the principle. By advancing an article so universally used, a rise of labor (already too high) must naturally follow.

Mr. SWANWICK said he could only repeat his observations of yesterday (which he mostly did.) They had lately been called upon, he said, for advance of salaries to many officers; instead of advancing, they were lessening them by taxing articles of necessity.

The situation of the West Indies had lately raised that article very much. He thought great inequality would be produced by it and much injury felt.

Mr. KITCHELL believed the rich and opulent would bear their portion of this tax as well as the poor, as it would fall upon fine sugar as well as upon brown. It would therefore be paid in proportion to the sugar used, and would fall as equally as any other tax which could be laid.

In this instance, Mr. K. said, gentlemen seemed apprehensive of the poor bearing too great a part of the burden; but, if the direct tax on land were to take place, would it not, he asked, fall much heavier upon the poor than a tax on sugar? He believed it would; since the poor who held lands would be called upon to pay their portion of it, whilst the rich who held no lands, would escape it. He, therefore, thought this a far preferable tax.

Mr. DEARBORN said, if further revenue was necessary, he could not conceive any article which would bear an advance of duty better than the one proposed. The present duty, he said, was one and a half cent a pound, and could it be supposed, that to lay an additional half cent upon it, could make much difference to the consumer, or that it would ever be felt, or that, at the end of a year, it would be discovered whether one and a half or two cents duty had been paid upon a pound of sugar? He should have no objection, instead of half a cent, to lay an additional cent upon this article. In various parts of the country, brown sugar was retailed at from 12 to 20 cents a pound, the price being much increased from the present distressed situation of the West Indies. But they would find sugar of the same quality selling in one place for 12, in another for 14 or 16 cents; therefore, whether the duty was one or two cents, he did not think it would be felt by anybody. It was true, that it was an article used by the middling and lower classes of the people; but the tax falling upon fine as well as brown sugar, all parts of the community would bear an equal share in the burden.

Mr. D. said, he was not certain whether any additional revenue was at present wanted; but, at all events, he could see no objection to an additional half cent or cent upon sugar; when even this small advance would raise more money than the whole of some taxes which were very expensive in the collection. Whenever peace and tranquility took place in the West Indies, and the trade to that quarter could be carried on as usual, the price of sugar would fall to nearly the price at which it was formerly sold.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike out the half cent, and insert a cent. It appeared to him that such an advance could not materially affect the consumer. The people, it was true, might use less; but, if they did so, as it was an article of luxury, every pound of sugar which was less consumed, would be of benefit to the country, by keeping the money which it cost in a foreign market at home. But he did not believe that this would be the case; or that the proposed additional duty would increase the price of labor, as had been suggested. He believed the price of labor would be regulated by the price which the farmer was enabled to get for his produce. Whatever the farmer could afford to give his laborer (especially in this country where agriculture is the true interest) would fix the price of all other labor.

An additional cent on sugar, he believed, would produce at least 220,000 dollars; and, as he had before observed, if it caused some persons to use less, it would be an advantage to the country. During the war, in the part of the country where he lived, very little sugar was used, except what the people made themselves, and they, at that time, in some degree got out of the use of it.

Mr. HOLLAND said, perhaps the constituents of the gentleman last up might manufacture their own sugar, and therefore would not be affected by this tax; but the greater part of his constituents were obliged to use and purchase their sugar; and if it were a luxury, it was one he did not wish to deprive them of, but that they might have it upon the same terms as usual. He looked upon it as a necessary of life, already at too high a price, and he should, therefore, oppose any advance of duty upon it.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he and his constituents were in the same situation with the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAMS] and his constituents. They manufactured almost the whole of their own sugar; very little imported sugar was used; indeed, they sometimes exported sugar; but though this reason seemed to act pretty powerfully upon the gentleman from New York, it would not have the same effect upon him. Whenever a measure operated partially upon other parts of the Union, though it might operate in favor of his constituents, he should feel himself in duty bound to oppose it. On the ground of their being Representatives of the whole Union, as well as on the ground of policy, he did not believe it was right to endeavor to throw a burden upon one part of the Union, because the part in which they were most particularly interested, would escape it. He hoped the amendment would be rejected, and after the sense of the Committee should have been taken upon it, he also would move an amendment. At present, brown sugar paid one and a half cent a pound duty, and molasses three cents per gallon. He should, therefore, move to have an additional cent laid upon molasses, in order that the two articles might be increased in the same proportion. He was against any increase at present; but if the duty on one article was increased, the other ought also to be increased.

With respect to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, which had been said to be in favor of this tax, he believed it was rather against it. [Mr. GALLATIN here read an extract from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of indirect taxes, which seemed to say, "that this tax would be as eligible as any other, though there might be danger in increasing any."] Mr. G. added, that if half a cent advance might in some degree be eligible, a whole cent would be considerably less so. He hoped, therefore, it would be rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS observed, that he had said the people in the part of the country from whence he came, made their own sugar during the war; if they were to make it now it would cost them more than double the price at which they might purchase it. He said, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GALLATIN] found the land tax was not likely to pass, he wished to defeat every proposition for an indirect tax. He had attempted, therefore, to defeat an additional tax on sugar, by proposing to add molasses to the resolution. He did not think this fair; he wished every proposition to stand upon its own ground. A few days ago, that gentleman had insisted upon the necessity of laying a direct tax; but now he came forward, and said no additional revenue was wanting. He wished not to have a compulsory tax, but a tax which persons might pay or not. If they did not like to pay the tax on sugar, they might do without it.

Mr. COOPER said he was against any additional duty on salt or sugar, though he and his constituents (as well as his colleague and his constituents) should bear no part of the burden, as they made not only sufficient for themselves, but for sale. Indeed, he said, a duty on salt exported out of the United States, would produce revenue, as a considerable quantity was sent into Upper Canada.

Mr. WILLIAMS denied that his constituents made any salt; they had no salt but what paid duty; nor did his constituents make one-fourth of the sugar they used; nor did he believe his colleague [Mr. COOPER's] constituents make one-half of the sugar they used, as he well knew that a large quantity of sugar was sent to that district by way of Albany.

Mr. REED hoped the amendment would obtain. Although such persons as lived at a distance from market manufactured their own sugar, and consequently would be excused from this duty, yet they labored under many disadvantages in other respects, on account of their remoteness from market, and therefore he had no objection to their being excused from the operation of this tax. He did not believe this tax on sugar would fall upon poor persons. Farmers, indeed, used a little brown sugar, but they would rather pay a little more for this article than have their land taxed.
